

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be read the third time upon Monday the 21st of April."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. J. LOWTHER: On a point of Order I wish to ask your opinion, Mr. Speaker. This Bill was put down by Order for to-day, and an intimation was conveyed to me through the ordinary channels that it would be taken. So late as an early hour this morning I was informed by the Chairman of Ways and Means that the Bill would be taken. But, further, I feel it my duty to call your attention to the very extraordinary course which has been adopted by the promoters of this Bill. I should first of all, before I raise the point of Order, like to know whether it is intended to proceed with the Bill now? [Mr. DODDS: No, Sir.] Then I must, with reluctance, call your attention to a point of Order. Sir, my attention has been called to the fact of a Circular, signed by a Member of this House, having been sent to many Members of the House. The Circular is in the following terms; and as a point of Order I think it right to draw your attention to the Circular—

"Reform Club, Pall Mall, S.W., "5th April, 1884.

"Stockton Carrs Railway.

"This Bill stands for Third Reading on Monday next, but Mr. James Lowther, M.P. has given Notice of opposition, and consequently the Third Reading will be taken on Tuesday next at Two o'clock p.m. precisely. My son is the Solicitor for the Bill, and I am exceedingly anxious to carry the Third Reading and defeat Mr. Lowther's opposition. May I beg that you will do me the very great personal favour to attend the House on Tuesday next, precisely at the hour named, to support the Third Reading? Hoping very earnestly for a favourable response,

"I remain, yours faithfully,
"JOSH. DODDS."

Now, among the Standing Orders of this House is one that lays down, in clear and precise terms, that no Member of the House is entitled, with respect to a Private Bill, to take any action when he has a personal interest in that Bill. Now, I have reason to believe that the person alluded to as the solicitor for the Bill, and described by the hon. Member as his son, is, to all practical intents and purposes, associated in business matters with the hon. Gentleman. Within the last 24 hours I have had occasion to attend, in the country, a meeting of a Commission to which the hon. Member for Stockton is legal adviser. His place on that occasion was taken by his son, to whom reference is made in this Circular; and apparently an interchange of work is taking place, and the hon. Member is very actively representing his son in regard to this Bill. I venture to submit this as a point of Order. If this kind of thing is allowed, it is bringing to this side of the Atlantic some of the objectionable "Lobbying" and "Log-rolling" practices known in the United States, to bias the opinions of Members of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The question of Order which has been raised comes on me by surprise. I was not aware of what had passed, or of the nature of the Circular alluded to. But I am not at all sure that this is the proper time to raise the question of Order on the Motion for the postponement of the Bill. I am not prepared to say, on the face of it, that this Circular transgresses the Standing Order in such a way that I am called upon to take notice of it.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I shall repeat my question, Sir, on the point of Order. I should like, also, to have an explanation as to the Motion for postponing the Bill. I was informed at an early hour this morning, by the Chairman of Ways and Means, that this Bill would be taken to-day. This Circular to which I have referred had been sent out, and other Circulars also, drawing the attention of Members to the Bill, had been sent out; but not one single syllable was conveyed to me on the subject as to the change of intention in taking the third reading until, in an under-tone, that intimation was conveyed in the Motion made just now. I think I am entitled to ask for some explanation as to the most unusual course adopted, and the want of courtesy to individual Members and the House at large. To put myself in Order, I will move that the Order for the Third Reading be discharged.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "That the" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Order for the Third Reading of the Bill be discharged,"—(Mr. J. Lowther,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Before that Question is put, Sir, I rise to Order. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire has brought before the House a certain document which is now in your possession, and has quoted the terms of that document to the House. He has asked you, as I understand, whether the issue of such a document by a Member of the House, if it was issued by a Member of the House, was not a violation of the Orders of the House—in fact, a breach of the Privileges of this House; and, Sir, I apprehend, in so very serious a matter as appears to be contained in that document, the House, having been put in possession of the terms of that document, cannot avoid giving some judgment on it, having regard not only to the order of its Business, but its own dignity and the dignity of its Members. Sir, in that document, which is signed by the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds), there is a passage of the most questionable, and, possibly, of a most objectionable nature. I waited, before I commented on the document, to hear whether the hon. Member whose name is at the bottom of it offered the House at once, and without any loss of time, some explanation of the history of the document; but the hon. Member for Stockton, whose name is on it, remained silent. Now, what was that passage, for I think the public out-of-doors will be of opinion that the House takes this kind of matter, where immense pecuniary interests are involved, very lightly if we allow this to pass over without notice from the House, or any attempt at explanation from the hon. Member? The passage was—I caught it from the reading; I have not seen the document until now—

"My son is Solicitor for the Bill, and I am anxious to defeat the Motion of Mr. J. Lowther."

A Circular is sent to the Members of the Liberal Party dated from the Reform Club, and a direct incentive—[Cries of "Order, order!"—I am quite in Order. I am speaking to a point of Order, and I intend, with the permission of the Speaker, to conclude with a Motion on the point of Order. It is sent by a Member of the Liberal Party—

MR. M'COAN: I rise to put it to you, Sir, as a point of Order, whether the noble Lord is not wandering at length into a speech which has nothing to do either with a question of Privilege, or with the Motion before the House? Is he in Order in so using the time of the House, when he rose exclusively on a point of Order?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is that the Order for the Third Reading of the Bill be discharged. I am bound to say, in reference to the point of Order, that I scarcely think the Standing Orders cover such a case as this. What I said was, that I would respectfully submit to the House that, a question of Order having arisen, it should be raised when the Bill is taken. I understand now the Bill is to be postponed, and the point will be raised at another time. I thought it the most convenient course that I should have time to consider the point of Order, and give my ruling when the Bill comes on for discussion.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: May I respectfully submit to you, Sir, and to the House, that it is extremely essential that the House should not part with this matter in a hurry. In the first place—let me entreat the indulgence of the House—the honour of a Member of the House is directly involved; and, therefore, the Privileges of the House are immediately in question. I raise this question, which I am going to bring before the House, as a matter of Privilege, and on this account—that the moment the honour of a Member is involved, the matter becomes of a highly urgent nature that will not brook delay; and let me point out that why it is necessary to take notice of it now is because there is not the slightest guarantee that this Bill will ever be proceeded with. If, in order further to elucidate these very strange proceedings, we wait until the House can proceed again—

MR. HOPWOOD: I rise to Order, Sir. I beg, Sir, to ask you whether we are not to understand that you have ruled that this point must come on when the Bill is taken at a later stage; and whether the noble Lord is not now, under pretence of suggesting several things to your consideration, violating your ruling in this respect?

MR. SPEAKER: I repeat, it would be the most convenient course, in my opinion, that this matter should be reserved until the Bill comes on; and I stated I would then give a decision on the point raised as to whether this subject, now for the first time presented to my notice, is a violation of the Standing Orders. I said the point is so novel that I should like to have time to see whether it contravenes any Standing Order or not. I submit to the House that is the most convenient course.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: May I, Sir, ask you one more question, and, in doing so, I do not in the least wish to question your ruling. I do not understand that you have given an absolute ruling against me. But I wish to ask you whether I should be in Order in moving as an Amendment, or as a substantive Motion, that the Circular communicated to the House by the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), and issued by the hon. Member for Stockton, is a gross breach of the Privileges of the House? Shall I be in Order in moving that now?

MR. SPEAKER: No. That must be done as a separate Motion; it could not be raised in the discussion of the Bill.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Is it not the essence of a question of Privilege that notice should be taken at once on the matter involving the question of Privilege? I certainly take up the position that the House being in possession of the matter, the House is involved, and it is open to a Member to take the judgment of the House for the protection of its Members.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT:—[Cries of "Order!" and "Chair!"]—I rise to speak on the Motion before the House in spite of the cries—the most disorderly cries—of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. HEALY: Not more than your own sometimes.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) has asked for an explanation.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I must rise to Order upon that. I asked you, Mr. Speaker, a question on your ruling which you delivered on a point of Order, and, in answer to the hon. Member for Stockport, whether I should be in Order in moving that the Circular is a gross breach of Privilege? I apprehend that if that Motion is not made now it never can be made?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question now before the House has to be disposed of. It will be competent to the noble Lord to make a Motion afterwards.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) says he expected this Bill would come on, since it was put down by Order for to-day, and I must take the whole responsibility of the Order not coming on. I knew nothing of this personal question at all; but I saw it was extremely likely from the Notice on the Paper, and from what I heard of the opposition to the Bill, that it might interfere with the important Public Business coming on to-day. I know there is a great disposition when there is a peg to hang something of that kind upon it. I, therefore, made an appeal to my hon. Friend behind me to postpone this Bill, which, I am bound to say, he was extremely reluctant to do; and it was only at my earnest instance that he consented to the postponement, in order that the time of the House just now should not be occupied by the discussion of a Private Bill; and still less, I should say, should it be occupied with personal questions at this time, when everybody knows the time is limited within which the House has to dispose of Public Business. Now, I would, Sir, if I may take the liberty, support the appeal you have made to the House to postpone the whole of this question.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: It could never come on again.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Well, the Speaker has already ruled that the matter may come on as a separate Motion; and I am sure the House will be slow to reject your appeal, Sir, that time should be given for the consideration of the matter. The noble Lord said, as a matter of importance, it should not be hurried.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I did not say that. I said this particular matter.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Well, I say it is being hurried on now, and that there will be a better opportunity of taking the judgment of the House by a Motion. If hon. Gentlemen opposite think they have a strong case, then it will be none the worse for waiting; and I ask them not to hurry on the matter.

MR. DODDS: Sir, I yielded most reluctantly to the solicitations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman not to proceed with the Bill to-day. I have in my hand two or three little notes made since I came down to the House, for I came quite expecting to hear the right hon. Gentleman opposite speak in opposition to the Bill and move its rejection, and I was prepared to answer him. When appealed to last night I declined to postpone the Bill; but I have now yielded to the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, after mentioning the matter to the Chairman of Ways and Means, who thought that the Bill might occupy considerable time; and, therefore, we agreed it ought to come on after Easter. That is the whole explanation why the Bill has not come on to-day. Just a word with respect to the Circular. I believe a portion of it was suggested before I left town on Friday. I left it in the hands of my secretary, with instructions to confer with the Parliamentary agents for the Bill, and to despatch it, with the reasons in favour of the Bill, to some of my personal friends, by Saturday's post. I left town on Friday, and it was not until Sunday or Monday morning, while in the country, that I saw the terms of the Circular. I then expressed regret that the one particular passage which has been referred to was contained in it. I only desire, further, to add that the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, that there is something behind it in connection with my son, is wholly and entirely destitute of foundation. I have no more to do with the Bill and the matters involved in it than as Member for Stockton. I introduced the Bill into the House, and was desirous to pass it through, in the belief that it would be of great benefit to the district; but I will not go into that at present. The right hon. Gentleman says he attended a meeting where he saw my son representing me, and that there was something like an exchange of work between us. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that my son is associated with me in the office of chief clerk to the Tees Conservancy Commission, and is only discharging his duty, whilst I am discharging mine in the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER: To meet the convenience of the House, I am willing to withdraw my Motion to discharge the Bill, which I only made in order to allow of an explanation being given. But I should like to have a distinct assurance as to what day the Bill will be put down for, for Members have to attend at great inconvenience. I must again take exception to the fact that I was allowed to leave after the Division last night without being informed that the Bill would not be taken. Nor, apparently, was the Chairman of Ways and Means informed, for I am sure, had he known, he would, with his customary courtesy, have informed me.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY: I knew nothing of it.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I am sure of that. It must have been concealed from the Chairman of Ways and Means. I will not follow that up; but I must say it is most inconvenient that Members, having public and private Business to attend to in and out of the House, should be kept in ignorance up to the last moment of the intention not to proceed with a Bill in which they are interested. I do not wish to go into the merits of the Bill further than to say that I have in my hands ready for presentation to the House Petitions on the subject, signed by a majority of the Local Board of Stockton, and from a public meeting of the inhabitants, protesting against the Bill—["Order, order!"]—and when the time comes I will go into this matter, notwithstanding the disorderly interruptions of the Secretary to the Treasury, to which I must call your attention, Sir, for they are too habitual to be passed over. Meanwhile, I will withdraw my Motion, provided I am assured as to what day the Bill will positively be taken.

MR. DODDS: I have already moved that it be taken on April 21. I will only add, further, that when he came into the House the Chairman of Ways and Means fully expected the Bill was going to be taken. I had been in his room a minute before.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I must object to that date positively, and I must take the sense of the House on my Motion, for I am already for that day engaged to attend a public meeting of importance in my own constituency—an engagement which it is impossible to put off. I must beg that it be taken not earlier than Thursday.

MR. DODDS: In response to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, I have no objection to alter the date to Tuesday the 22nd. It cannot be longer delayed. While I am on my feet, I take the opportunity of saying that I exceedingly regret if any passage or paragraph in the Circular seems in any way to infringe the Privileges of the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I am sorry to appear pertinacious; but I understood it was to be the earliest day after the Recess. I would suggest the Tuesday after the Recess.

MR. DODDS: That will be the 22nd,

MR. J. LOWTHER: Very well.

MR. HICKS: I beg to draw the attention of the House to the understanding that was arrived at a few days ago, that we were to have a Morning Sitting on the first Tuesday after the Recess for the express purpose of taking the Cattle Diseases Bill, and I will ask hon. Members whether they think it reasonable that a question of this nature, which, on the showing of the promoters of the Bill, is likely to take up a large portion of the Sitting, should be put down for Tuesday—I will ask hon. Members whether it is right that a most important Bill, to which the agricultural interest is looking forward with so much anxiety, should be postponed for the purpose of devoting that Sitting to a Bill of a private nature? I must offer the most strenuous objection to the date Tuesday, the 22nd.

MR. DODDS: If the right hon. Gentleman prefers Tuesday, the 29th, I have no objection.

MR. J. LOWTHER: No; I cannot do that. I cannot withdraw my Motion until I know what day the Bill will come on. I propose Thursday, the 24th.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: We are anxious to meet the right hon. Gentleman's wishes. We have mentioned two days, and they are objected to. Now he proposes to put it down for the Budget day. Let us say Friday, the 25th.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I must remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the arrangements for today, which are the ground of the hon. Member for Stockton putting off the Bill, were made at such an early period that the whole re-arrangement might have been made in good time, and my right hon. Friend might have been informed at an early hour.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I accept the suggestion for the 25th, and beg to withdraw my Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to be read the third time upon Friday 25th April.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE (STOCKTON CARRS RAILWAY BILL).

RESOLUTION.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I rise now to speak to a substantive Motion—that of Privilege—and in order to take as early as possible the opinion of the House on the Circular which has been communicated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire. The reason why I raise the point now is that I do not myself perceive how it is possible for the House of Commons to command the confidence of the public in matters relating to private legislation, where, as I have said before, enormous pecuniary interests are involved, if individual Members of the House lend themselves to such proceedings as are undoubtedly set forth in the Circular now before us. The private interests of a particular Member are set forth particularly as a motive why particular Members of the House should support a Bill. There is not a line in this Circular, from first to last, about the public interest—from first to last it is a personal appeal from a Member of the House to his own Party to defeat a Motion of opposition to a Private Bill on the ground of the lowest personal interest. Now, I say that the explanation with which the hon. Member for Stockton has favoured the House is no explanation at all; and it adds to, rather than detracts from, the gravity of the occurrence. There was some kind of an arrangement by which the hon. Member for Stockton left town, leaving to his son and secretary the duty of Lobbying Members of the Liberal Party, and after or before he came back to town the Circular was issued, and at once became public property. Allusions were made to it in the Press, and, I believe, it was current talk in the Reform Club. But I cannot understand that the hon. Member for Stockton made the slightest effort of any sort or kind to withdraw this Circular before the Bill came on. Therefore, although the hon. Member for Stockton says now that the personal portion of the Circular, or a particular portion of it—I do not know which he said—was issued without his knowledge and consent, assuredly he was perfectly willing to derive any benefit that might follow from it. Now, what is this passage in the Circular, which I will venture to say is quite unprecedented in the history of the House of Commons—

“My son is Solicitor for the Bill, and I am exceedingly anxious to carry the Third Reading and defeat Mr. Lowther's opposition.”

Why is he exceedingly anxious? Not on account of any public good, but because “my son is Solicitor for the Bill.”

Now, I want to ask the House what would they have thought if, instead of the words "my son is Solicitor for the Bill," they had been—"I have an interest in it to the extent of £10,000?" What would the House have thought of it? But what is the difference? The son of the hon. Member is pecuniarily interested in the passage of the Bill. The son of the hon. Member is not only pecuniarily interested, but he is absolutely the partner in business with the hon. Member in regard to it. And that is put forward, without concealment, in the face of day—such are the morals of the Liberal Party now—put forward as a reason why the Liberal Party should support this Private Bill; and then we are asked to allow this matter to stand over, after the publicity which has been given to it, and after all the censures that are freely lavished on the mode in which this House conducts Private Business, though I must allow it has never yet been attempted to connect it with the private pecuniary interest of Members. We are asked to pass this over, to allow it to stand over, as the Home Secretary says, as a matter of very little importance—one of those personal questions hon. Members are so fond of raising, but altogether a triviality that ought not to delay the speech he is going to make. Now, I venture to say, the honour of the House of Commons is of far more vital interest than the Government of London. Whether the hon. Member belongs to the Liberal or the Tory Party, it is absolutely necessary for the House of Commons, if it is to maintain its character and retain the confidence of the people, to dispose of this matter without the slightest loss of time. I move, with every confidence, in the absence of any much more satisfactory explanation, and a much more apologetic withdrawal of the Circular in question than we have heard offered—

"That the issue of the Circular concerning the Stockton Carrs Railway, by the hon. Member for Stockton, is a gross breach of the Privileges of this House."

Mr. G. W. ELLIOT seconded the Motion.

Circular put in, and read as followeth:—

"Reform Club, Pall Mall, S.W.

"6th April, 1884.

"Stockton Carrs Railway.

"This Bill stands for Third Reading on Monday next, but Mr. James Lowther, M.P.

has given Notice of opposition, and consequently the Third Reading will be taken on Tuesday next, at Two o'clock p.m. precisely:

"My son is the Solicitor for the Bill, and I am exceedingly anxious to carry the Third Reading and defeat Mr. Lowther's opposition:

"May I beg that you will do me the very great personal favour to attend the House on Tuesday next, precisely at the hour named, to support the Third Reading:

"Hoping very earnestly for a favourable response,

"I remain, yours faithfully,

"JOSH. DODDS."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the issue of the Circular concerning the Stockton Carrs Railway Bill, by the honourable Member for Stockton, is a gross breach of the Privileges of this House."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT rose, and was called upon by the Speaker.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I rise to Order. I wish to ask whether, under the circumstances, the hon. Member for Stockton ought not to withdraw?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT endeavoured to speak, amidst cries of "Dodds!" and "Order!"

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The course the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) suggests was followed the other day.

An hon. MEMBER: It is usual for the Member to withdraw.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I rise to Order.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It seems to me that no one is to be allowed to speak except the noble Lord.

MR. SPEAKER called on Lord Randolph Churchill, and Sir William Harcourt resumed his seat.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I rise to a point of Order. It will be in your recollection, Mr. Speaker, I am sure, that when the vote of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Coope) was contested on the ground that he was personally interested in the Corporation Water Bill under discussion, he was told to withdraw. The conduct of the hon. Member for Stockton with respect to a Private Bill being now under consideration, I submit that he ought also to withdraw.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Stockton will be heard in his place. I do not know with what object the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) intervenes.

MR. DODDS: I do not know that I can add anything to what I have said on this subject. Perhaps I had better repeat what I said. I stated that I had no personal interest whatever in this matter, either as partner or in any other way with my son, any more than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire has; and I beg to repeat, in the most unqualified terms, that if there be anything in this Circular not merely in contravention of the Privileges of this House, but which, in the slightest degree, is supposed to approach to a breach of the Privileges of this House, I am exceedingly sorry for it, and beg at once and fully to withdraw it. I should be exceedingly sorry to infringe the Privileges of this House in any way whatever. I had not the remotest intention of doing anything of the kind. I thought I had said that before; but, at any rate, I say it now. If there was anything in the Circular which can be supposed, in the least degree, to infringe the Privileges of this House I am exceedingly sorry.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Stockton will now withdraw.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I rose before, because I thought the hon. Member for Stockton had already made the explanation which the House demanded from him. He has now repeated it, and I really do ask any fair-minded man in this House whether, after the explanation he has given, there is the smallest foundation for this Motion. Let us see what the hon. Member for Stockton has said, and what it is averred he has done. There is a Bill before the House affecting the town which the hon. Member represents. It is habitual in this House to send round private Whips. Whether the practice is a good or bad one I do not say; but, at any rate, it is a practice very frequently adopted in reference to Private Bills. I have received Whips of this kind myself from Members of both Parties, although they are things I never pay much attention to. If the hon. Member for Stockton is to be attacked under the Orders of the House, it must be because he used his position as a Member of the House to seek some personal interest for himself. The noble Lord said that this Circular indicates the lowest and most grovelling personal interest. Well, I believe the noble Lord is a father himself, and I do not know why he should describe a reference to his son as the lowest and most grovelling of all interests. The point is this—Has the hon. Member any personal pecuniary interest in this matter? He has said he has none, and there is no pretence for saying he has any. He sends a Circular round to his friends—a sort of “fiery cross”—asking them to come and meet a gentleman whom he describes as “Mr. James Lowther.” I believe that up in the North there are feuds very similar in character to those which used to prevail between the Border men of old, the Lowthers being ranged on one side, and the Doddses on the other. As to the expressions contained in the Circular, the hon. Member says that he did not draw up the document; but that it was drawn up in his absence, by his secretary.

MR. J. LOWTHER: He signed it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Or it was signed on his behalf. He has told the House he is not responsible for the wording of the Circular, nor, I suppose, for this reference to his son; and then he added that if there was anything irregular, or that the House had reason to complain of, in what he had done, he very much regretted it. After that, I should like to know whether there is the smallest reasonable ground for this violent proceeding of a Vote of Censure on the conduct of the hon. Member? Suppose he did invite his Friends to come down to the House, it was, no doubt, out of regard to his son, and in opposition to Gentlemen on the other side. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says his own Friends have come down to oppose the Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER: In consequence of this Circular.

MR. WARTON: On public grounds.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: At any rate, hon. Gentlemen engage their Friends to come down on the one side and the other. There is no question of pecuniary interest; and, so far as there may be anything improper in the wording of the Circular, the hon. Member has expressed his regret that such language was employed. Under these circumstances, I think the House will see there is no ground for raising this question of Privilege.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I must say I was greatly surprised when I came down to the House to-day and found what was going on. I had not seen or heard anything of this Circular; but, from what I have heard since I have been in the House, it does appear to me that, whatever may be the amount of blame that may be applied to one person or the other, the House has a matter of great importance before it, and has to consider how far its Privileges are concerned in what, as far as I can judge, is certainly a step in advance of anything ever known to take place in regard to a Private Bill. It has been said that the practice of summoning Members to vote against Private Bills is one liable to abuse, and one which it is not desirable to see extended. I concur in that opinion; and this, it seems to me, is a case where there is a distinct step—I do not say whether it is a long step or a short one—in advance of the ordinary practice. It is hardly to be expected that the House will pass over such a matter without taking some note of it; otherwise it would be set up as a precedent, and we may incur greater and more serious inconveniences than we have at present. When the hon. Member for Stockton told us he had not been responsible for the drawing up of the greater part of the Circular, it struck me that it must have been a document setting forth at considerable length the public aspects of the case, that he had allowed his secretary to fill in the facts, and that he was sorry to find that some expressions had been introduced without his subsequent approval. When, however, we heard the Circular read, it seemed to rest entirely on the fact of the hon. Gentleman's interest in the Bill, or his connection with the Bill, either through his son or otherwise. This is a step beyond anything we have known, and certainly deserves the notice of the House.

MR. RAIKES: I wish to say one or two words on this extremely painful incident in the history of Private Bill legislation. I am the more sorry to have to animadvert on the conduct of the hon. Member in this connection, because we know that for some time past he has been good enough to assist the hon. Baronet the Member for Walsall (Sir Charles Forster) in taking under his especial charge the management of private legislation. I cannot help thinking that is a circumstance it will be well to take into consideration, because the House should always have a scrupulous and a nice regard to the propriety of the conduct of those who undertake, even voluntarily, the transaction of Private Business. Apart from the personal question as it relates to the hon. Member for Stockton, the House has to deal with not only an individual, but an overt act. We have heard the Circular that is under discussion read; and, I must say, I fail to see how any explanation, even if it were more satisfactory than that offered by the hon. Member for Stockton, or the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, could operate to prevent the House expressing its regret at such an attempt to influence Members in regard to a Private Bill. Observations have been made as to what the Circular contains; but nothing has been said with regard to what it does not contain. From beginning to end there is no reference in it to the public interest, or the interest of the borough represented by the hon. Member who signed it. There is no reference to any public interest in it in any shape or form. There is a reference to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire, whose name is brought into the matter for reasons best known to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stockton. We have, then, a reference to the son of the hon. Member for Stockton—Members being asked to support the Bill as a “very great personal favour” to the hon. Member, because of his son's connection with it. I venture to think that if the House does not, in some way, record its sense of this sort of conduct in connection with a matter on which the honour of the House ought to be above all suspicion, it will be paving the way to great trouble and misrepresentation in the future, and that it cannot, at this moment especially, when we are engaged in the consideration of a great question affecting its actual constitution, be too particular to preserve intact for our successors that untarnished honour which has been handed down to us.

MR. RYLANDS: I rise to express a hope that the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) will not think it necessary to put the House to the necessity of going to a Division on this question. If we are compelled to divide, I shall feel myself at liberty, after the remarks of the hon. Member for Stockton, to vote against the Motion. At the same time, I am bound to say that I do not meet the Motion in the spirit, or even in the words, of the Home Secretary. I do not think the hon. Member for Stockton met it in that spirit, because he expressed the greatest regret that he should have done anything, through accident or inadvertence, approaching a breach of the Privileges of this House. The noble Lord has performed a public duty in calling attention to the subject; and I think we should, to as great an extent as possible, put our foot down, in reference to Private Bill legislation, upon everything which bears even a shadow of a shade of a suspicion of any personal interest of private Members being involved in transactions of this kind. It is essential to the dignity of this House that we should seek to keep it above suspicion. If I am able to judge the feelings of the House, we are pretty much at one in regard to disapproval of this Circular; but I think that on this side of the House we are disposed to deal with the question leniently, having heard the handsome manner in which the hon. Member has apologized for the Circular. We are disposed to prevent, if possible, any such Resolution as that which has been put before the House being forced to a Division. But, from what I have gathered from the other side of the House, there is not the same disposition there to look on my hon. Friend's conduct leniently. The result of taking this matter to a Division, therefore, would be that on one side you would get Gentlemen of one Party, and on the other side Gentlemen of the other Party; and I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition whether it would not be a misfortune if, on a matter in which I agree with him—["Oh, oh!"]—yes, I say on a matter in which I agree with him, we were not jealous of the reputation of the House, and avoided a Party Division? I think the feeling of the House has been sufficiently shown, and that the noble Lord has attained the object he has in view; and, seeing that the hon. Member has absolutely withdrawn the Circular, I submit that the course which would be most likely to promote the Privileges of the House, and support its character, would be the withdrawal of the Motion.

Mr. HEALY: I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down whether he himself received a copy of the Circular in question; and I would put it to the House whether it is not a very remarkable thing that the Liberal Party, who condemn the Circular now it is exposed, should have come down here to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Stockton? The Home Secretary has taken up a most extraordinary position in this matter. He said—"You must not ask a personal favour for yourself; but you may ask it for your son." It is a breach of the Privileges of the House to ask a favour for yourself; but it is not a breach of Privilege to ask one for your sister, your cousin, or your aunt. Such is the declaration of the Home Secretary. I should like to point out that we cannot altogether dissociate this Motion from the personality of the Gentleman who has issued the Circular. No one in the House can be unaware of the fact that the hon. Member for Stockton has set himself up as a censor morum et arbitror elegantiarum, therefore any offence committed by the hon. Member must be viewed with much more severity than one committed by anyone else. On the 30th May, 1881, a Motion was made by the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry), supported by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) to declare certain matter published in The Freeman's Journal relative to a vote in this House on the Land Bill a breach of Privilege. The vote in question had been given so that, in spite of the heat of Party passion, there could be no question in regard to the anticipation of the decision of the House; but the matter complained of was decided to be a breach of Privilege. Now, however, the House is going to declare that it is no breach of Privilege for an hon. Member to ask a favour in this House in connection with a Private Bill for family reasons; and in so doing, I must say, you are taking up a most dangerous position. You may vote this Motion down by a Party Division, and the effect will be to give hon. Members a licence in the future to do as the hon. Member for Stockton has done. This House, by the machinery of the Liberal Party and its majority, will have endorsed the Circular of the hon. Member, and Ministerialists will have an additional cry to go to the country upon. Before now we have heard of Circulars of various kinds—now you have the Stockton Circular. We have had the Slave Trade Circular, which has been turned into a Party cry, and now the Government use their majority—get their Whips, the two noble Lords whom I see opposite—to drill up their followers and bring them into the Lobby to vote that to ask a personal favour for your son in connection with the passing of a Private Bill is no breach of Privilege. I trust the Liberal Party will put itself in that position, and that we shall have the Home Secretary or the Prime Minister bringing his big battalions into the Lobby to declare that the action of the hon. Member for Stockton is not a breach of Privilege. That will put a weapon in the hands of the Tory Party that no previous act of the Government has given them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have only two remarks to make. The first is, that I think it much more important for the honour of the House that we should have a retraction on the part of the Home Secretary of the support he has given to the hon. Member for Stockton than an apology from the hon. Member himself for the issue of the Circular. It appears to me that the credit of the House is in much greater danger from the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman than from the Circular issued by the hon. Member for Stockton. The other remark I have to make is that the hon. Member who has just sat down seemed to think that the chief objection to carrying the matter to a Division was that the whole of the Liberal Party were going to support the hon. Member for Stockton. Well, I would point out to the hon. Member that any evil which is likely to result from such a course can be obviated by himself and his Friends voting for the Motion of my noble Friend.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not at all agree with the action of the hon. Member for Stockton, or with the speech of the Home Secretary; but it does seem to me that when the whole House, with the exception of the Home Secretary, agrees in disapproving of the conduct of the hon. Member for Stockton, and when the hon. Gentleman himself has practically thrown over the Home Secretary by apologizing for that conduct, it would be a mistake to divide the House on the question. So far as I am concerned, I disapprove of the conduct of the hon. Member for Stockton; but if the noble Lord pushes this Motion to a Division I shall certainly vote against him, because I regard it as a species of persecution because of the loyalty of the hon. Member for Stockton to the Ministerial side of the House. If the hon. Member were sitting on the opposite side, I am perfectly certain the noble Lord would not have brought forward a Motion such as this, unless, indeed, he had been sitting on the Front Opposition Bench. Under these circumstances, I do hope, for the honour and credit of the House, that after this general expression of opinion the noble Lord will withdraw his Motion; but if he does not, I trust we Liberals will stand by the hon. Member for Stockton.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Should I be in Order, Mr. Speaker, in moving as an Amendment to the Motion proposed by the noble Lord—

"That the hon. Member for Stockton, having apologised for the issue of the Circular concerning the Stockton Carrs Railway, the House will now proceed with the further consideration of the Private Business appointed for this day?"

MR. SPEAKER: Will the hon. Member bring up the Amendment?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON accordingly brought up the Amendment to the Clerk at the Table.

MR. SEXTON: Before you put the Question, Mr. Speaker, I would ask, as a point of Order, whether it is in accordance with the usage of the House that a Motion of Privilege should be met otherwise than by a direct negative?

MR. SPEAKER: There is no Rule applying to questions of Privilege. The Amendment is perfectly in Order.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "the honourable Member for Stockton having apologised for the issue of the Circular concerning the Stockton Carrs Railway Bill, this House do now proceed to the further consideration of the Private Business appointed for this day,"—
(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

—instead thereof.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That the honourable Member for Stockton having apologised for the issue of the Circular concerning the Stockton Carrs Railway Bill, this House do now proceed to the further consideration of the Private Business appointed for this day.

QUESTIONS.

STATE OF IRELAND—ALLEGED RIOT AT CASTLEREA.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a young man named Thomas M'Greedy has been sentenced to a month's imprisonment, with hard labour, at the Castlereas (county Roscommon) Petty Sessions, for alleged obstruction of the police; whether it is the fact that the obstruction consisted in asking Sub-Constable Nolan not to kill a man whom he had in custody, and whom he was brutally maltreating; whether Nolan replied by rushing at M'Greedy and dealing him a terrific blow on the head with his baton; whether several respectable witnesses (including Mr. O'Kelly, Professor in the Castlereas Seminary) swore that M'Greedy was standing seven yards away from the police, and gave no provocation for the assault upon him; and, whether, if this be so, he will advise the Lord Lieutenant to examine the evidence, with a view to the remission of the sentence?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that the sentence of one month's hard labour was passed in this case for riot and obstruction of the police. The obstruction did not consist in a mere verbal remonstrance, but in raising a stone and advancing to strike the constable, who, in self-defence, was obliged to raise his baton. The witnesses did not swear the alleged circumstances. They contradicted each other; but they all agreed that there was a riotous mob.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—SEC. 14—SEARCHES FOR ARMS.

MR. HARRINGTON (for Mr. O'BRIEN) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many searches for arms have taken place in the counties of Fermanagh and the proclaimed portions of Tyrone since their proclamation under the Arms Act, and with what result; how many resident magistrates' licences for arms have been granted in these counties; how many of the licensed persons are Protestants, and how many Catholics; and, whether, having regard to the fact that hundreds of revolvers were fired off in the land-lord meeting at Rosslea, and to the statement that "sackfuls of revolvers" were brought to the meeting at Dromore, any steps have been, or will be, taken to disarm the Orange Association in these counties?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, there have been no searches for arms in Fermanagh and Tyrone, as the having of arms in houses is not prohibited. The licensing officer for Fermanagh informs me that he has granted 475 licences—365 to Protestants and 110 to Roman Catholics. He mentions that the application for licences from the Roman Catholic parts of the county are comparatively few. He gives the respective numbers, as his personal belief that the religion of applicants for licences is not recorded. The licensing officer of the Dungannon end of the County Tyrone states that he granted, in all, 477 licences. He cannot distinguish as to the religious persuasions of the recipients. I have not yet received a Return for the Omagh district. The licensing officer for that portion of the county has been on duty in Dublin and away from his records. It is not intended to take any action "to disarm the Orange Association" in either Fermanagh or Tyrone, as is suggested in the Question of the hon. Member.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—COMPENSATION FOR MALICIOUS INJURY—THE BOROUGH OF TRALEE.

MR. HARRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that the ratepayers of the borough of Tralee have been taxed for the compensation awarded in the case of outrages which had been committed seven miles from the town; and, whether several magistrates and others who were not residents of the borough gave evidence in favour of its exemption; and, if so, would he state the grounds on which it was included in the area taxed?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, from inquiries made by the County Inspector, I think this Question must refer to the compensation in the case of the murder of Mr. Herbert. In that case, as in all others, the district taxed was reconsidered by the investigator after careful consideration of the evidence. In that case the murder arose from a conspiracy spread all over the whole barony in which Tralee is situated. If the Question refers to this particular murder, that is my answer; but I shall be glad to inquire if it refers to any other case.

MR. HARRINGTON: Tralee is 12 miles from that place.

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR. GEORGE BOLTON.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, What fee did Mr. George Bolton obtain by each appearance in the Ballyfarnon case; and, would he explain why the Tipperary Crown Solicitor appeared in a case in Galway?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Mr. Bolton has not yet sent in his account; but he will be paid the usual charges in such cases. The ordinary charges fixed are one guinea a day, besides travelling charges and other actual payments, except hotel expenses. I am informed a full day's work was done on each day of the investigation except one, when there was an adjournment, principally to suit the prisoner's solicitor. The Attorney General exercises his discretion in all cases when a Crown Solicitor has to be chosen for special duty.

MR. HEALY: May I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether the practice in Dublin Castle is for Mr. Matthew Anderson to get for every case three guineas; whether he then passes the case on to Mr. Murphy, who gets two guineas; and whether Mr. Murphy passes it on to Mr. Bolton, who gets one guinea; and, if so, why such a system is permitted, and does the Crown intend that it should continue?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I never heard of such a practice.

MR. SEXTON: Would the Irish Government have any objection to insist on Mr. Bolton paying over a part of this money in discharge of his debts?

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—INSTRUCTIONS TO THE SUB-COMMISSIONERS.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the suggestions and instructions issued from time to time to the Sub-Commissioners under "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881?"

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Land Commissioners inform me that there is no objection to laying the Papers referred to before Parliament.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—LORD ARDILAUN'S BAILIFFS.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If it is a fact that the Crown entered a nolle prosequi against one of Lord Ardilaun's bailiffs, who fired at and wounded two men who cut a bit of stick for a boat's rowlock on his lordship's property; and, if another of them who pleaded guilty was released on his own recognizances?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The Crown did not enter a nolle prosequi against anyone. Two of Lord Ardilaun's keepers having come upon two men trespassing upon his Lordship's property and cutting rods, a scuffle took place, during which an attempt was made to upset the keeper's boat. The gun of one was fired—whether accidentally or not was a question—in the dispute, and the two men were wounded. This keeper was put upon his trial and pleaded guilty, and afterwards, by an arrangement made with the men wounded, which was sanctioned by the Judge, he was allowed out on his own recognizances on his paying in Court £40 to one of the men and £20 to the other. The other keeper pleaded guilty to a common assault, and as he did not fire any shot he was allowed out on his own recognizances.

IRELAND—THE DUBLIN MURDER TRIALS — COMPENSATION TO MR. FIELD.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can give the date on which Mr. Field received £600, part of the £3,000 awarded to him as compensation for injuries inflicted upon him;

why this payment was so long delayed; and, why only £600, out of the award of £3,000, has been paid to Mr. Field, having regard to the fact that the Return published on the 7th of March last states that the levy was ordered to be made "Forthwith, in one sum?"

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Collector General of Rates handed £600 to Mr. Field's solicitor on the 14th of last month, the amount collected up to that time. The meaning "forthwith in one sum" is that the collection is made as rapidly as possible under one warrant—this being done. The warrant lasts for 12 months, and in order to meet Mr. Field, although it gave additional trouble to the officials, the money is being paid as it comes in without waiting till the whole sum is collected. A further payment of £600 will be made directly.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: What is the date of the warrant?

MR. TREVELYAN: The 20th of October, 1883.

SCOTLAND—THE HIGHLAND CROFTERS—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Lord Advocate, If the Report of the Royal Commission upon the condition of the Crofters will be issued before the House rises; and, if not, if he can say positively when it will be issued, and what is the cause of the delay?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): The hon. Gentleman must be well aware that the Rules in regard to the issue of official documents are very strict; and it is not the system under those Rules to issue them until a printing order is obtained from this House, which could not be done until the Report was laid on the Table of the House. There will be no avoidable delay in throwing off the copies.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman if he could give any indication as to the probable date of issue?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): I have made inquiry, and I have given all the information I can. The Office assures me there will be no delay in the matter; but I believe it will be a matter of a fortnight or three weeks. I can give no further information.

Colonel King-Harman

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—NUBAR PASHA AND MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Who is accountable for the appointment of Mr. Clifford Lloyd to the responsible post of Home Secretary in Egypt; whether, prior to his appointment, he possessed any special knowledge of the language or customs of the Egyptian People; and, if he has yet succeeded in promoting any of the internal reforms indicated by Lord Dufferin? The hon. Member complained that his Question had been altered. He had referred to Mr. Lloyd as lately a magistrate in Ireland.

MR. RYLANDS wished to know whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd could be dismissed by the Khedive, or whether it was necessary to have the sanction of the British Government before he could be deprived of his office?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I can, of course, only answer the Question on the Paper. I have already stated in this House that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was appointed by the Egyptian Government. There was a recommendation on the part of Lord Spencer and Lord Dufferin. I have no information as to the second Question; and, in reply to the third, I would refer him to the statement which I made in the House on the Vote of Censure. The Question of the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) should be placed on the Paper of Business. I hardly think it desirable to go into a general reply as to the position of Mr. Clifford Lloyd in Egypt further than to say that he is employed by the Egyptian Government. I cannot say anything about the Irish part of the Question.

MR. M'COAN asked whether the Report of Sir Evelyn Baring with regard to the action of Mr. Clifford Lloyd in suppressing certain Egyptian newspapers would be issued during the Recess?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that it would be presented to Parliament in the next batch of Egyptian Papers.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked whether Her Majesty's Government had received any confirmation of the statement in the papers of that morning that the action of Nubar Pasha in intriguing against Mr. Clifford Lloyd in his absence had been generally condemned?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: That is a Question I cannot answer without Notice.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Can the Government give us any information as to the state of things described in Cairo respecting the relations between Mr. Clifford Lloyd and Nubar Pasha, and especially as to whether any information has been received with regard to the retirement, or contemplated retirement, of Nubar Pasha from office?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; no definite information can be given to the House in a matter as to which we have not ourselves received any information. A difficulty, as is well known, has existed between Nubar Pasha and Mr. Clifford Lloyd; but no decision has been arrived at with respect to it in Egypt. No resignation has been received.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether Mr. Lloyd could appoint his own subordinates without the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: That is a matter of detail in Egyptian administration, and does not arise out of the Question.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Has Nubar Pasha's resignation been withdrawn?

MR. GLADSTONE: No resignation has taken place.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Is it true that he offered it?

MR. GLADSTONE: No resignation has taken place.

PERU AND THE POWERS.

MR. WILLIAMSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is the case, as stated in The Daily Telegraph, that the Foreign Diplomatic Body at Lima has refused to acknowledge the Government of General Iglesias; whether the action of the Diplomatic Body includes the Representative of Great Britain; whether any assurance can be given to the House, and to the Country, that our name and power will not be used in Peru for the recovery of debts, real or fictitious, due to Foreigners by that Republic; and, whether instructions will be at once telegraphed to our Representative to abstain from any course which would weaken a Government so recently established under circumstances of extreme difficulty, and which might lead to the renewal of war in that part of the world?

SIR WILLIAM M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it be true that the Foreign Diplomatic Body have broken off relations with General Iglesias, President of the Republic of Peru, declining to recognize his Government; and, if the Foreign Office has been informed of the reasons of such conduct?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, on the 19th of December Her Majesty's Representative at Lima was instructed that Her Majesty's Government intended to recognize the Government of General Iglesias upon the recognition by Congress of his appointment. The recognition took place early in March. On the 3rd of April the European and American Representatives were convened by the Peruvian Minister for Foreign Affairs, who requested the immediate recognition of the Peruvian Government. The Ministers, including Her Majesty's Representative, appear to have desired to receive further instructions before replying. The Peruvian Foreign Minister thereupon informed them that henceforward relations with the Legations were suspended. I have already explained to the House the action of the Foreign Representatives in regard to the Treaty of Peace between Chili and Peru; but this question is quite separate from that of the recognition of the Peruvian Government, and it is evident that the questions raised by the Treaty cannot be properly discussed until diplomatic relations are restored. Her Majesty's Representative will, accordingly, be instructed that there is no departure whatever from the intention of recognizing the Government of General Iglesias, and he will be directed to do so. In regard to the claims alluded to by my hon. Friend, there is no intention of departing from the terms of Lord Palmerston's Circular of January, 1848, on the subject.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—TRAINING OF THE WICKLOW MILITIA.

MR. M'COAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Why the annual training of the Wicklow Militia Artillery has been put off until August, when the service of most of the men of the Brigade will be needed for harvest labour; and, whether such postponement has any relation to the convenience of Lieutenant Colonel Bayley, whose vacation as a Land Sub-Commissioner will then take place?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the date of training was fixed on the recommendation of the General Officer. There was not time enough to get information to enable him to answer the second part of the Question.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS — RATHDANGAN, BALTINGLASS.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, as President of the Local Government Board (Ireland), a charge of misconduct on the part of Mr. Daggs, Returning Officer, and George Driver, Poor Rate Collector, has been brought under his notice, in regard to the election of a Poor Law Guardian for the electoral division of Rathdangan, in the union of Baltinglass; whether the complainants have applied to the Local Government Board for a sworn investigation; and, whether their application will be complied with?

MR. TREVELYAN: Complaints have been made with respect to the course pursued by the Returning Officer and the Collector of Poor Rates in connection with this election, and a sworn inquiry has been asked for. The Local Government Board are not yet in a position to say whether there is any necessity for such an inquiry, as they have not received the explanation which the officers concerned may have to offer.

THE WAR OFFICE—LOWER DIVISION CLERKS.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, since 1878, the Secretary of State for War has received several petitions from the Lower Division Clerks of the War Office on the subject of holidays and sick leave; and, whether, having regard to the statement made by the Secretary to the Treasury in this House, on the 2nd August, 1883, that the question of holidays is one to be decided by the Head of each Department, it is the intention of the Secretary of State to accede to the prayer of his petitioners by extending their ordinary leave to the period allowed to Lower Division Clerks at the Admiralty, and by placing them, as regards sick leave, on the same footing as Higher Division Clerks and established Messengers, and by authorizing arrangements whereby as many clerks as possible should be granted the privilege of the half-holiday on Saturday?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir; several such Petitions have been received. The question of clerks' leave is one which, as stated in the Question, has been arranged departmentally; but it raises some points of rather wider application, and I am in communication with the Treasury on the subject.

CRIMINAL LAW (SCOTLAND)—CASE OF LACHLAN M'LEOD.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Lord Advocate, with regard to the Skye prevarication case, If he could state whether Sheriff Substitute Speirs based his sentence on Lachlan M'Leod upon Statute Law or upon a fiction of Law; and, if upon the latter, whether he will at once introduce a measure defining the powers of the sheriffs and minor judges in dealing with and punishing those guilty of prevarication on oath or of contempt of court?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): Sheriff-Substitute Speirs based his sentence neither upon Statute Law nor upon a fiction of law, but on the Common Law of Scotland. I do not see any reason for dealing separately with the case of minor Judges; but I may say that the whole matter of punishment for contempt of Court was under the consideration of the Government last year, a Bill dealing with it having been introduced into the other House. If such a measure should again be submitted to Parliament, the case of minor Judges will doubtless be provided for in it.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—BERBER AND KHARTOUM.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Governor of Berber has telegraphed to Cairo that the tribes between Berber and Khartoum are in open rebellion, that all communication with Khartoum is cut off, that in his opinion Dongola and Berber will soon be invested, and that the Great Bisharèn tribe are momentarily expected to rise; what is the date of the last Despatch from General Gordon; and, what steps Her Majesty's Ministers propose to take to save him from the grave danger in which he and those dependent upon him now stand?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the Governor General of Berber has telegraphed to Sir Evelyn Baring that the number of rebels round Khartoum is said to be increasing, and that the population between Khartoum and Berber is in a very disturbed condition. He adds that the rebels are believed to be in communication with the Bisharèn Arabs. The last intelligence from General Gordon received by Sir Evelyn Baring, as already stated by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War, is the intelligence of the 23rd. I have nothing to add to the statement made by my noble Friend as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government in regard to General Gordon.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked whether the House was to understand that in the present critical state of affairs absolutely nothing was to be done to save General Gordon?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE not rising to reply,

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will answer the Question which I have put to the noble Lord?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I will not answer that Question. It is intended only to bewilder and mislead, and I will give no answer.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Then I beg to give Notice that on the earliest possible occasion after the Recess—or to-night, if possible—I shall call attention to the abandonment by the Government of General Gordon.

INLAND REVENUE—DRAWBACKS ON SILVER PLATE.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will cause the Records to be searched, to ascertain if any "draw-back" was granted to holders of silver plate when the Duty thereon was repealed in 1758, after being many years in force; also, to ascertain if trade holders of gold and silver plate paid the additional Duties when these Duties were increased from 8s. to 16s. and then to 17s. per ounce on gold plate, and on silver plate from 6d. to 1s. then to 1s. 3d. and finally to 1s. 6d.; and, if he will direct the official Return of Duties collected on plate to be separated in the Finance Accounts and in the Report of the Inland Revenue Board, so as to distinguish the Duties from gold separately from the Duties on silver plate?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no objection to search the Records in respect to the first part of the Question; and with respect to the second part of the Question, he would consider the suggestion before the issue of the next Financial Account.

IRELAND—REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (for Mr. MOLLOY) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to his statement that "the third class of clerks is being put an end to in the Registry of Deeds, Dublin," Whether he is prepared to offer to the gentlemen concerned in that Department the special terms of retirement given to the staff of the War Office and the Admiralty five years ago?

MR. COURTNEY: There is no legal power to grant these terms.

LAW AND JUSTICE (INDIA)—THE JUDGES OF THE HIGH COURT OF BENGAL AND THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON (for Mr. E. STANHOPE) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the Letter of the Judges of the High Court of Bengal, dated 15th December 1883, protesting against the language used by him in the House of Commons on the subject of their Minute on the Ilbert Bill; and, whether he will, in justice to the Judges, urge the Secretary of State for India to lay it upon the Table of the House?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that this document would be included in Papers which would be presented, and would shortly be in the hands of Members.

TURKEY (EUROPEAN PROVINCES)—
GOVERNOR GENERALSHIP OF ROUMELIA—RE-APPOINTMENT OF ALEKO PASHA.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that the Russian Government alone among the Great Powers opposes the re-appointment of Aleko Pasha of Governor-General of Roumelia; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will continue to support his appointment?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The question of the re-appointment of Aleko Pasha is now under consideration, and it is not in my power to make any statement at the present moment.

EGYPT—SECRET AGREEMENTS WITH FOREIGN POWERS.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the late Conservative Government entered into any covenants with Austria, Prussia, or any other Power, besides those regarding Egypt, which are not known to the House; and whether, if so, he will lay them upon the Table of the House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I would beg to refer my hon. Friend to the reply to a similar Question put by him on the 28th of May, 1880, when my Predecessor in the Office which I now hold stated that, for reasons which the House would readily understand, it was obviously impossible for Her Majesty's Government to give an answer which would completely satisfy the curiosity of the hon. Member. It will, however, be satisfactory the House to know that, subject to the statement made by the Prime Minister last night, Her Majesty's Government are able to state that this country is under no other engagement for the future than those on the Table of the House.

MR. BOURKE asked when the Papers referring to agreements with other Powers, to which allusion was made on Monday night, would be presented to the House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that he intended to communicate with the right hon. Gentleman on this subject.

MR. BOURKE observed that the noble Lord was quite at liberty to publish the whole of the Correspondence.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that he had no intention of going back upon what had been said on the part of the Government. He had only wished to state that he was willing to communicate with his right hon. Friend on this matter.

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO RIVER.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he would present to Parliament Copy of the full Reports, during the past two years, received from Mr. Cohen, Her Majesty's Consul at Saint Paul de Loanda?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There will be no objection to presenting a selection from the Reports of Her Majesty's Consul at Loanda to Parliament; but I cannot, of course, undertake to lay confidential communications before the House.

ARMY — ARMY CLOTHING FACTORY, PIMLICO—RETURN OF NUMBER AND COST OF GARMENTS.

MR. DAWSON asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to the fact that the cost of making clothing at the Government Factory, Pimlico, is from twenty to fifty per cent. in excess of that paid to contractors, and that the Director of Clothing, in his evidence before the Parliamentary Committee, admitted that there was a loss of £8,000 on the work done the previous year at the Government Factory; also, that the sum of £20,000, voted last year for making up clothing by contract, was not so expended, while the amount voted for the "Government Factory" was exceeded; that, in addition to the higher price paid at the Government Factory for making up, a larger quantity of material was used than that issued to contractors; and, whether he will grant the Return, of which Notice has been given by the Member for Queen's County, before Vote 11 of the Army Estimates is taken?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, there would be no objection to give the Return referred to by the hon. Member.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—GENERAL GORDON.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Government will communicate to the House the Despatch from General Gordon, in which he is stated to have asked that a small British force should be despatched to Berber, and a British, India, or Egyptian force to Wady Halfa, for the purpose of effecting a diversion against the Mahdi; and, if General Gordon stated in this, or in any subsequent despatch, that, in his opinion, it was the delay of the Government which rendered this decision a necessity?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is intended, shortly, to present further Papers on this subject. I cannot say exactly what despatches or telegrams will be included in those Papers; but it would certainly be inconvenient and most undesirable that the particular despatch referred to by the hon. and gallant Member should be laid on the Table separately from the others which explain it.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN wished to know whether the extracts in question would be included among the Papers presented?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the selection of the Foreign Office Papers to be presented to Parliament did not rest with him. He would, however, communicate with the Foreign Office on the subject.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether the Papers would contain the communications with reference to the proposed appointment of Zebehr?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I said before, and I think the right hon. Gentleman must be aware, that the publication of these Papers does not rest with me or my Department. All I can say is that I will make the right hon. Gentleman's request known to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked whether the Papers would contain the despatches from General Gordon relating to Zebehr?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I cannot undertake to state exactly beforehand what will be produced; but there is every desire to give the House the fullest information. There has been no Session of Parliament in which Papers have been presented so voluminously or so quickly as in the present.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked what was to become of the refugees who had left Khartoum at the suggestion of General Gordon, and whether they had reached Berber or gone beyond that place?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Speaking from recollection, we certainly heard of the arrival at Berber of a considerable number, and I think we have heard of their having proceeded further.

MR. J. LOWTHER wished to know by what force they were protected?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I cannot state exactly the numbers of the force at Berber.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Does the noble Lord speak of the refugees only, or of the troops as well?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Colonel Coetlogan himself has arrived in Egypt Proper. The women and children were, as I understand, sent from Khartoum with a certain number of soldiers, some of whom were in ill-health. It was these persons I referred to as refugees.

MR. MACARTNEY asked whether the soldiers sent with these refugees were not recalled to Khartoum by General Gordon?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I cannot answer that Question immediately. I will, if the hon. Member wishes, give him privately the information which he desires to have.

EGYPT—ALEXANDRIA INDEMNITY COMMISSION—CASE OF

MRS. RIBTON.

MR. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When may Mrs. Ribton, widow of Mr. Ribton, C.E. expect to be paid the amount awarded to her by the Indemnity Commission of Alexandria?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the sum of 65,000 francs was awarded to Mrs. Ribton as an indemnity for the death of her husband. No decision has as yet been come to by the Egyptian Government as to the mode and time of payment of the award; but Sir Evelyn Baring has reported that, owing to the exceptional circumstances of this case, the Egyptian Government will make an advance of 5,000 francs to Mrs. Ribton, and she has been so informed.

INDIA (MYSORE)—GOLD MINING COMPANIES—CONCESSIONS TO BRITISH OFFICIALS, &c.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for India,

Whether the Report by the Viceroy of India promised early last Session, on the connection of Madras officials with the promotion of Gold Mining Companies in Mysore, will be laid upon the Table?

MR. J. K. CROSS, in reply, said, that the Report would be laid upon the Table immediately after Easter.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
GENERAL GORDON.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT (for Viscount LEWISHAM) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is a fact that General Gordon is under no constraint and under no order to remain in the Soudan, and that he is under no inability to leave the Soudan at this moment?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this appears to me a reference to an answer already given by me, and it states, with general accuracy, what I then said. General Gordon is under no order and under no constraint to remain in the Soudan. But, so far as we are acquainted with his intentions, he is anything but desirous to leave it at the present time; and so far as we are aware, he is under no inability to leave the Soudan at the present moment.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked what grounds the right hon. Gentleman had for his assertion that General Gordon could leave Khartoum if he wished?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is the inference which we draw from the information at our command.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked if it was the fact that when the Government refused to appoint Zebehr Pasha they distinctly invited General Gordon to remain at Khartoum?

MR. GLADSTONE: That it was the desire of the Government that General Gordon should find himself able to remain at Khartoum, if the reasons were sufficient for it, is beyond all question; but there was nothing sent to him approaching an order or an injunction to remain.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: A request?

MR. GLADSTONE: No.

SUEZ CANAL COMPANY—ARRANGEMENT WITH THE EASTERN SHIP-OWNERS' ASSOCIATION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What arrangements have been made, in the interests of British commerce, in the matter of the Suez Canal difficulty?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, arrangements have been made with the Association of Shipowners, who represent, I believe, not less than three-fourths of the tonnage passing through the Canal, and we believe that those arrangements are satisfactory, and they are now being carried into effect. If the right hon. Gentleman desires further information, he will, perhaps, put his Questions to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I may say that Papers have been laid before the House which explain the whole of the matter.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)— BRITISH TROOPS AT SUAKIN.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked, Whether it would not be advisable, the heat at Suakin being so intense, to substitute Indian troops for English as the garrison of that town?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think I stated the other day that the British troops at present at Suakin are not intended to remain there permanently, but that the European portion of the garrison would consist of Marines, for whose accommodation preparations were being made by the Admiralty, partly on shore and partly on board.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Of what will the garrison consist?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I stated the other day that it was proposed to send a portion of Sir Evelyn Wood's troops.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF wished to know whether it would not be possible to substitute Indian troops in the place of the Marines?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Of course it would be possible, but we do not at present propose to do so.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

LONDON GOVERNMENT BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [7th April],

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill for the better Government of London, and other purposes connected therewith."—(Lord Richard Grosvenor.)

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

Question again proposed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, in introducing this measure I shall endeavour to make as short as possible the observations I have to offer on behalf of the Government. I have great need to ask for your patient indulgence, for I am sure the House will feel that mine is a task of great difficulty and complication, and I approach it not without the feelings of a navigator who enters a sea strewn with many wrecks, and whose shores are whitened with the bones of many previous adventurers. Still I think we may approach this question with some hope of a solution, for, as time has gone on, both the public outside this House and this House itself—I venture to hope without distinction of Party—have come to believe that this question is one which ought to be dealt with, and one with which it is worth their while seriously to grapple. There are, however, one or two preliminary questions with which I must occupy the time of the House, and there are just one or two main points in the previous history of this question to which I should like to advert. There have been many attempts to solve it, which it was the duty of those who present this scheme to the House to have carefully studied; but I will not delay the House by going in detail through them. There can be no doubt, if you look at the origin of the present municipal institutions of London, that the Corporation of London in old days did, and was always intended to, represent the whole Metropolis. Why it did not extend itself as the Metropolis grew is an interesting question as a matter of history; in some degree it was due to the jealousy of the Crown; the Tudors and Stuarts were very unwilling to see the power of the Corporation increase; in some degree also it was due to the fact that London was surrounded by great manors, especially the great ecclesiastical manors, and the whole system of these manors was incompatible with the enlargement of municipal and corporate rights. The result was that, while London grew, the Corporation remained stationary, and the City of London, as represented by the Corporation, is now about one square mile in extent, and has a resident population of about 50,000—that is to say, is equal to about a second or third-rate Provincial town in respect to population. When we consider that its population a few years ago amounted to about three times that figure, it will be seen that the resident population of the City of London, so far from increasing like the rest of the Metropolis, has of late years been constantly diminishing. Indeed, although it can hardly be compared to—“Sweet Auburn, loveliest village of the plain,”

there is no spot on earth of which it could not be more truly said that it is a place—“Where wealth accumulates and men decay.”

I do not mean individuals, of course. When the general reform of Corporations took place throughout the United Kingdom it was always intended that the Corporation of London should be included. Lord John Russell stated he never intended that Corporate Reform should stop short at Temple Bar. But there was one reason why the Corporation of London did not become the first subject of inquiry; and I mention it because it was a reason to the honour of that Corporation. It was because, amidst the decayed and decaying municipal institutions in England at that period, the Corporation of London was a real Corporation, with a real municipal life, and, whatever were its defects, was discharging a great duty to the community over which it presided. But a few years later, in 1837, the Corporation of London became the subject of an inquiry by the same Commissioners who had previously examined into the state of other Municipal Corporations in England. They dealt with the City in a Supplemental Report, and I will read to the House what was said by the Commission of 1837. The Report states—

“We do not find any argument on which the course pursued with regard to other towns could be justified which would not apply with the same force to London, unless the magnitude of the change in this case should be considered as converting that which would otherwise be only a practical difficulty into an objection of principle. We have pointed out how small a proportion of the Metropolis is comprehended within the municipal area. We are unable to discover any circumstances justifying the present distinction of this particular district, except that it is and has long been so distinguished. We hardly anticipate that it will be suggested, for the purpose of removing this inequality, that the other quarters of the town should be formed into independent and isolated communities, if, indeed, the multifarious relations to which their proximity compels them would permit them to be isolated and independent. This plan, as it seems to us, in getting rid of anomaly, would tend to multiply and perpetuate an evil."

After referring to various subjects of local management, they add—

"These matters have never been so well and economically managed as when superintended by an undivided authority, and the only real point for consideration is how far those duties for the whole Metropolis can be placed in the hands of a Metropolitan Municipality, or how far they should be intrusted to the officers of your Majesty's Government."

I will merely state to the House that we are not going to make the second proposal here named, or to delegate these functions of municipal authority to any officers of Her Majesty's Government. Anyone familiar with the political and Party history of that epoch will understand why the whole question of Municipal Reform slumbered until 1853-4. At that time there was appointed another Commission to inquire specially into the Corporation of London. I observe that the Order of Reference to that Commission was exclusively to inquire into the Corporation of London; it had no reference to report upon a general scheme for the management of the whole Metropolis. Certainly I wish to speak with the greatest respect, not only on public, but on private grounds, of the individuals who constituted that Commission. They were Sir G. Cornewall Lewis—a name I never mention without feeling the greatest personal veneration and regard—Mr. Labouchere, not the present one, and that eminent Judge, Sir John Patteson. Now I state frankly and candidly to the House that this Commission arrived at a different view to that stated by the Commission of 1837. They were alarmed at the notion of a single Government for a town of the magnitude of London, and they preferred a scheme for the creation of seven Municipalities to represent practically the seven Parliamentary boroughs, and they indicated in general terms a Central Body to be elected from these Parliamentary Municipalities. I refer to that because I have no doubt that the Report of that Commission, and the opinions to which I have referred, will be frequently insisted upon in the course of this debate; but while I have said that the Commission thus reported in 1854, the Government of Lord Palmerston, which took up the question of the reform of the Government of London, in that year declined to accept the principle of independent Municipalities, and in the ensuing year that measure was passed which, whatever may be its defects, has given some sort of government to the Metropolis, which was previously in a condition of absolute chaos, I mean the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855. That Act was conducted through this House by a man of great practical ability—Sir Benjamin Hall—and was introduced by a Government of which, singularly enough, Sir G. Cornewall Lewis was one of the chief Members.

Did that Government adopt the principles laid down by the Commission of 1854? No; it rejected them altogether. It declined to accept the principle of separate Municipalities. Sir Benjamin Hall said it was an idea that London would not accept, that it was not wished for, that if it had ever been desired, any of the London Parliamentary boroughs would have got it. Sir George Grey, as Home Secretary, in fact offered to any of these boroughs the privilege of incorporation if they desired it. They did not wish it, and therefore the Government did not propose it. That was the action of the Government of which Sir George Cornwall Lewis was a Member. (I forget whether Mr. Labouchere was a Member of the Government in 1855.) The Government and Parliament of that time distinctly declined to accept the doctrine of separate Municipalities in London. To that question of separate Municipalities, I have to ask the attention of the House for a few minutes, because I have noticed a disposition to revive the theory now. It has been raised repeatedly in Committees and in Bills before this House, but always rejected. The noble Lord opposite, the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), took a very active part in the Committee which sat in 1861. In 1861 the proposal was made to create separate Municipalities, and was voted against by the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire. I do not see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith); but in 1870 the proposal to create separate Municipalities was brought forward by Mr. Buxton, and it was condemned by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster. He said there was no desire for separate Municipalities, but that, on the contrary, there was an impression that their creation would lead to considerable difficulties. Therefore I say that, as far as authority goes, the authority of the Commission of 1854 has been overruled by the authority of Parliament and the Government.

I venture to say that the creation of separate Municipalities in London is impossible, and is not compatible with any real conception of a Municipal Corporation. What do you mean by a Municipal Corporation? Is it not one which represents the interests of the community over which it presides? But in all these schemes you must recognize the fact of some Central Body or other. This Central Body must deal with the large affairs, and the consequence is that you must have—according to everybody's theory, according even to the theory of the Commission of 1854, and according to everybody who has proposed it since—a Central Body doing all the great things; and then what is left for the other Municipal Corporations to do? There is nothing left for them but the minor matters, which are now dealt with by the Vestries of London. I suppose the Central Body would have to manage the drainage, the main roads, the fire brigade, the housing of the poor, open spaces, questions of water and gas, building regulations, embankments, and so forth. What, then, is left, after all these, for the separate Corporations? Nothing but the most subordinate duties. Under such a system you will have a number of second-rate inferior Bodies, overshadowed by the power of this great Central Authority. People are proud to live in London; but I do not think there are many people who, till a General Election comes on, are certain which particular borough they live in; and it seems to me that there is not a geographical or local feeling in London which would justify the creation of separate boroughs. As to founding them on the Parliamentary boroughs, that would not do; everybody knows that they are not fixed stars, and that their limits and character may from time to time be altered. It is these facts that account for what Sir Benjamin Hall pointed out, that none of these Bodies had ever asked for incorporation, and that, if offered it, they have refused. Even Westminster, which has a sort of name of a Corporation, has not got a real Corporation, and has never desired to be incorporated; and no feeling in favour of separate boroughs has ever been manifested in London. It would be an absurdity, I think, to create 10 or 12 minor Corporations. The people do not want them. There would be an absurdity about having a Mayor, and a Sheriff, and Common Councilmen, and Aldermen, all to perform comparatively subordinate functions. They do not rise to the dignity of turtle soup—[Laughter, and a cry of "Conger!"—]—they would hardly rise, as an hon. Member says, to the dignity of conger. Therefore I think that a proposal to create these petty Corporations is not one which is likely to commend itself to the House. I would venture, then, to dismiss, as Parliament has previously dismissed whenever it has been proposed, a scheme of this character. It is a sort of attempt to revive the Heptarchy, and I do not think that is a plan on which London would wish to be reformed.

There are two questions which, leaving that scheme, we ought to ask ourselves. Are things satisfactory as they are? Because, if so, we have to ask ourselves—first, whether things are satisfactory as they are; because, if they are, of course no scheme is wanted at all; and, secondly, if things are not satisfactory, what are the defects of the present system, and what are the remedies to be applied to it? Does anyone assert that the present system is satisfactory? Shortly after the reform of 1855, there were Parliamentary Committees sitting to discover remedies for a system that was admitted to be in many respects defective. There was Committee after Committee and Bill after Bill. I will not go into the details of these various schemes; but in 1870, when Mr. Buxton produced one of his Bills—it was in the time of a Liberal Administration—proposing to create separate Municipalities, the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster called upon the Government to introduce a Bill to reform the Government of London. In 1878 Parliament expressed an opinion very definitely upon this subject when a Motion was brought before this

House by Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth, who moved—

"(1) That the present state of Local Government is unsatisfactory and calls for reform; (2) that the whole Metropolis should be united under one administrative authority directly representing the ratepayers, and so constituted as to command general confidence; (3) that these conditions are not fulfilled under the present system; (4) that the ancient Corporation of the City should be extended over the whole Metropolis and remodelled so as best to form a Representative Body of the Metropolis of this country; and (5) that these reforms be undertaken by Her Majesty's Government without delay."

That Motion was carried by a considerable majority. From that time unquestionably the Party sitting on this side of the House considered themselves pledged to undertake the task. It has been frequently discussed; it was before the constituencies at the last General Election, and the Government have always regarded it as one of their duties to deal with this matter. The House is aware of the circumstances that have from time to time delayed it; but at last we are making an effort to redeem our pledge, and to do the work which Parliament has called upon us to undertake. So much for the question of whether there is any occasion for us to handle this matter at all.

Now, what is the nature of the evil which we have to combat? Everybody feels that it is the multiplicity of independent authorities in London. If you want anything done for London as a whole, you have the greatest difficulty in finding anybody to do it. A familiar example of this difficulty is the Water Question, and we have had indications of it in the question of the housing of the poor. You have a Central Body in London, it is true, for all London in the Metropolitan Board; but its powers are strictly limited. My hon. Friend opposite, the Head of that Board (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg), knows very well there have been frequent complaints that the Board has not a general authority to act for London in matters that concern its interests as a whole. Everyone sees that if you have in London an outbreak of cholera or small-pox, it is a matter that interests every part of London; but how to deal with that outbreak is a question which can only be considered in the small part where the disease commences. If you wish to send out orders and see that that locality takes the meaasures necessary to stamp out the disease and prevent it from spreading, where is the Central Authority that has power to control the independent Vestries? It does not exist; and that is one among many instances that might be given of the evils from which we at present suffer. The question of the dwellings of the poor is also a question in which it is easy to see that there is an immense want of some controlling and superintending Central Authority to give vitality to and to arouse action among the small Bodies in the different parts of London, not only in great matters, but in small ones. No one has ever seen a snow-storm in London without observing how incapable the fragments of London are to deal with matters affecting the traffic of the whole of the Metropolis. What everybody feels that we want is some single Central Body having authority, of its own right, to meet the exigencies of the whole community of the Metropolis. That is what every other great town has, and we cannot help asking why London has not got it? But here I wish to guard myself. I do not say that the Central Authority should execute all details of administration in each locality. But you want a Central Authority to control the local action of the particular parts of the Metropolis and to bring them into harmony; and, in my opinion, that controlling and harmonizing force ought not to be in the Executive Government of this country, but in a Representative Body of the community of London. Now, if we take that as our general principle, is it a sound principle? I do not think that my hon. Friend at the head of the Metropolitan Board will dispute that, because in the year 1870 the Metropolitan Board passed a resolution to the effect that the Committee had considered the question of the future government of the Metropolis; and, as the result of their deliberations, they reported their opinion that it was desirable that there should be a Central Municipal Government, with jurisdiction over the whole of the Metropolis, and that there should be a readjustment of the districts into which the Metropolis was at present divided for the purposes of Local Government. What does that mean? That you are to have one Central Municipal Government for the whole of London, and that you are to readjust and alter the various districts. That was the resolution of the Metropolitan Board in the year 1870. Well, what objection is to be urged against a proposition which seems on the face of it to be almost self-evident? Why, it is said, the size, the magnitude of the area, the vastness of the population, and the variety of London make this impossible. That is the fear that actuated the Commission of 1854. But then the Commission of 1854 had never seen one Central Body charged with the interests of the whole Metropolis; but immediately after that Commission reported, such a Central Body—namely, the Metropolitan Board—was created; and, therefore, the very thing that was then said to be impossible does to a certain extent exist. You have one Central Body, consisting of 46 members, who do for many—aye, and for some of the most important—purposes of Local Government deal with the whole of the Metropolis and its 4,000,000 of people. Therefore, you cannot say it is impossible, for the thing exists. I take this opportunity of saying, as I may not altogether find my hon. Friend opposite in accord with me, that he will bear me witness that our official relations have always been of the most cordial character; and I wish to bear my testimony to the admirable, and, I may call it, extraordinary, work, under the circumstances, which has been done by the Metropolitan Board of London. That 46 men should have been able to accomplish such vast and laborious work as they have achieved, upon the whole with considerable success, is a thing which deserves a tribute of public approbation. The Metropolitan Board was originally limited in its scope—namely, it was created with a view to main drainage works; afterwards the Thames Embankment work was added to it; and gradually its authority was extended to other matters. And that is a point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. You have got a Central Body, for limited purposes, in London. You have a number of smaller Bodies in the Vestries. From time to time you have found that there was important work to be done. To which of these Bodies did you give the new work? Was it to the single Body, which it was said would not do for the whole of London, or to the Central Bodies? It was given almost invariably to the smaller

Body. And why was that? Because in that way it was more efficiently and effectively done. Therefore, since the constitution of the Metropolitan Board you have added to it almost all the important new functions that have been created in the Metropolis, including among others the charge of the fire brigade, the dealing with slaughter-houses, explosives, tramways, theatres, locomotives, and even with destructive insects. Therefore you have this Central Body which you say cannot deal with the minuter interests of London; and yet whenever you have a new job to be done it is to this great Central Body that you give it, and not to the Local Bodies. But it is said it cannot deal with minute matters in the different and distant parts of London. What more minute and daily or more constant operation can there be than the superintendence of buildings under the Metropolitan Building Acts? And to whom are the care and administration of that matter given? Why, to the Metropolitan Board. That, therefore, is the practical answer to the contention that it is impossible for a single Body to deal with so vast an area and such an immense population as that of London. I am told that the City of Manchester, which is, of course, small in comparison with London, but which still is a great town, was originally placed under a district system; but it was found that that was not nearly so beneficial as a central system, and the district system was abandoned in order to have a more central system under the Town Council. When it is said that you cannot administer minute interests spread over a great distance by a single Body, I should like to know how the London and North-Western Railway Company manages to do it. Looking at the enormous magnitude of our great railways, and the vast mass of minute details which enter into their daily administration, is it not absurd to say that, even in a town like London, it is impossible that a single Body could attend to this work? I conclude, therefore, that the size of London is no argument against a Central Control, although I make this proviso—that it may be a very good reason for having subsidiary arrangements for administering minuter local affairs in the districts themselves. To my mind the very vastness of London, and the impossibility of breaking it up into well-defined areas, is an argument rather in favour of a Central Control than against it.

Then I come to close quarters with this question. If we are to have a Central Body, where is that Central Body to be found? We might make a clean sweep of all that exists, but I am not in favour of that. I think it is not in accordance with the genius of English Reform. I would much rather build on ancient foundations. We have always built on ancient foundations, but we have never attempted to keep up rotten buildings. Now, we have a single Central Body already. I have indicated the character of the work, and the good work as far as it has gone. That Body is the Metropolitan Board. It has done much, but it has not done enough. It is constantly obliged to acknowledge its inability to undertake work which London requires, and which the Metropolitan Board, I dare say, also desires to do. It is not fit under its present constitution to bear a greater burden. It is not a Body directly elected by the ratepayers. It is elected by an indirect process, which is a source of weakness to it, and it is constantly conscious, I think, of that weakness. It is too small in its numbers to undertake much greater work. The nature of its election, as I have said, is not a good one. I desire to speak with respect of the Metropolitan Board, and I will therefore not adopt the phrase that was used in one of our debates, which characterized it as "a vestrified Vestry." If we were to take the Metropolitan Board as the basis of our Central Government it would have to be reconstructed altogether; and, therefore, you would not be taking an old Body—it is not very old—but you would have to take it entirely to pieces and reconstruct it upon new lines. That would not be taking what was practically an existing Body. Then it would involve another thing—it would involve the extinction of the ancient Corporation of London. Now, the extinction of the Corporation of London would be a great shock to the sentiment of this country and the sentiment of this House. I have said before that this House adheres to the traditions of its forefathers. It is willing to reform its institutions; it is not desirous to destroy them; and there are no traditions more illustrious than those which cluster round the Guildhall. I am afraid that during the progress of this Bill I shall have to encounter the opposition of the Lord Mayor; but I will assure him beforehand that he shall not hear a word from me in these discussions that is inconsistent with the high personal esteem which we all hold for himself, or with the high respect which I feel for the great Office that he holds, and the famous Institution that he represents. I would very unwillingly part, unless there was the greatest necessity for it, with the traditions of the Guildhall and the Corporation of London. They belong to the most famous chapters in the history of the making of the English people. I should be as adverse to destroying the Guildhall as to destroying Westminster Hall or the Abbey. But the Palace of Westminster has adapted itself to the constitution of this House and of Parliament, and to the growing wants of the country; and the Abbey includes many memories which are strange to the traditions of the Plantagenets. I do not see why the Guildhall, or the Corporation of London, should not be willing to accept the same enlargement of their action as those two other famous Institutions have received. We have therefore come to the conclusion that if you are to have a Central Body, and are not to make a clean sweep of all that exists, but are to build on the foundation of that which exists, we ought to take as the foundation of the municipal life of London the ancient Corporation of London. And the object of the measure which it is my duty to explain to the House, is to adapt the Corporation of London, and to make it what it originally was intended to be, and what, in my opinion, it is capable of becoming—the great Municipal Government of the Metropolis of the United Kingdom. There is no originality in this recommendation, but there is great authority for it. It was indicated in the Report of the Committee in 1837, and in 1861 it was proposed by a man of great ability and great knowledge of London, as well as of other affairs—whose absence from this House is a matter of general regret—Mr. Ayrton. I think the first definite proposal of adopting the Corporation of London as the foundation of our Municipal Institution was in the draft Report of the Committee of 1861. The great advocate of this scheme was another gentleman extremely well acquainted with London affairs, the late Mr. John Locke; and he always advocated this proposal as the proper system of Municipal Reform. He was supported at that time by Mr. Benjamin Scott, the Chamberlain of the City of London, who gave evidence before this Committee, and who admitted that it was quite possible to adapt the Corporation of London to the wants of Municipal Government. But there is a still more important supporter of that scheme—and I am sorry he is not here to-day—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster. In 1870, after having condemned the principle of separate Municipalities, Mr. W. H. Smith is reported to have said that—

“It appeared to him there was but one mode of dealing with the subject—that suggested by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke).” —(3 Hansard, [201] 870.)

Now, what was the manner suggested by the hon. Member for Southwark? Mr. Locke said—

“The view he took of the matter was shared by a number of the members of the Common Council of the City, for he had read with great interest a debate which had occurred a short time ago, in which excellent arguments were adduced in support of the plan, that, instead of having these different corporations established, the whole Metropolis should be divided into wards, and that there should be one corporation for its government; and this view was strictly in accordance with the principle upon which the City acted when, centuries ago, they included within their bounds such districts as Cripplegate-without, Bishopsgate-without, and Farringdon-without.”—[Ibid. 870.]

That was the opinion of Mr. Locke, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster, who now sits on the Front Opposition Bench, said—

“There was but one mode of dealing with this subject, and that was the manner suggested by Mr. Locke.”

Now, I think that that plan is the plan to which all those who have been occupying themselves with a consideration of this question have ultimately come. It is very well known that a gentleman who took part for many years in the discussion of this matter, and who formerly advocated the plan of separate Municipalities (Mr. Beal), himself came round to this opinion; and my hon. Friend, who has done so much to advance the cause of Municipal Reform—I mean the junior Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth)—arrived also at that conclusion. But, Sir, there is an authority that I rely upon even still more than those Gentlemen to whom I have referred, because this plan of Mr. Locke's was proposed in a definite form before the Committee of 1867. He proposed a resolution that the limits of the City of London should be extended to the Metropolis as defined by the Metropolitan Management Act, and that the Metropolis should be divided into wards for the election of Aldermen and Common Councillmen. One of the persons who voted for that resolution was my hon. Friend the Liberal Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman Lawrence); therefore we have, in favour of this proposition, the recorded opinion of such a distinguished citizen as my hon. Friend behind me, combined with the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster, as a concentration of light upon a single point not often to be found.

Well, therefore, the foundation of our plan is to adopt the Corporation of London as the basis of the Central Municipal Body which is to administer its affairs. Now, there is a very great advantage in thus extending the Corporation of London, because, as I have already said, it has never lost the instincts, the habits, and the forms of municipal life. In its Committees you have—if I may use a military phrase—complete cadres of municipal administration. You have a Body by reason of its numbers, its ability, its wealth, and of the whole system of its organization, capable of administering a much more extended area. When you have a Body like that, with all its grand traditions, and with all its resources and means of public benefit, why, in the name of common sense, should it not be adopted and adapted to the requirements of this great Metropolis? How this is to be done is much more simple than people will suppose. We adopt the existing Institution, with all its privileges, with all its traditions, with all its customs, but with certain modifications. What is to be the area? The right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor need not be alarmed. We only extend his arms so that he may embrace a much larger population. I think nobody will doubt much about that. It ought to be the area now under the authority and control of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), in a speech which he delivered on this subject, and which I read in the Recess, observed that there are many parts of London which ought to be included in the Metropolitan area, especially in the North district. That I admit; and a Bill would be very incomplete which did not give the Municipality the power of including other districts which ought to be included, and of excluding other districts which it was thought ought to be excluded. But there is immense advantage, I think, in taking areas with which people are acquainted, in which they are in the habit of working together, in which they know their relations to one another; and, therefore, in the area to be taken, we adopt the area of the Metropolis Management Act, not as the real basis, but as the basis to start with. We propose to incorporate into the existing Corporation the whole of the citizens within the area of the Metropolis Management Act of 1855. We shall maintain the Corporation, and incorporate therein the inhabitants, who will then be "members of the ancient body corporate and politic of the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London."

Now, as to the provisions of the Bill. The qualifications of the citizens will be the same as in other Municipal boroughs. What are the powers of this Corporation? Now, first of all, we merge in the Corporation a number of semi-independent Bodies; and as it is the essence of this Bill that the whole original authority shall be in the Central Body, we merge in it the powers of the Commissioners of Sewers, of the Court of the Mayor and Aldermen, so far as they are administrative, of the Common Hall, the Wardmotes, and so on. The Lord Mayor will understand that I mean those satellite bodies which are not exactly the Corporation, and which are not exactly independent of it. Those Bodies, then, are to be merged in the Corporation. In addition to that we transfer to the Corporation of London the existing powers of the Metropolitan Board; the existing powers of the Vestries under the Metropolis Management Act of 1855; the powers, so far as they are administrative, of the Justices of the Peace of the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent; the powers of the Burial Board; the control of baths and wash-houses, public libraries, and other minor matters. The House will see, therefore, that the main transfer is a transfer of the powers of the Metropolitan Board, the Vestries, and the Justices of the Peace. Of course, we transfer with that the property and the debts; and, in fact, we transfer the whole administration of all the material questions in municipal life, with three exceptions. We do not meddle with the administration of the poor; we do not meddle with the administration of education as it exists; and we do not meddle with the existing administration of police.

Now, the Corporation is to act exclusively through its Common Council for all purposes—that is to say, it will appoint all its own officers. It will not elect its officers, as it at present does, through the Liverymen in Common Hall.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): Some of them it does not.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Theoretically it does not, but practically it does, because it elects its chief officer, and that is the Lord Mayor. I may say, that in doing away with the authority of the Common Hall we are really following the advice of the Commissions and of the persons who were examined in reference to the question. I say nothing about the Parliamentary rights of the Livery Companies, but, so far as their municipal rights exist, they are universally condemned. They have nothing whatever to do with municipal life. Their claim to take a sort of part which they have been supposed to take in the affairs of the City of London, recommends itself to nobody. If I had the time at my disposal, I could quote authority after authority on this point. The institution of the Liverymen is entirely alien to City life. We owe the presence of the Lord Mayor here, it is to be noticed, to the fact that the Liverymen were overruled. How is the Common Council to be elected? It is to be elected, as was recommended by Mr. Locke, by what will correspond to wards. We propose to divide London into municipal districts—I adopt that word, as, perhaps, more appropriate than the term "ward," having regard to the size of these districts. I do not say that I propose the ideally best division of London into districts for this purpose; but we take the districts as they now exist under the Local Management Act. I dare say these areas may require a good deal of correction, and powers for that purpose will be given to the new Corporation. These areas, I admit, are by no means perfect; but I think it is better to start with areas that are well known and familiar. What is to be the number of Common Councilmen? I have taken the number that at one-time existed in the present Corporation. In the year 1837 there were, I believe, 240 Common Councilmen, although this number is now reduced to 206. The question of redistribution in regard to the new Corporation will, I have no doubt, excite a good deal of interest as it does in regard to another subject. Among these municipal districts it is proposed to distribute 240 Common Councilmen in the manner that will be found in the 1st Schedule to the Bill. We propose to allot those members upon the principle that exists in the present Municipal Corporation and under the Metropolitan Management Act—namely, of taking population and rateable value jointly as the basis of calculation. The allocation of members will, of course, not be correct to a decimal; but the principle will be that which I have mentioned. In regard to the City of London, having respect to the smallness of its resident population and the greatness of its rateable value, we do not think it would be fair to deal with it on the same footing as the other districts, and we have given it a proportion of representation upon the basis of rateable value alone. This will proportionately give 30 members to the City of London, which will be one of the municipal districts. The other districts will have a number of representatives on a scale descending from 14 to 1 each, according to their population and rateable value. We shall then have a Council of 240 members, which will be fairly Representative of the whole Metropolis, and which will be invested with complete municipal authority.

The Lord Mayor will be annually elected by this Body, and will then be what he is supposed abroad to be—the Representative of the whole Metropolis of England. He will no longer be elected out of a couple of dozen Aldermen by a few hundred Liverymen who have no connection with the City of London, but by a Body which will be fairly representative of 4,000,000 of people. I do not think that we are thus doing much to degrade the Office of Lord Mayor of London. The election in Common Hall will, as a consequence, be abolished. In consideration of the great amount of work which will fall on this Central Body, it is proposed to have a Deputy Mayor, who will be a paid officer, and who will assist and take the place of the Lord Mayor when he is unable to be present. He will receive such salary as the Common Council may decide.

We now come to the question of the Aldermen, which is a very delicate subject. The present position of the Aldermen in the City of London is very peculiar—almost an unexampled one. They are a body of elected magistrates—an institution not favoured by the Constitution of this country. In 1843, Lord Brougham, in an eloquent speech, denounced it; and in 1837 a Royal Commission reported as follows:—

“The Court of Aldermen still offers an instance of that union of magisterial, judicial, and legislative authority which Parliament has recently condemned and dissolved in other Corporations. An additional inconvenience is found in London from the separate existence of the Court of Aldermen as a Municipal Court, the exclusive character of which appears to excite jealousy, while at the same time, by the constitution of the City, whatever advantages might be obtained from it as a second Legislative Chamber, are not secured or arrived at.”

It is also noticeable that in 1854 the Common Council themselves, in a document handed in to the Royal Commission, recommended the abolition of the extrajudicial authority of Aldermen. The Commission of 1854 recommended the abolition of the Court of Aldermen. We propose to do more than that. We propose to transfer the magisterial authority of the Aldermen to stipendiary magistrates. The administrative functions of the Court of Aldermen we shall transfer to the Common Council. The peculiar and exceptional features of the Aldermen of the City of London will disappear. The rights of existing Aldermen will, however, be reserved. We might, of course, create Aldermen upon the footing that they exist in other boroughs. In the Bill of 1835 Aldermen were given no distinction save that of rank, and I do not know that the change introduced in the House of Lords was very beneficial. Nor does it appear that the creation of Aldermen is very popular in boroughs where they exist. Only the other day I received a resolution adopted at Leeds praying for the total abolition of the office of Alderman. There are people—I do not know why, because it is a very ancient and honourable title—who do not like being called Aldermen, and it might be more difficult to obtain suitable persons to serve in this capacity if the old title of Alderman was retained. Although this will be a matter for consideration, we do not, therefore, propose to create any titular Aldermen.

Of course there will be a Burgess roll for each district, and the term of election in each would differ. It would be a great affair to have a general election throughout London, especially an election which we hope will attract a great deal of interest. We are anxious not to tax London by too numerous elections of this kind, and therefore we propose, instead of the alternate system being adopted, as in the other municipal boroughs, to have the whole of the Common Council elected at triennial periods, in the same manner as is adopted in the election of the School Board.

Hon. Members will also find in the Schedule of the Bill a number of clauses of the Municipal Act incorporated, which we think is the most convenient course. The Central Common Council under this Bill will be invested with all the original powers of the present Council, and it will be organized into committees in the same way. It may be objected that the work to be performed by the Central Council is too large and too varied to be all brought into one centre, and that, therefore, the interests of the particular localities will be overlooked and postponed. I am not going to argue against that view, because, although the fears thus expressed may be founded upon an exaggeration of the difficulties of the case, I am going not to put them aside, but to meet them. It is said that the local work can be done much better by the Local Vestries than by any Central Body. Happily it is not my business to attack or to impeach any of the existing Bodies in London or to deny that those Bodies have done much and useful work. Of the Vestries there are some good and very good, some indifferent, some bad and very bad; but the worst of it is, when they are bad, there is nobody to control them, nobody to superintend them, nobody who can bring their work into one common whole, and exercise any supervision over them. The existing Bodies are absolutely independent in the exercise of the powers they possess, and there is no common bond of action between them. This has a bad effect. Thus, sometimes one Vestry will do its work very badly, while another will do its work very well, and the result usually is that the one that does its work well will suffer. It may be said that the local work might be done by the Central Body; but I do not think that would be a good plan, or that it would be calculated to give satisfaction to the different localities who like to look after their own affairs. Therefore, in addition to the Central Council, we propose to establish District Councils in each municipal district. These latter Bodies will not be like the present Vestries, inasmuch as they will have no original or independent authority. If these District Councils were to have such independent authority and powers conferred upon them, it would be impossible to control them or to bring them into harmony with each other. These Bodies, therefore, will have merely a derivative authority delegated to them by the Central Council, and that authority and those powers will be defined by district orders emanating from the Central Council. These District Bodies will not be nominated by the Central Council, they will be elected by their municipal districts, but they will possess no power except that which is conferred upon them by the Central Council. I wish to indicate to the House the advantages which will result from this plan. The Central Council, having original authority, will be able to judge how much of the work it can do itself, and how much of it it ought to delegate to the minor Local Bodies, whose action it will supervise in order to see that the work is properly done. We, therefore, propose that these Local Representative Bodies, acting under their derivative powers, shall take upon themselves the great mass of the minute work to the relief of the Central Council, and shall do that work in accordance with the wishes and the desires of the locality in which that work is to be performed. It might be asked—"Why do you not describe in the Bill what are to be the powers of the District Councils?" That would be a very bad thing to do, as it would perpetuate the very evils that now exist under the present Vestry system, and would destroy the elasticity of the plan I am now submitting to the House. It is far better to leave the Central Council to ascertain for itself the matters which it will be best to leave to the District Councils to look after. It may be said that the Central Council will arrogate too much power to itself. But this check has been provided to meet that difficulty—namely, that the Central Body will have to provide the funds out of a central rate for the work it does itself, whereas the Local Bodies will have to pay for the work they do out of a local rate. This proposal will, therefore, operate as a check upon either Body undertaking more than their fair share of work. I omitted to mention this important fact—namely, that the members of the Central Council elected by the municipal district will be members of the District Councils, and thus will be the connecting links between them and the Central Body. In this manner we shall establish local subordinate Bodies, which will be in relation with the Central Body. The members of the Local Bodies will be elected at the same time as those of the Central Body are.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG asked how the members of these Bodies would be elected?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: In the same way as the Municipal Councillors are elected now. Each will have its own budget, and by the exercise of the counteracting influences of these centrifugal and centripetal forces we provide that what each asks for it must pay for. Under the scheme, there will be 240 members of the Central Council, and there will be, with the City, 39 municipal districts. After a training up in life as District Councillors, they will become Common Councillors. When the Central Body consigns the duty of rating to the Local Bodies, it will consign to them the duty of preparing an estimate for carrying out the works, and the Local Bodies will be elected at the same time as the Common Council. The District Councillors will be in one sense the agents of the Corporation, who will have the confidence of the localities which elect them, and an understanding can be arrived at between the Central and the Local Bodies as to the powers best to be transacted by each. We hope that this combination will relieve the Central Body from all work they cannot do. It will not be like surveyors or agents going into parishes; the Local Councils will give to active persons in the district a field of usefulness and ambition, a power which the Vestries do not possess. There will be 39 of these subsidiary Bodies, including the City, with powers of raising money by district orders granted by the Common Council. That is our plan for meeting the desire of local administration.

I now come to a chapter which I cannot altogether pass over, and that is the question of finance. I cannot go into great details in regard to it, because the Corporation, remaining the Corporation as it is, will retain the whole of its property, and I hope we shall not hear the word confiscation on this occasion. The funds of the Corporation are practically in three categories. The first is that of the City cash, which is a semi-private and semi-public property. Then there is their Trust Fund, and next there is the rate which the Commissioners of Sewers apply. The City cash is applied to municipal staff purposes. It finds the emoluments of the Lord Mayor and of the staff, the Guildhall, the Mansion House, certain charities and schools, and so forth; and likewise certain magisterial salaries and expenses. All these purposes, or almost all of them, are equally as applicable to the whole of London as they are to the City. We think that the Lord Mayor of London, though he will perhaps be a more dignified, will not be a more expensive person. I have never been a party to the charges, as to waste of money, that have been brought against the Corporation of London; but if I had any complaint to make, it would be that the Corporation has a staff which is rather expensive in proportion to the work to be done. We do not propose to take it away; we only propose that it shall be available for the whole of the Metropolis instead of the centre. There is one other matter to which I should like to call the attention of the Lord Mayor. We are not going to abolish the hospitality of the Corporation. Allow me to read the 4th sub-section of Clause 20. It provides that—

“Whereas the Corporation has been accustomed to spend money in conferring the freedom of the City upon distinguished personages, and in contributing to public and charitable objects, and also in the prosecution and defence of legal proceedings for the promotion of the interests of the citizens, and whereas it is expedient to provide for the continuance of the power of expending money for such purposes, it is declared that all such expenditure properly incurred in pursuance of the resolution of the Common Council shall be deemed to be expended for the public benefit of the citizens of London."

I think it would be a great mistake to deprive the Corporation of the Metropolis of the power of exercising that municipal hospitality, which, in my opinion, is not a dishonour, but an honour, to the Corporation of London, though I hope they will not offer too many invitations to Her Majesty's Ministers. The City will, of course, have its own expenditure for its own services within its own district, as at present under the Commissioners of Sewers. That will be a local rate.

Now, I have already alluded to what I think is a very important economical principle in the Bill—that is to say, that the things which are administered and done by the Central Body of the Common Council will be paid for out of the general rate, but that the things administered by the District Council in the district shall be charged specially in the district. If you depart from that principle, you will have infinite extravagance. We know, by experience, what a tendency there is to extravagance if you allow people to put their hands into the pockets of the General Body.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Does the Local Body make the rate?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, it makes a budget and an estimate, but the rate is made by the Central Body. They say how much they will want, and they receive the money, and they levy that money on the people in their own district. That we regard as a very important economical principle. We also think that this is fair—that the assets and debts of municipal districts shall be credited to and debited against them, for, otherwise, we might have a district, which had incurred a large debt, placed in a position of advantage as compared with a district which had been more economically administered. As to the Audit, we propose to apply to it generally the principles of the Metropolitan Board Audit, although, from the jealousy which I know this House has on the subject, we have nothing to do with the power of surcharge. But if the Auditors see anything which they disapprove, they may make a Report which will be published, and we regard that publication as a check on any improper expenditure. Now I must pass over a good many details. I have said that we keep alive the privileges and the customs of the City of London. I see no reason why we should not do so. The real truth is, that although there were privileges and customs and charters in old times which were found to have an expensive operation, yet in modern times the Corporation has been prudent, and I do not believe that the privileges and customs, with the exception of one or two, which are specially abolished by this Bill, will be injurious to anybody. We have limited the power under these customs to those which are actually now in use, so that there will be no power to go back upon any former practice.

Of course, the burgesses of the City of Westminster must disappear. The real truth is that they never had any municipal character, and the officers of Westminster were really the officers of a Manorial Court. They exercised no power except as to weights and measures, and they never constituted a real municipal institution.

Then there are other matters which we should like to deal with in this Bill, but we cannot afford to do so—like the episodes of gas and water. We cannot transfer the hackney carriages to the Municipal Body from the Police. We cannot undertake to do by this Bill what the Commission of 1854 recommended, and that was to transfer to another Local Body the Irish Fund. We have indicated our opinion that those things can be done by clauses which require the Corporation of London to introduce Bills for those purposes. We have also a larger power of making schemes, subject to appeal to the Privy Council, for the alterations to which I have referred. There is another episode which we cannot undertake in this Bill. I have often been asked my views on the licensing system. We cannot fight out the liquor question as an episode of this Bill; but although, as I have said, the view of the Government is that the power of licensing should be transferred to a local representative authority, we have been obliged, in order not to have too many side issues in this Bill, to leave the licensing authority as it is, or rather as it will be under this Bill, in the Borough Justices.

MR. RITCHIE: Did you say you are going to require the Council to deal with the Water Question?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes. Clause 48 enacts that the Common Council of London shall provide as soon as possible for the purchase or regulation of the undertakings which at present supply water and gas to any part of London, or any one of them. That, I think, sufficiently describes our ultimate municipal plan.

There remains the County Question. The City of London is a county in itself; but the best of the Metropolis is dispersed among the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent, being subject to a sort of haphazard jurisdiction as fractions of these counties. I do not think that anybody will consider that the administration of the Middlesex magistrates, for instance, is at all adequate to the requirements of a Metropolis like London. Well, we propose to include the whole of the Metropolis in the county of the City of London. For that purpose, of course, we shall remove the county jurisdiction out of London. That is done in the second part of the Bill. I have not time to refer to the peculiar history of the origin of the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex in the Reign of Henry I. London will, in the future, appoint its own Sheriff, and the Sheriff of Middlesex will be appointed, as in other counties, by the Crown. The Quarter Sessional jurisdiction of the various County Authorities will be transferred to a Recorder and Deputy Recorders. We shall keep the Recorder of London, and the Common Serjeant will be a Deputy Recorder; and we propose that there shall be three other Assistant Recorders to take the place of the Assistant Judges at the Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent Sessions. Practically speaking, the county jurisdiction in London ceases, and the administrative part of the business goes to the Common Council, while the judicial part of the business goes to the Recorder. There will be a Judge who will sit for the purpose of assessments. As to Petty Session jurisdiction, we shall have Stipendiaries. There will be a Borough Bench for London, and, subject to power of alteration in the Bill, the Police Court Divisions will be the Petty Sessional Divisions of London. The Coroners will be appointed by the Common Council.

The Central Criminal Court will be altered in this respect, that the Aldermen will no longer sit there. The Lord Mayor's Court will be retained until otherwise provided by Parliament, though its jurisdiction will not be extended over a further area. The City of London Court will be what it really now is—a County Court. Of course, too, in the Bill there is no alteration of the Trusts that exist—there will be a saving of all the nominations to the different Trusts. Above all, I desire to say this, with respect to the loud voices which have been raised on the subject—that the interests of all existing officers will be considered. There will be plenty of work for the admirable staff of the Metropolitan Board and of the Corporation of London, which will now be amalgamated, and the Vestry Clerks and the other officers of existing Bodies will continue to be officers of the Corporation. There is a Schedule in the Bill which I would commend to the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). There will be a great number of Departments which are now under the Crown and charged to the Imperial Revenue—among others the Police Courts—which will in future be under the control of the Corporation. I am also happy to say that, though the Municipality will be larger, the Treasury will not be any richer. We have to encounter a difficulty which it is necessary to provide for. We are not creating a new Body to do a new business; we are taking over a going concern. We have therefore to provide for a transition period, so as not to lead to confusion. We must take care that chaos does not arise in the transfer to the new Body of the power which was exercised by the existing Body. For that purpose two things are necessary—first, that the new Body should have time to organize itself and make preparation for the duties it has to undertake; and, secondly, that the new Body shall include the persons who are now engaged in the old business. We have endeavoured to provide for both these things. The first thing wanting will be to provide a burgess roll, because there is now no burgess roll for the whole of London. That will be commenced immediately after the passing of the Bill, and come into operation on the 29th of January following. Common Councillors will be elected upon that day for the several municipal districts. But we do not propose that they shall elect the whole 240 members. They are to elect 150, who will be rateably distributed among the municipal districts. The other 90 members will be chosen in the following manner:—We take over bodily into the first Triennial Common Council the whole of the 46 members of the Metropolitan Board, including their Chairman. We think we cannot testify more completely our sense of the services which the Metropolitan Board has rendered, and of their capacity to bring their knowledge and experience to bear upon the starting of the new machine. Next, we propose to elect out of the Common Council of the City of London 44 members to be members of the first Common Council—the best and most experienced members of the present Common Council. Thus we shall start in the new Common Council with 90 members perfectly familiar with the working of the Corporation, and the Metropolitan Board, with the finances and the various questions which are of importance in municipal affairs; and they will be 90 out of 240 members of what I may call the first “Constituent Assembly” of the Corporation of London. Those 44 members will take their places for the City districts. That Body will be thus constituted in the last days of January. I now come to the question of time; I have dealt with the question of persons. This Body will not at once enter upon its complete executive functions. It will have time to make itself acquainted with its duties, to organize and prepare its Committees, to appoint its officers, to consider and determine what work it shall do itself and what it shall assign to District Councils. In point of fact, they will have time to set the machine in motion. For that purpose they will have three months till the 1st of May. During that time they will be a Provisional Council. It will be elected at the end of January, will so exist for three months, and come into complete life and action on the 1st of May. We provide for this in the latter clauses of the Bill, which we call the Transitory Clauses, by which we provide for the period of confusion and chaos and transfer of authority. That being so, at the end of April the Councils will be elected. Then the whole machine will be taken over in its new form, and in that manner we hope that by securing time and experience the whole work will be secure. Now, Sir, the fact that it is necessary to prolong, under the present Bill, the existence of the present Body will render it my proud privilege to have continued the existence of a Lord Mayor of London for a term of six months. I shall be the first person who will have continued a Lord Mayor in office for 18 months; and my right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor will probably be the last man and the first who will have the office of Lord Mayor of London for 18 months.

The House will be glad to hear that I am now coming to an end. I have endeavoured to explain this scheme—very imperfectly, I fear. At all events, it will not be said that it is a revolutionary scheme. As far as possible, consistently with the objects of the Bill, it is placed on the basis of existing institutions, and is built upon existing foundations. Now, there is one great objection which may be taken to it. That is a political objection. It is said that this will be such a terribly powerful Body that the State will reel under it. That objection was taken by a noble Lord in “another place” to the institution of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The noble Lord said that you, Sir, would tremble in your Chair. You are new, Sir, in that Chair; but I do not think your Predecessors have felt that terror. If my hon. Friend opposite (Sir James M’Garel-Hogg) is a despot, he is a mild despot. If he possesses that great power, he exercises it with moderation. We have not suffered under the political reign of the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works. There have been times when there has been political danger from the Corporation of the City of London. We have read the history of John Wilkes and Alderman Beckford. There are to be found inscribed in marble in the Guildhall certain words said to have been employed on a famous occasion by Beckford, about which the strangest fact is, I believe, that they were never used. And, horresco referens, this House has sent a Lord Mayor and Alderman to the Tower. But those events took place in the old days of the old Corporation, and are not the political dangers of some dreadful new Democratic Body. They were the work of the Corporation of the last century. I see no reason in the present century that the Corporation, as it becomes more representative of London, will become a danger to the State. How will this Bill affect the Mayor and Corporation? Does it do indignity to the present Corporation of London? This Bill merely magnifies and enlarges the power, dignity, and influence of the Corporation of London? And as to the Metropolitan Board, it will not exist completely as in the old Body; but it undergoes a transmigration of soul. The spirit of the Metropolitan Board will be transformed into the body of the Corporation of London. As to the Vestries, they will have as their principal Members, what they have never had before, members of the Corporation of London. It is idle to suggest adherence to the principle of independent local authority, which is at the root of all the mischief. I have done all I can to facilitate the understanding of the Bill by means of marginal references, and it will be accompanied by an explanatory summary which will make it more easy to master. The first and second parts are the skeletons of municipal and county government, while the third and fourth are the expansion of existing Bodies. I would make an appeal to the House to discuss this important question. The Bill of 1855 was one of 250 clauses, and it was dealt with in three or four months; this is a Bill of 73 clauses, and it is not so complicated as was the Bill of 1855. I hope the present House of Commons will show itself equal to that of a generation ago. The Bill is one of great complexity; it may contain errors of omission and commission. If there be any errors no one will be more happy than I to correct them. All I claim on the part of the Government is that we have made an honest and painstaking effort to grapple with a considerable question, which, I believe, does in a very great degree affect the happiness and the welfare of 4,000,000 of people.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Secretary Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. HIBBERT, and Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 171.]

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—[BILL 144.]

(The Marquess of Hartington, The Judge Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he begged to move a new clause which had been drawn up in pursuance of the engagement entered into with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). It was as follows:—

(Unauthorised Punishments.)

"Whereas questions have arisen as to the punishment which may be inflicted on persons subject to military law under 'The Army Act, 1881,' under or by virtue of power derived from Foreign potentates or rulers, and whereas it is expedient to determine such questions: Be it therefore enacted as follows:—There shall be added to section forty-four of 'The Army Act, 1881,' at the end of this section, the following enactment:—No officer or non-commissioned officer shall, under or by virtue of any power or authority derived from any Foreign potentate or ruler, inflict, or cause to be inflicted, on any person subject to military law under this Act, for or in respect of any offence against such law, any punishment not authorised by this Act. The above enactment shall be numbered section twelve."

That, he thought, would meet the views of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. It would be observed that to bring the clause into operation three things must concur. The person inflicting the punishment must be an officer of the Army; the offender must be subject to English military law; and the offence must be an offence against that law. He could go no further.

New Clause (Unauthorized Punishments).—(The Judge Advocate General.)—brought up, and read the first and second time.

MR. PARNELL said, he was doubtful whether the clause would meet what he desired; and what he wished to know was, whether by the clause an officer would be prevented from punishing persons serving under the military law of England for any offence against the military law of the State in which they might be serving; if the offence was one against the military law of England and also against the military law of Egypt, whether the punishment should proceed under the English or under the Egyptian Code? His object was to prevent the recurrence of such an action on the part of a British officer as the flogging of Egyptian camel-drivers by Admiral Hewett.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there could be no doubt that an English officer could only act under the English Code. This Bill, however, dealt only with the Army, and would not cover the case of a naval or civilian officer. Admiral Hewett had acted under a civil authority; and the Bill would not, therefore, affect such circumstances.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(The Judge Advocate General.)

MR. HEALY asked whether the Government would give a Return of the number of non-commissioned officers in each regiment who were Catholics, in continuation of the Return granted to the hon. Member for Leitrim? His object was to ascertain whether Protestant non-commissioned officers had been unduly favoured in the matter of promotion.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he believed it had been the practice of his Predecessor to decline to give Returns relating to particular regiments; but if the hon. Gentleman would communicate with him, he would consider what amount of information he could furnish him with.

MR. PARNELL asked whether the Government would consider the possibility of extending the effect of the clause just added to the Bill to the Navy by an amendment of the Queen's Regulations?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he would communicate with the Admiralty upon the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

It being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn till Monday the 21st of April."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY ACT
(6 AND 7 WILL. IV., CAP. 14, SEC. 13)
—EXTRA POLICE FOR THE CITY OF CORK.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. PARNELL: Sir, I wish, before the Motion for the Adjournment of the House is carried, to direct the attention of the House, and of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to a matter which I trust, he will find time to consider during the Recess; and I trust that the result of his considerations may be that he may see his way to afford a favourable answer to the representations made to him from time to time with regard to this matter. I refer to the taxation of the City of Cork for extra police. This matter is one which has engaged the attention of several of the right hon. Gentleman's Predecessors for a number of years, and it has never been possible for us to bring it to a satisfactory issue. In fact, the laws regulating the powers of the Lord Lieutenant with regard to the quartering of extra police are in such a very unsatisfactory and confused condition that it is almost impossible to know what the law on the subject of this quartering of police in the City of Cork really is. And although the Corporation and Town Council of Cork have made several attempts to obtain a judgment in the Superior Courts of Law with regard to the legality of the tax for this extra force they have never been able to carry the matter any further than the Recorder's Court. That official had expressed, in a judgment of the day, his very grave doubt as to whether he was interpreting the law correctly, or as to whether he could determine what the state of the law really was with regard to these old enactments under which forces of extra police are quartered in any Irish counties or towns. The first Act which applies to the Irish Constabulary, is one of the 6th and 7th William IV., 14th chapter, 13th section. That Act empowered the Lord Lieutenant to declare by proclamation any city or county in a disturbed state, and thereupon he was empowered to send extra police. Section 35 of this same Act provides that the expenses of the police should, in the first instance, be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. The 37th section directs that the Inspector General, with the assistance of the Receiver, was to ascertain the cost; and in case where an extra police force was sent, he was to send to the secretary of the Grand Jury a statement of the amount which any county or city in which extra police should be quartered was liable for, and a certificate, and lay it before the Presentment Sessions, and then the under secretary should send before the Assizes another circular nearly a duplicate of the other which was sent to the secretary, and was mandatory on the Grand Jury to present for the amount. The legal effect, to which I wish to direct attention, of the extraordinary provisions of this Act of Parliament, has constituted one of the great difficulties in obtaining any real legal decision as to the legality of the action of the Irish Executive in reference to this quartering of these extra police in Cork. The effect of this was declared to be binding and conclusive, even though it was proved to be a fact that the police charged for were not in Cork at all, or even though there was a palpable overcharge. I can only compare any of these certificates to the warrants by which the right hon. Gentleman's Predecessor, the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), was empowered to issue under the Coercion Act. There can be no question whatever that the authority on which they were raised is entirely removed from the purview or jurisdiction of any Court of Law whatever. Under this first and original Act regulating the Irish Constabulary, which were a certain fixed quota, there were originally 100 men free appointed to Cork under the Act. The next Act was that of the 2nd & 3rd Vict. c. 75, and under this Act the reserve force was established. This reserve force was for the purpose of meeting contingencies which, in the Preamble of the Act, are clearly recited. The reserve force was intended to meet contingencies when the ordinary force was deemed insufficient for the maintenance of order, as in the case of elections or other temporary excitements, such as the July celebrations in the North of Ireland. The services of the reserve force were to be obtained as might be required. This reserve force was also to be available for all parts of Ireland, and they were to be maintained at the depôt in the Phoenix Park, Dublin, which is the nursery for recruiting, and training of officers. Section 6 of the same Act provides that under the order of the Lord Lieutenant the whole of this reserve force can be sent to any part of Ireland, there to remain as long as any order might be made. I should like particularly to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to that section. The importance of that section is that it clearly indicates the temporary character of the order, which was intended to be for a definite period. It was necessary that the Lord Lieutenant should state the period which this force was thus to remain away from the depôt. And yet it is a very remarkable thing that we have never been able to secure the production of that document, although the Corporation have endeavoured from time to time to obtain it. Moreover, so far as we know, that order has no existence—indeed, it is very likely that it has no existence. The order was not made by Lord Spencer, nor was it made by Lord Cowper. It was an order made many years ago when it was intended to meet a temporary emergency, and for a limited period. Cork had for a long time been in a condition of peace and good order; and he hoped the Chief Secretary would show his appreciation of this fact by withdrawing the heavy tax for extra police. The 3rd & 4th Vict. c. 128, and the 6th section, was a very important one, to which he begged to draw the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, which empowered cities to make applications with reference to the force. The Town Council of Cork, some 30 years ago, finding that 100 men were not sufficient for the police requirements of the City, voluntarily applied, in the first instance, for six extra men, in order that a police station might be established in the district of St. Luke's, one of the wealthiest portions of the City, which, up to that period, had been without police protection. By further applications that force was increased to 16 extra men, which were paid for voluntarily and without any grumbling, and the total force of the City remained for a considerable time at 116 men. When the Fenian period came, Cork being, from its geographical situation, the nearest port of call on the way between America and Liverpool, it was found necessary by the Government of the day—not for the purpose of checking violent disorders in the City, but solely as a matter of precaution, and for the purpose of protecting Irish-Americans and others who landed in Cork from America—to send an extra force of Constabulary to be stationed at Cork. This was done by one of the several Constabulary Acts passed from time to time to enable the Lord Lieutenant to distribute the Constabulary in Ireland; but these were free. The force was raised from 116 to 150, and it was still a free force, the Government being satisfied that it was owing, as I have explained, to the geographical position of the City of Cork, and not to any local causes, that the additional force was requisite. Up to 1866 the force was increased to 200 men and retained in the City, and in 1866 it was still a free force—the force of 200 men. In April, 1866, a letter was received from the Chief Secretary, in which it was stated that the time had arrived when it was necessary that the extra police of the City should be reduced, and only such number retained as the Town Council should decide upon in accordance with the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 108. The Council, having considered the application fully, arrived at the conclusion that, for all practical and legal purposes coming within the purview of police duties in the City of Cork, 16 extra men added to the 153 men were ample; and, in fact, that the number of 16 extra police were necessary, and they instructed the Mayor to make that representation to the Lord Lieutenant; and that if, in the opinion of the authorities, there would be no reduction made in the force, the Council should not be asked to pay anything in respect thereof. No further action was taken in compelling the Corporation until 1879, when the Chief Secretary (Mr. Chichester Fortescue, now Lord Carlingford) wrote stating that the Council should make formal application, under the 3rd and 4th Vict. c. 108, for 50 extra men, so that the permanent force might be made up to 200. If they did not do this, Mr. Fortescue said he was directed by the Lord Lieutenant to inform the Council that an extra force of 50 men was necessary for Cork, and a moiety of the charge was to be defrayed by the City. This was the first real attempt made by the Castle to compel the City of Cork to pay for an extra police force; and it was a long time after the Fenian outbreak, and when the City had resumed its normal aspect of orderly quiet. The object sought by this letter was to endeavour to coerce the Corporation of Cork to follow the example of the Corporation of Belfast. The Corporation of Belfast had placed themselves under the provisions of an Act which enabled them, practically speaking, to levy their own police force. That police force, however, was not under the local authorities, and the Corporation of Cork declined to follow the example in question. After some controversy, it was decided by the authorities that the entire extra men should not exceed 50—that is, 16 men which the Council had originally applied for, and 34 fresh extra men, which, by the Lord Lieutenant's order, were directed to remain in Cork. The Council of Cork, Mr. Speaker, have ever since remonstrated, and are continually remonstrating, against this extra force of 34 men. They have disputed the payment from time to time. They have endeavoured to seek relief from the Courts of Law; but, owing to the state of confusion in which the Act regulating the powers of the Lord Lieutenant regarding the importing of extra police, it has been found impossible to bring any case before any of the Superior Courts. The Corporation have in vain remonstrated against what they believed to be the absolute illegality of the conduct of successive Lord Lieutenants in this matter in abusing an Act of Parliament, which clearly was never intended to give an authority for such a police force in the City. This state of affairs continued up to 1881, when the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) became Chief Secretary. He, in alluding to the subject, suggested that the Council should consider the precedent of Belfast and do likewise. But as the Town Council still continued to refuse to adopt the suggestion, the extra force of men was increased from 50 to 70, I suppose as a sort of punishment for declining to be as amenable as the Corporation of Belfast. In 1879 the Under Secretary again wrote to the Council on the subject of the extra police, which at that date was reduced to 30, calling their attention to the fact that the reserve force was short of its strength by reason of 30 men being still retained in Cork, that his Excellency could not see his way to remove them, and he again recommended them to make a formal application with the view to their reduction. You will observe in all these proceedings the central executive authority in Ireland has been exceedingly anxious to get an application from the Corporation of Cork to get some endorsement of this illegal quartering; but although these attempts have been going on for a very long series of years, when the power of election to Town Councils in Ireland was not as it is now, but very much in the hands of wire-pullers and local magistrates, still they have never in one single instance obtained from the Town Council the slightest endorsement, direct or indirect, of this most illegal levy. Well, Sir, a case was prepared by the legal advisers of the Town Council, and it was argued before the Recorder in November, 1882, not two years ago. The result was that on technical grounds, entirely apart from the merits of the case, the Recorder held that, as a matter of fact, a certificate, countersigned by the Under Secretary, was conclusive as to the amount. He could not go behind it. Now, Sir, I think the judgment of the Recorder is a very important one. It was the highest judicial decision that it was possible for the Corporation to obtain. They applied, during the progress of the case, to the Recorder, and asked him to state a case for the Queen's Bench; but that was resisted by the legal representative of the Crown Solicitor, and the Recorder held that he had no power to do it. I would wish to direct the particular attention of the House to the judgment of the Recorder. His worship said—

"I have been trying to guide my blind footsteps through the labyrinth of police legislation, with the aid of Mr. McCarthy, whom I may call a legal Ariadne; but I must say that, after an argument lasting more than a day, I am not at all satisfied on the point under consideration, because, since the time of William the Fourth, the Legislature have been passing Act after Act,—amending Acts, repealing Acts, explanatory Acts, and contradictory Acts—and really it is monstrous that nothing has been done to consolidate those Constabulary Acts. The Constabulary are a most important force in the country. It would, therefore, be most desirable if some plain legislation were produced which would enable us to know where they are, what they are, what they ought to be, and what are their laws. Now, it appears to me that, beginning with the Act 6 & 7 Will. IV., and comparing it with the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 17—that, upon the whole, the Inspector General, with the concurrence of the Lord Lieutenant, has the right, in addition to the 100 men allotted to the City of Cork, to distribute the force as he pleases without any restriction; but I am not at all certain that I am right in that construction of the law. But I am bound by this certificate, and if the Corporation require an alteration in the law, which, in my opinion, is demanded, they should send Mr. Lawrence to Parliament. Mr. Lawrence was the legal gentleman engaged, and let him vindicate their case there as he has done here. I do think that under the circumstances I am bound by this certificate, and I cannot get out of it. The Corporation ought to take the course I have suggested. I, for one, would be very glad to see Mr. Lawrence in Parliament, where his great abilities would help to bring Irish Members to rational, reasonable, and sound views."

This learned Judge does not recommend an appeal to the Superior Courts—in fact, he would not state a case for the Superior Courts, because he said he could not. All the relief he could give the unfortunate ratepayers of Cork was a sort of extra-judicial advice, which does not appear to have been acted upon up to the present, to send this legal gentleman to Parliament, where their case might be brought forward for review by the highest Court in the land. Well, Sir, I bring the case forward to-night, and I say it is a monstrous state of affairs that under a variety of enactments, which are, according to the Recorder of Cork, self-contradictory and impossible to be understood, which permit of no appeal, which simply rely upon the existence of a written piece of paper, purporting to bear the signature of the Chief or Under Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, that it should be possible to saddle the ratepayers of an industrious and peaceful city with such a monstrous charge as that without any remedy. Cork has now been charged for extra police for a period of 30 years, commencing with the year 1855, when the Corporation voluntarily agreed to pay a yearly sum of £175 in respect of an extra force of five men. The sum paid in 1881, which was the last year in which payment was made, the Town Council having refused to pay the amount since then, was as high as £1,025. The total extra force in Cork amounts to 180 men. Now, I wish to compare this total of 180 men, which is the ordinary police force, plus the extra force, with that of the other towns, and with the number of policemen to the population in other towns. The number 180 makes 23 policemen for every 10,000 of the population of the City of Cork in September, 1881. In Derry the Returns showed that there were, for the same year, 30 men for every 10,000 inhabitants—that is, an increase of 7 per 1,000, or nearly one-fourth as many more as in Cork. In Waterford the number was from 27 to 29 for every 10,000 of the population; but the House will bear in mind that in the two cases I have mentioned—the cases of Derry and Waterford—there was not an extra police force, and there was, consequently, no extra police tax. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Walker) dissented.] The hon. and learned Solicitor General shakes his head; but I am quoting from very accurate information, which I have reason to believe is absolutely correct. The authorities, in fact, provided 30 for every 10,000 of the population in Derry—I am not speaking of the occasional bringing in of men for particular occasions like the celebration of the shutting of the gates—and in Waterford they provided for every 10,000 of the population 27 men, whereas in Cork they only provide for every 10,000 of the population 20 men; for that 20 men they charge one-fourth, or about five men as an extra force—thus reducing the free force of Cork by one-fifth of these men. In other words, the cities of Derry and Waterford have a considerably larger free police force than Cork, counting the extra police force for which they pay. If there is one city in Ireland which deserves from the Government more consideration than another, entirely apart from its peaceful condition, it is the City of Cork. It is the chief inlet and outlet for the vast passenger traffic of the Atlantic steamers, and also for the passenger traffic from Munster to England. It has more police force thrown upon it in respect to offences of a local origin than all the other Irish ports, excluding Dublin and Belfast, put together. In this respect the City of Cork does the work of the Empire. I find that, excluding Dublin, but not Belfast, Cork has now 1-16th the population of Ireland. The distributive Constabulary Force, including Belfast, taken on the average of 1880-1, which is less than that of 1882-3, and divided by 60, would give a free force of over 170 for Cork. The other day I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he could hold out any hope that this extra police force would be removed. The right hon. Gentleman replied that he had consulted the Bench of Magistrates and the local authorities, and that they were of opinion that the present force was not more than sufficient for the preservation of the peace of the City. I should be very glad to know what Bench of Magistrates or what local authorities the right hon. Gentleman had consulted. After the best local inquiry I have been able to make, I do not find that a single independent magistrate, and by “independent” I mean magistrates not directly subject to, and in the pay of the Government, was consulted. I find that the Mayor and Town Council were not consulted. I find that no meeting of magistrates was held in reference to this matter, and that no recommendation opposed to the removal of the extra police force has proceeded from any public body. I am at a loss to know what Bench of Magistrates the right hon. Gentleman consulted, and what authorities. If he consulted magistrates and authorities they must have been very few. They must have been persons interested in maintaining the present position of affairs in order that they might retain their swollen and exorbitant salaries. When the right hon. Gentleman's reply was reported in the newspapers, the Corporation of Cork met and passed a resolution unanimously declaring that if the so-called extra police force were continued in the City, it should be placed permanently on the ordinary free establishment, which, even with the increase, would be very little, if anything, in excess of the quota the City should receive on the ground of population, and emphatically claiming exceptional consideration in this matter on account of the peaceable state of the City. Notwithstanding all this, they found that the Government, so far from treating Cork like Derry and Waterford, gave that City a smaller free force, and placed a heavy impost on her by this levy of extra men. Many thousand pounds have been paid by the citizens since the establishment of this force, and since there is no possibility for them of redress from the law; since they are prohibited from asking the intervention of the Superior Courts, and since the only magistrate whom they have been able to approach has declared his opinion that it is impossible for him to understand what the state of the law is, or, if he did understand it, to decide the case upon its merits, the citizens have come to the conclusion, and I think they are right, that they will not pay this tax unless it is dragged out of them. Cork has been exceptionally peaceful during the whole of the Land League agitation. There have been no outrages of any description. I say exceptionally peaceful as compared with the rest of Ireland, because Cork has been always peaceful. We have been told by Government officials that inflicting fines for extra police is of the greatest importance to deter districts from crime or disturbance; but there has been no crime in Cork, not even any disturbance. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman, with his traditions and history, would have seized this occasion for showing the appreciation by the Government of the peaceful and quiet City of Cork. Instead of that, for purposes which are inscrutable to us, the Government insist upon maintaining this heavy taxation. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will carefully consider this matter during the Recess, which I trust he will very much enjoy, and that he will be able to announce to the House on his return that the Government see their way to remove the extra force from Cork, or to leave it there as portion of the permanent free force. When the Exhibition was held the Exhibition Committee had to pay, in addition to the extra police, for every policeman on duty within the walls of the Exhibition. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will see I have made out a reasonable and fair case, and that it is an instance in which he ought to exercise his own judgment and authority, and not be guided by the biased opinions and interested motives of subordinates.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he would not follow the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) very deeply into legal questions, nor, indeed, did he gather that Her Majesty's Government had done more than state the extreme perplexity in which the Corporation of Cork found themselves with regard to the various Constabulary Acts; but he was bound to say that to qualify the Constabulary Acts according to the suggestions of the hon. Gentleman and those who sat beside him was a thing which the Government could only do as a last resource. He should not enter into the legal right of the Government to exact what they had for a good while partially exacted, and what, at the present moment, they were endeavouring to exact with not quite equal success. These legal matters were, in his opinion, outside the purview of the House until they had been brought to the consideration of the highest tribunal to which they could go; and he did not agree with the hon. Member in holding that there were no means of taking the question before a higher tribunal. He concluded, if the decision of the Recorder was not a sound decision, it could not be enforced by mandamus from the higher Court, and that in that way, if no other, the case could be brought to appeal. As regarded the treatment of Cork in the matter of extra police, as compared with other towns, he thought that the hon. Member had been somewhat misled by a very natural predilection for that City, with which his name was so thoroughly identified. The hon. Member said if there was one city in Ireland which deserved more consideration than another it was Cork. From that dictum he (Mr. Trevelyan) should be very unwilling to dissent. But he must go further, and say that there was no great city in Ireland, or, for that matter, in England or Scotland, which, on the point of paying for its police, had received such treatment as the City of Cork. He did not say that that decided the question; but it was a proposition he was ready to support. The hon. Gentleman, not having access to that official information which was at once at his (Mr. Trevelyan's) command, had a little erred in comparing Cork with other Irish towns and cities, especially with reference to Londonderry. He thought he heard him say that it had to pay for no extra police.

MR. PARNELL: I was speaking of the free establishment.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would come to that afterwards. Limerick paid a sum less, indeed, than Cork, but still a very tangible sum, £340 or £350 a-year for extra police, and Londonderry paid £1,550 a-year. What was the sum which Cork paid for extra police?

MR. PARNELL: Londonderry has a very much larger free force. I gather that the right hon. Gentleman does not dispute the accuracy of the proportional figures I gave regarding the free force in Londonderry.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was not at all inclined to dispute the figures which he had heard. What he desired to say was that Limerick and Londonderry, in proportion to the population, was very much heavier taxed than Cork. It was quite true now that in Kilkenny, Galway, and Drogheda there was a much larger free force; but he found that in Londonderry the free force only numbered 10 in every 10,000, in Belfast only 17, and in Carrickfergus only 10, the average of the Irish towns being 16. Cork, therefore, was not excessively, although sensibly, above the charge made on other Irish towns; and, comparing Cork with English towns, he thought it would be found that for a population of 80,000, £1,100 a-year was a very small charge to make.

AN HON. MEMBER: But the local authorities have charge of the force.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would come to that. He might say that he was not now referring to the mere extra police lately stationed in Cork. Now, he would like, first of all, to compare the extra police force in Cork with that in other Irish towns. In Belfast the extra police cost £11,000 a-year, or 10 times more than Cork. Londonderry paid £1,600 a-year on a smaller population. Londonderry, in fact, paid 5*d.* in the pound for police, Belfast 4½*d.* in the pound, and Cork only 1*d.* in the pound. Taking for comparison an English town of nearly the same size as Cork—namely, Wolverhampton, which had a population of 75,700, whereas Cork had one of 80,000, he found that the Government contribution for police at Wolverhampton was £3,000 a-year, while £3,600 a-year was paid from the local rates—a great deal more than Cork had been paying for many years past. In Northampton again, with a population of 50,000, £2,846 a-year was paid for police; while Birmingham, with five times the population of Cork, paid 25 times as much for its police as the citizens of Cork had done during the last 10 years. However, he quite agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) that paying money against the grain, and for a service that was not asked, was not a very pleasant thing. He knew that many historical non-payments were for small sums of money; but the question was—Was the City of Cork over-policed? Were they paying the moderate sum of 1*d.* in the pound on their valuation for police that they did not want? In April, 1871, when this question was discussed, a resolution was passed by the county magistrates, stating that they could not recommend any reduction in the police force of the City of Cork; and in the following August a resolution was passed by the Mayor and magistrates of the City of Cork expressing their opinion that the force of the City could not safely be reduced. Then there came a correspondence in which the Government wished to have the extra police paid for by the Corporation of Cork; and the Corporation, on the other hand, wished to keep the extra police, but at the charge of the public Exchequer. On the 10th of January, 1880, a resolution was passed unanimously by the Mayor and magistrates that the force should not be less than 180; and at the latest period, as far as he knew, at which the opinion of the Mayor and Corporation was authoritatively declared, it was their opinion that the present force—he did not speak of nine detectives—was the least that could keep the peace of the town, but that it should be paid for entirely by the Exchequer. He thought it was little to demand of a flourishing City like Cork, which had been characterized by the hon. Member, in not overstrained words, as one of the gates of the Empire, that if it was to have the full amount of police which its elected authorities considered necessary for its safety and good order, it should pay 1*d.* in the pound, when the cities and towns of England frequently paid 10*d.* or 1*s.* Nevertheless, he allowed that it was the duty of the Government to communicate with the Corporation of Cork and ascertain what their real wishes were. He was not at all sure that if the town were perfectly satisfied with the free force as it at present stood, whether the police of Cork should not be reduced to that free force; but that the free force should be increased was a proposition to which, until they came again to the quintennial period of revision, he could not for a moment assent. He was such a lover of self-government that he should be very glad if the responsibility of the ordinary police of Cork was placed to the greatest possible extent upon the elected Municipality of Cork; and if he found on careful inquiry that there was no real danger to the peace of the City, he should be very glad to see the force reduced by the greatest possible amount. With regard to what was required for the detection of special crime, he should be allowed to say that the immense advantages of Cork as one of the gates of the Empire imposed upon it the same duty which would be imposed on Liverpool of seeing that the gate was safely guarded; and he would promise the hon. Member very carefully to inquire into the matter, and if the stipendiary authorities could make out with the elected authorities, and should come to the conclusion that the mere peace of the City could be preserved with a smaller force than were now allotted to preserve it, he, for one, would be very glad to endorse that conclusion.

MR. GRAY said, it was to be regretted that the right hon. Gentleman did not give them the benefit of his very elaborate and exceedingly laborious calculations with regard to the respective police forces of England and Ireland, though he confessed he (Mr. Gray) did not see the applicability of the comparison. The right hon. Gentleman had compared the cost of the police in Cork with the cost in other Irish towns, and then with certain English towns. Now, no such comparison was possible. The police in Ireland were a Governmental force, maintained for Governmental purposes, and in the Irish Municipalities that police force discharged hardly any of the many duties discharged by the police force in English and Scotch Municipalities. What the Chief Secretary seemed to think was, that the Irish towns should be satisfied to pay a police force over which they had no control, because English Municipalities, which had the control and management of the force for their own purposes, did so. Well, happening to have some knowledge of the working of local authority in Dublin, he should say that Cork was comparatively well off in having only to pay 1*d.* in the pound for its extra police force. In Dublin they had to pay 14*d.* in the pound for a police force over which they had not the slightest control. He was very glad to hear the Chief Secretary's declaration of principle over this matter, although he did not give any indication of a practical proposition of reform. One of the worst ways in which the present police system militated against the communities in Ireland was the enormous injury it inflicted on the country in the matter of public health. Now, the death rate was higher in Dublin than in many of the English towns. In Dublin, if they wanted to use a policeman as a sanitary officer, they first of all had to pay 14*d.* for him, in supporting the ordinary police of the City, and then the Government came and demanded £120, or £140, for his services as sanitary officer. The result was that the sanitary condition of the City was deplorable, and it must remain deplorable, as long as this system of Governmental control, as distinct from local control, was exercised. This was only one more example of how a vicious system of centralization permeated the whole working of the social organization down to the smallest detail, and poisoned the administration to an extent which was not dreamt of by hon. Gentlemen on the other side. Very likely they thought that the question of the control of the police in Ireland was merely connected with the maintenance of what they were pleased to call law and order. It had to do with a great many things besides that—as, for instance, maintenance of health and the preservation of life. Another means by which the control of the police operated most injuriously in regard to the public had reference to the most helpless class of the community. In Dublin the Government insisted, in spite of repeated remonstrances, and he believed of recommendations by a Royal Commission and of a Committee appointed by themselves, in placing an extremely onerous and oppressive tax upon the pawnbrokers of the City. He believed it amounted to over £100 a-year for each pawnbroker's licence. This was a portion of the indirect revenue which the Government received and devoted to a police maintained for purely Imperial purposes. Pawnbrokers taxed in this way were obliged, in order to recoup themselves, to tax their customers; and thus the Government in Dublin levied a most cruel tax upon the poorest of the poor for the purpose of maintaining a system which even the Chief Secretary objected to, and would like to see abolished. He hoped that during the Recess, the contemplation of which had put the right hon. Gentleman in an extremely good humour, probably because he would be free for eight or ten days from having to answer any more Questions, he would give the matter his consideration. It would be something, perhaps, for him to look back upon if he could say when he quitted Office that he had reformed in Ireland an exceedingly vicious system, which he (Mr. Gray) could assure him from personal knowledge worked most detrimentally against all classes. He very much doubted whether, under the reform system which the Home Secretary contemplated introducing for the Metropolis, or in any Municipality of the United Kingdom, he would find that any community would tamely submit to this tax, amounting directly and indirectly to 14*d.* in the pound, for a force maintained largely for Imperial purposes, and over which the local representative body had no kind of control.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that the burden of local taxation, of whatever nature in Ireland, was most keenly felt, because the sum of Imperial taxation in Ireland, as compared with England, was rateably something more than double, having regard to the means of each. He charged it upon the conscience of the House and upon the British Legislature that the system of taxes devised by the Imperial Parliament for Imperial purposes was, in its exaction, doubly greater in proportion to the means of the inhabitants in Ireland than in England; yet it was the habit to discuss questions like that before them as if taxation was generally equal in both.

MR. DEASY said, the Chief Secretary seemed to have come to the conclusion that it was desirable, in the present state of affairs in Ireland, to consult with the local representatives, and to take counsel with them as to the future course which he would pursue in regard to the extra police force. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would carry out that principle; and he could assure him, from personal knowledge of the City of Cork, that it would treat him fairly, and expect nothing from him that was impossible. There was no Municipal Body more desirous of maintaining the peace of its City than the Corporation of Cork. The right hon. Gentleman must recollect that from 1871 down to 1884, the Corporation of Cork had been unanimously of opinion that the maintenance of this extra force in the City was altogether unnecessary. In 1871, it was true, they petitioned the Lord Lieutenant not to withdraw the extra force; but the circumstances of the time were peculiar. Ever since then they had been desirous that it should be withdrawn, and over and over again had passed resolutions calling upon the Lord Lieutenant either to withdraw it or to charge it to the State. If the Lord Lieutenant desired to maintain the force, it would be unfair to the City that the ratepayers should be charged with the maintenance of this extra force. There was a very strong suspicion in Cork that these extra police had of late years been drafted into outlying districts to attend National League meetings, and that they had not only been charged to Cork, but to the districts to which they had been drafted. He was strongly of that opinion himself, and until the Chief Secretary contradicted it he would continue to hold it. The right hon. Gentleman had contrasted the small amount which they paid in Cork with the amount paid in certain English towns. The ratepayers of Cork would not object to pay 1*d.* or even 6*d.* in the pound for the maintenance of a police force in Cork, provided that they had control over that force; but what they objected to was taxation without representation. If the right hon. Gentleman would advise the Government to place the police force under the control of the Corporation, he (Mr. Deasy) had no doubt that they would be willing to bear the entire cost. Not only that, but they would be able to keep the peace quite as well as it was kept now. From time to time the Corporation had felt very great difficulty in compelling these men to do the duty. Even in the streets the police would not regulate the car drivers or regulate the traffic. The force was a source of constant annoyance in their midst; and he was convinced that if they did not give some value for the money paid for their maintenance, the people of Cork would find them some work to do.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that the extra police tax in the City of Cork was only a very small proportion of the grievance that pressed upon the people of Ireland. In a great many districts where the people had been unable to undertake an expensive litigation they had been driven to take the law in this matter into their own hands, for outside the City of Cork, in the various districts of the County of Cork, in Limerick, in Clare, in Galway, in Kerry, the people were universally refusing both to pay the extra police tax and the blood tax; and he thought he must say that the Government up to the present, as the right hon. Gentleman had almost admitted in his speech, had not exhibited any very great energy or conspicuous success in collecting it.

MR. TREVELYAN: I deny that. That is a very important matter. I quite deny that I have said anything to-night which would imply that the Government are not exhibiting all the energy that they possibly can. As far as my attempts are concerned, I must say that the Government are determined to stand by their rights in this matter.

MR. O'BRIEN observed that the right hon. Gentleman knew his own mind best. He (Mr. O'Brien) only spoke of the fact, and it was rather curious that the neighbourhoods where the police had been withdrawn were the neighbourhoods where the people had recognized that there was a very easy way of standing up against these proposals. In one of the districts within the jurisdiction of Captain Plunkett a system of vengeance against the people was pursued in the collection of these taxes. A large farmer named John Daly refused to pay except under compulsion, and Kavanagh, a policeman, came on his farm with a warrant for 11s. 7½d., and seized a valuable horse which was engaged in the work of ploughing at a very critical time of the year. Mr. Daly, his son, and the parish priest were ready to declare that the policeman was offered his choice of a large collection of cattle, sheep, and pigs, which were on the farm at the time; but his reply was that his instructions were to seize a horse from the plough, and he did so. The policeman afterwards denied that he made that statement. They always denied it, and equally, of course, he was believed by the Castle authorities. The horse, which was worth £40, was knocked down for £5, and the owner protested against the sacrifice of a valuable animal. The policeman knew he had landed himself in a serious legal difficulty; but he also knew the Government would support him in his illegality. The owner had served notice of action for wrongful seizure, and the authorities had boldly declared that the Government would defend that action at the public expense. Did the House think that was the way to maintain respect for the law in Ireland? If the police went on perpetrating outrages of this kind in vengeance for the protests of the people against these odious taxes the collection of those taxes would not become easier, and the item for law charges would have to be considerably swelled next year to pay the costs of the proceedings, for it was likely that Irish juries would have an opportunity of assessing the damages against the policemen—juries whom the Crown officials could not manipulate or pack. He wished they could have, as to this and other districts, some definite statement as to whether or not Ireland was in a peaceable condition. It was impossible to tell, from the statements of the Chief Secretary, what was the condition of Ireland. At one time he spoke as though the country had been in a blessed state of tranquillity since Lord Spencer and he went there. At another he would say Captain Plunkett and his extra policemen were necessary to keep down the disturbance. The fact was the English Minister in Ireland were the slaves of the officials whom they appointed. Even in the case of Mr. George Bolton they were obliged to shut their eyes to his frauds on his creditors and his wife, because it was difficult to get another person to do what he did. It was the same with Captain Plunkett and those who were responsible for the extra police. The Chief Secretary and the Solicitor General for Ireland got their briefs and made the best of them, and very contradictory the briefs were. One night they represented Captain Plunkett's district as free from crime, in order to show that Captain Plunkett had accomplished something for his money; the next they had to prove that the same district was in a dangerous state of disturbance lest his services should be dispensed with altogether. The Chief Secretary had claimed some glory for the pacification of Ireland, with which he believed he had no more to do than the fly on the wheel had with the dust which was raised. But be that as it might, if that pacification was to continue, he would advise him to shake off those military adventurers and disturbers, men who, wherever they went, in Cork like Captain Plunkett, or in Cairo like Mr. Clifford Lloyd, did nothing but make the name of England detested and detestable.

MR. SEXTON said, that the Chief Secretary had boasted of having information which was inaccessible to others. He said nothing, however, to warrant the boast, nothing to justify the presence of the extra police, beyond the opinion of half-a-score of county magistrates. He was glad the Chief Secretary had at last seen his way to consult the Cork Corporation. His promise in that respect was a sign of a hopeful departure. Not more than two months ago, in the debate on the Address on the Queen's Speech, the Chief Secretary said the condition of crime in Ireland was such as could not be discreditable to the most peaceful country in the world. In January last, leaving out threatening letters, there were only one offence against the person, two aggravated assaults, 11 offences against property. In February, there were one fire, two aggravated assaults, and four or five offences against property. He would ask for an assurance that there should be no repetition of the course pursued by the Sub-Land Commission, and afterwards on appeal by the Chief Land Commission in the case of a servant of Sir Richard Wallace's at Lisburn. This tenant, having purchased all the improvements on his holding five years ago, had actually had his rent increased. The case had aroused deep resentment throughout Ulster.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the manner in which the six Orange murderers of an unoffending Nationalist in Cavan, one Philip Maguire, had been discharged. The evidence against those men was more conclusive than it was against Hynes, Walsh, or Myles Joyce; but only one of the Dublin jury who tried the case was challenged, and he, of course, was a Catholic. The Government had been carrying on a very extraordinary series of tactics in support of what was called law and order in Ireland. Could Government justify procedure of this kind? How could the Government justify such scenes as tainted the Court House in Green Street? How would Government like, since they refused to punish Orangemen, if the people were to adopt some Texan system of justice? What would they do if they formed Vigilance Committees, as had been suggested in The Evening Mail in the case of landlords? He would only say that if Philip Maguire were a brother of his, and his murderers were let loose to prey about the country, he would undertake to insure that they would not do such a thing a second time. He asked the Government to be warned in time in this matter. They were proving, by the light sentences which had been inflicted on the two or three Orangemen punished, and their connivance at the escape of others, that the whole prosecutions were a farce. The scoundrel Mathews, who was the first to issue a murderous placard against what had been called the Parnellite invasion of Tyrone, and then tried to roast alive a family by setting fire to a Land League hut with paraffin oil, was only sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, and his two confederates to only three months each. Mr. Doherty, who was brought from Derry to Sligo to be tried for having fired a fusillade from the roof of the Town Hall on the Lord Mayor of Dublin, found that his trembling limbs refused to bear him to the Court House to stand his trial, got an adjournment for months, and then was only sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment. On the other hand, the young men who had been dragged from Mayo to Cork had been sentenced to years of penal servitude. Of Lord Ardilaun's bailiffs, who shot two unfortunate men who left their boat to seek on the shore a twig to make a rowlock for the boat, one who pleaded guilty got off, and by some trick of the law, which he would not call a nolle prosequi, the other got off by the payment of £50 or £60. The system of the Government was simply a conspiracy for the protection of criminals and murderers of one particular class. It was not justice, but vindictiveness, upon the one hand, and partiality on the other, and even these sentences they had no guarantee would be carried out. The scoundrel Hastings, who published a paper abusing Nationalists, for a scandalous libel got six months' imprisonment, was released after two months, on the ground of ill-health. Had Mr. Harrington been released on the ground of ill-health? When he (Mr. Healy) got four months' imprisonment, he did not get ill, nor would he have got ill had he got four years of it. He had no doubt, however, that, if he had been some person acquainted with Earl Spencer, it would have been alleged that he had disease of the "mastoid process," and some convenient doctor's certificate have been procured. He wondered that the Government carried on this game, and that respectable Englishmen would not be ashamed to support such conduct; yet it would be defended, if necessary, by the Chief Secretary, upon the Treasury Bench, for £2,500 a-year and coals. He would ask the Government, could they expect reasonable men to look upon this system otherwise than with horror? He could show that whilst one class of men were released from prison, another class were tortured to death. He had the report of a debate which he had raised on the 21st August last with reference to the unfortunate persons charged with the Crossmaglen conspiracy, who had been sentenced to long periods of penal servitude—aye, and these poor men were a great deal more innocent of having caused effusion of blood than some of Her Majesty's Ministers. One of them was now lying in his cold grave in Glasnevin, and it was better for him than to be as the others, wasting their lives away in the convict cells of some English prison. On the 21st of August he had told the Government that poor Patrick Waters, a boy of 18, was dying. He had told them at the time that they had released another man—Bernard Smith—belonging to the same batch of prisoners. He (Mr. Healy) observed that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was receiving with a smile his statement as to this young man's death. The right hon. Gentleman might laugh; it well became his callousness.

MR. TREVELYAN: It is an absolute falsehood to say that I laughed at the death of that young man. [Cheers, and cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) has reached such a high level of violence throughout the whole of his speech, that I feel bound to interfere. He has made charges of the most reckless description. He has charged Her Majesty's Government in language exceeding anything I have heard in this House. He has charged them with conniving at murder; and he has made a statement with reference to the Chief Secretary for Ireland which was couched in language which I conceive ought not to be used by one Member of this House to another. I can only warn the hon. Member that if this language is continued I shall resort to those powers with which the House has invested me to prevent what I consider a public scandal.

MR. HEALY: When you rose, Mr. Speaker—

MR. GRAY: On the point of Order, Mr. Speaker—

MR. HARRINGTON: I rise to Order—

MR. HEALY: I thought when you rose, Mr. Speaker, you rose for the purpose of drawing the attention of the House to the charge of falsehood made against me by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. [Loud cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to enter into an argument with the Chair. I have simply done what is my duty.

MR. HEALY: I rise to Order. If I am not entitled to enter into an argument with the Chair, I am entitled to submit to you, Sir, a point of Order. In the course of my speech the Chief Secretary interrupted me by stating that what I had said was an absolute falsehood. You, Sir, at that moment rose, and I was under the impression, naturally enough, that you rose for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was not entitled to use the words "absolute falsehood" towards another Member of this House. Perhaps you may have overlooked the statement of the Chief Secretary; but I wish to ask you, Sir, as a point of Order, whether, if I am not entitled to use the language you have condemned, the right hon. Gentleman is entitled to address to me a statement that my statement was an absolute falsehood?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I rise, Sir, upon the point of Order. [Cries of "Order!"] On that point of Order, I wish to state that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary was engaged in a private conversation with me.

MR. HEALY: That is not a point of Order. ["Chair, Ohair!"]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): My right hon. Friend was smiling at something in our conversation—[Cries of "The point of Order!"—and without knowing what the subject of our conversation was the hon. Member for Monaghan alleged that the smiling of my right hon. Friend was a smile of approval that an innocent man had been murdered. [Loud cries of "No, no!"] The hon. Member stated that my right hon. Friend laughed at an innocent man being murdered.

MR. O'BRIEN: I rise, Sir, on a point of Order. My hon. Friend has asked for your ruling, and is he not entitled to your ruling on a point of Order which he has raised without hearing a speech from the Attorney General? My hon. Friend was stating that an unfortunate young man in a delicate state of health was detained in prison until he died, while another man charged with the same offence was allowed to go free. Upon that the right hon. Gentleman rose and said the statement was absolutely false. We now wish to know from you if that statement was in Order? [Ministerial cries of "Sit down!" and "Order!"]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): I am speaking to a point of Order. When my right hon. Friend smiled—["Order!"]

MR. HEALY: What is your point of Order?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): Upon the point of Order, Sir, I ask your protection and permission to address the House.

MR. O'BRIEN, who was received with loud cries of "Order!" and "Sit down!"—I rise to Order. I ask for your ruling, Sir, on the point which has been raised.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): When my right hon. Friend was entering into a private conversation with me he smiled; but that smile had no reference to this debate, but to something I said. Seeing a smile on his countenance, the hon. Member for Monaghan at once charged him with a smile of approval of the fact that an innocent man had been murdered. [Cries of "No!"] Under these circumstances my right hon. Friend sprang to his feet with a natural impulse, and did state that that was untrue in the language that the House heard. It is in these circumstances that I ask you whether he has done wrong?

MR. HEALY: Where is your point of Order? Where is your point of Order? Mr. Speaker—I rise to Order. You have allowed—

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member proceeds in this disorderly manner I shall be obliged to Name him.

MR. TREVELYAN: I admit, Sir, that I used a very strong word just now, and in consequence of that I think I am entitled to give an explanation. The hon. Member for Monaghan charged me—[Loud cries of "Order!" from the Irish Members.]

MR. SEXTON: I rise to Order. [Loud cries of "Order!" from the Ministerial Benches.]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Chief Secretary for Ireland is in possession of the House.

MR. TREVELYAN: I said I used a very strong word just now, and in consequence I contend that, like every Member who has done something which is very exceptional, I ought to have an opportunity of explaining it, and, perhaps hon. Members will find, of excusing myself to the House. I am willing to use the hon. Member's own words, whatever they may be, that I was smiling at the death of—whatever the words were—

MR. HEALY: I will supply you with them.

MR. TREVELYAN: I will take them from you.

MR. HEALY: Perhaps I had better explain it. I was referring to a young man in prison, and in the course of my statement for upwards of half a minute I naturally supposed that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was attending to my remarks and observations on a subject affecting his Department. I observed him smiling. I was stating that this young man had died in gaol, and I saw the Chief Secretary receive this statement, as I thought, with a continuous ripple of laughter. I was saying that Bernard Smith was released from prison because he was spitting blood, and that Michael Waters had died in prison, and was now lying in his grave at Glasnevin. Seeing the Chief Secretary smiling, I assumed that he was smiling at the death of that innocent man; and the Chief Secretary, putting a construction upon my language, said that that statement was an absolute falsehood.

MR. TREVELYAN: I have used the exact words. It came to this really. The hon. Member said I was smiling at the death of an innocent man. Hon. Members heard the sentences uttered by the hon. Member. It is not possible that a Member could be in a smiling mood who was so addressed by a brother Member of the House of Commons. In these circumstances, when I was deeply moved already, the hon. Member makes this extremely strong statement. That statement of the hon. Member that I was smiling at the announcement he made I beg emphatically to deny as a fact; and I do not think the hon. Member himself believes that I was smiling at what he said.

MR. HEALY: If you deny it, certainly not.

MR. TREVELYAN: In these circumstances, I withdraw the words, because the hon. Member made the statement under an impression as to the truth of which he accepts my denial. I put myself in a false position under what I cannot but think was great provocation by using an un-Parliamentary expression, and I regret it.

MR. HEALY: Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg to ask your ruling as to whether the statement of the Chief Secretary was in Order or not? I have respectfully urged you to give your ruling, and you have not deigned to do so. ["Order, order!"] You have ruled when you were not called upon—["Order, order?"]—with regard to my general language; and now I wish to ask whether the Chief Secretary was in order in using the language that he did?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the Chief Secretary for Ireland has withdrawn the expression he used on the understanding that the hon. Member withdraws the expression he used also. [Cries of "Rule!"] I did express myself, not, I think, too strongly in terms of strong reprobation of the course which had been pursued during several minutes by the hon. Member. I thought the language he made use of exceeded in violence anything I have heard while I have been in the Chair, and demanded the reprobation of the Chair, and I took upon myself to warn the hon. Member, in moderate terms, that if language of this kind was repeated I should be obliged to take serious notice of it, and to exercise those powers with which I am vested. I shall not take any further notice of the matter; I regard the point of Order as settled.

MR. HEALY: I am glad you have settled the point of Order to your own satisfaction. [Cries of "Order!" and "Name him!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The language of the hon. Member is not respectful to the Chair, and is not respectful to this House. I hesitate to Name the hon. Member; I am very unwilling to exercise the powers intrusted to me, or to appear to act with anything like precipitancy; but I warn the hon. Member seriously that this sort of language will not be tolerated.

MR. HEALY, continuing, said, that at the time this interruption occurred he was speaking of the case of Michael Waters, as to which he trusted he should at least have the attention of the Chief Secretary, so as to avoid the risk of any further misunderstanding. Waters, who had been 12 months in gaol without trial, was dying of consumption, and on the 27th of June the Governor of Mountjoy Prison telegraphed to the uncle of Waters that he was dangerously ill, and wished to see his uncle. As Bernard Smith had been released because of blood-spitting, the uncle of Waters sent a memorial praying for the release of his nephew; but as the Lord Lieutenant was too much engaged in following the hounds to attend to it, no reply was received. The poor boy lingered on in prison without a sight of the blue sky until the 16th October. The Governor of Mountjoy Prison, on the 17th June, telegraphed that he was dying. He died on the 16th October. The Home Secretary told them in that House that it was a barbarity and cruelty which could not enter into his nature to keep a man dying in an English prison without releasing him. After the cruel and barbarous treatment by the prison officials and of the Castle officials of this unfortunate boy, what happened? The nephew's death was telegraphed to Michael Waters' uncle, and he sent this telegram to the Lord Lieutenant—

"Will you allow out of Mountjoy Prison the remains of my nephew, Michael Waters, or at least hold a fair inquest. Reply prepaid."

The Lord Lieutenant seemed to have put the shilling of Michael Waters in his pocket and did not reply. They kept this boy's wretched worn-out corpse, and at the dead of night shovelled it into Glasnevin Cemetery. He himself procured the money to pay for the shroud that covered his body. The prison officials would have buried him naked. The uncle of this man told him he had to beg and pray to the Governor of Mountjoy Prison for half-an-hour to allow him to put the shroud and some mementoes of Catholic devotion about the body, to show that his nephew had received Christian burial. He had no desire to continue this painful subject. Why did he and his Friends bring forward these cases? Because the victims were flesh of their flesh and blood of their blood. The feelings of the commonest people in Ireland were their feelings; the blood of the peasants were in their veins. For his part he would rather be a relative of that martyred victim in Mountjoy than the son of the proudest aristocrat in England. The name of Michael Waters in Ireland would be a holy name. On the hills of Armagh, where he was known, it would be treasured, and would be a war-cry amongst the people of the district against their oppressors. His blood rested not upon the head of anybody but the Government. They took him from his native place, kept him a year and a-half in gaol without trial, then dragged him to Belfast, and, before an Orange jury, convicted him without even giving time for his witnesses to be brought up. In the prison books of Belfast they would find the names of the Crown Solicitor and other officials as pretended visitors of this boy, placed there to suggest to his friends who might come to him that he had turned informer. It was a wretched trick they played for the young man's life with loaded dice, and they won the toss. His corpse was in Glasnevin, but his soul went marching on—[A laugh—and he could tell the Government that the name of this young man—though it might form the subject of laughter to English Members, who wept over the slain Arabs of the Soudan—and the memory of Michael Waters, of his trial and his sufferings and death, would reverberate through the North of Ireland, and increase the flame which had been lighted against hatred and oppression, and which he hoped would continue until it consumed every shred and vestige of British despotism in the Province.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he was somewhat surprised that, after the speech the House had listened to from the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), there was no disposition to reply exhibited on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. He took it as evident, intimate as the hon. and learned Gentleman must be with the administration of affairs in Ireland, that his silence in regard to the grave and serious charges which the hon. Member brought against the Government showed that he had not a word to say by way of defence. It would not be possible for the hon. and learned Gentleman to defend the Government in an assembly of Irishmen—neither he nor any other official of the Crown would have the hardihood to stand up in a representative assembly of Irishmen to defend the system which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Monaghan had assailed. But the hon. and learned Gentleman knew the sympathy which existed for him and his Administration in this House—he was conscious that, however infamous was the system put forward in the name of the Irish Government, Members on the Ministerial side of the House would support it. Though the Government did not plead in vain for sympathy from hon. Members below the Gangway on their own side of the House—from hon. Members who went to foreign fields for the practice of their philanthropy—Ireland was passing through a system of maladministration and tyranny worse than was to be found in any other country in the world. He was acquainted with some of the facts his hon. Friend had mentioned. He had seen the very telegram sent by the Governor of the gaol—in the case referred to by the hon. Member—to the uncle of the young man, warning him to go up immediately because his relative was dying; and, looking at that telegram, he could not but remember that a few months previously the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had said to him, in that House, that if imprisonment endangered the life of a man the Government would certainly think it their duty to release him. Later on, during the present Session, they had had a statement from the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in which he had gone a step further, stating that it would be heartless barbarity to retain a prisoner whose life was endangered by imprisonment. He (Mr. Harrington) would quote the right hon. and learned Gentleman as a witness against his Colleagues on the Treasury Bench. If it was heartless barbarity to endanger the lives of prisoners by keeping them in prison, that heartless barbarity had been perpetrated in Ireland by the responsible Officers of the Crown who, when an opportunity had been offered them this evening, had not attempted to deny it. Hon Gentlemen opposite who were so fond of applauding every expression of opinion which came from the Government Bench, and who, though they were the professed champions of liberty, were the first to cry down Irish Members when they spoke in defence of their fellow-countrymen, would, perhaps, like to know how it was that the Irish prison officials were empowered to do what they would not tolerate in the Governor of any English gaol. A short time ago he had had an opportunity of giving evidence before the Prisons Commission, and had drawn attention to the deliberate difference which had been made in the law between the two countries on the subject of prison rules. In England the rule was that if a prisoner's life became endangered, or was likely to become endangered, the doctor had immediately to report to the Governor of the prison, or to the Prison Board; but in Ireland the doctor had to report in the case of a prisoner in immediate danger of death, and not in cases where life was endangered, and the report had to be made to the Lord Lieutenant and the prison officials. Complaint had been made in the House time after time that prisoners in Ireland were in immediate danger of death, and the excuse for their non-release was that the doctors had allowed them to go so far before making up their minds that the sick prisoners were in immediate danger, that when they did at last make their reports the prisoners were not in a fit condition to be moved. Such a thing as that never occurred in England. But the release of a prisoner in Ireland on account of his being in immediate danger of death was of the rarest occurrence. They had had in Ireland during the past year about 10 cases of inquests on the bodies of prisoners who had died in gaol, some of the deaths having even been in the cases of persons serving short terms of imprisonment; so that there could be no doubt that life had been shortened by prison treatment. A case tried by the Prison Commission sitting in Dublin—the case of the man accused of the murder of Philip Maguire—had been referred to. In that case the accused was discharged by the Crown on the first disagreement of the jury; but, in the case of the unfortunate Mayo men, they were put repeatedly on their trial, and, finally, the case was withdrawn from Mr. Justice Johnson, who had been inclined to show some semblance of fair play to the accused, and though they were from time to time pressed to proceed with the trial, the Crown officials would not do so until they had got Mr. Justice Lawson on the Bench. Irish officials could deceive English Liberal Members, who would rather sympathize with them on Irish affairs than lose the smiles of the occupants of the Treasury Bench; but they could not shut the eyes of the people of Ireland to the system of administration they were pursuing in Ireland. Depend upon it, whilst they were pursuing a system of relentless hate against the people of Ireland, those people were treasuring animosity in their breasts which England and her Empire would one day feel the effect of. Then, as to the Dromore shooting case which was tried before the Commissioners, he should like to draw the attention of the House to the facts, in order that hon. Members might see that, from the Judge on the Bench to the lowest official in the land, the administration of law in Ireland was a perversion of justice. On the 16th December, four men passed through Dromore on a car and met two unfortunate young men walking in the opposite direction outside the village. The men on the car shouted "Down with the Pope!" or something of that description, and the two young men replied, whereupon the four got off the car and assaulted them, firing a revolver in the médec and wounding one of them. A telegram was sent by the Dromore police, directly the occurrence was reported to them, to the Omagh police, warning them to be on the Dromore Road to arrest the young men on the car as they entered the town. The contents of the telegram were, of course, supposed to be a secret from everyone but the Constabulary; nevertheless, they reached the local Orangemen, and two of them—one of whom occupied an official position in Omagh—went out on the Dromore Road, met the car, and took the revolver away from the four young men, in that way anticipating the police. The four young men were brought before the local Resident Magistrate and the local Justices, and were formally committed for trial, bail being fixed in the case of each at £50 and two sureties in £25. But what happened afterwards? Why, behind the back of the Resident Magistrate, the paid official of the Crown, one of the local Orange magistrates—a brother Orangeman of the criminals committed for trial—came and reduced the bail from £50 to £20 and two sureties in £10 each. The consequence of this had been that one of the offenders, the most guilty of the four, had escaped to America. This was the system of things the Government wished hon. Members to respect in Ireland. They refused to respect it—the Irish Members refused to ask their countrymen to respect a system which was so infamous and unjust. He (Mr. Harrington) could assure the Government that so long as they dealt in the present manner with the people of Ireland, so long might they expect to have a pretty hot time of it. And now, to go to another point, a question was raised earlier in the evening with regard to the levying of the extra police tax in certain parts of Ireland. The secret of the keeping up of this tax was that during the agitation the Government found it necessary to increase the police to an enormous extent; and now, rather than place the cost of the extra men on the Imperial taxes of the country and have to apply to the House for a large grant annually or increase the Estimates, they preferred to make the charge local and to keep the minds of the people in a constant state of disturbance. He challenged the Solicitor General for Ireland to stand up and deny that the Government had enormously increased the police, not only in those districts where disorder existed and it was necessary to have an enlarged force, but in the most peaceable and orderly districts of the country. Another tax which was imposed on the people, and of which they grievously complained, was the blood tax. He would give an extraordinary instance of the manner in which the blood tax system was being increased in Ireland. When the Prevention of Crime Act was passing through the House, the case made out on behalf of the Government, its sponsors, for the blood tax was that they wished to bring to justice certain men who had become perpetrators of crime in certain districts, and to raise up in those districts a feeling against crime and outrage. Those who were acquainted with the manner in which the blood tax was levied knew that even where men had been found red-handed and had been brought to justice this infamous tax had been imposed all the same. In order to convince the House of the iniquity of the manner in which the tax was imposed he would give a single instance which had occurred in the constituency he himself represented. Some time since a police constable was murdered in the neighbourhood of Mullingar on the very day on which he had come to the district to get married. There was no doubt the murder excited widespread indignation and that general sympathy was felt with those whom the murdered man left behind. But it was ultimately found that the crime was the act of a lunatic. The murderer was at once arrested. He was tried and found guilty, and because he was a lunatic he was sent into a lunatic asylum; where he now was. An application was made immediately to the Lord Lieutenant to order an inquiry in order that the widow of the murdered constable might be awarded a certain compensation; a certain amount of blood money. No doubt the widow was entitled to a great deal of sympathy and commiseration; but he would put it to the sense of justice and fair play of the House whether the people of a district should be taxed for an act committed by a lunatic? The Government themselves admitted the murderer to be a lunatic, having sent him into a lunatic asylum. It was known, of course, that unless an agrarian complexion could be given to a crime it would not be possible to levy the tax; therefore, in this case, it was declared that the cause of the murder was agrarian, and the Lord Lieutenant had been seriously prepared to have an inquiry.

held as to the motive of a murder committed by a lunatic. He should like to hear the Solicitor General for Ireland defend the policy of such an act as that. The fact was that the only effect of this blood tax and police tax was to incite people to the commission of crime and violence. It had done so and would continue to do so. They had had a spell of quiet and rest in Ireland, yet the legal authorities in that country—he would not say to increase their own emoluments, because he did not desire to constitute himself a judge of their motives—were going round hunting up cases for the imposition of the blood tax, and getting unfortunate people to give evidence and, too frequently, to commit perjury. Then there were men who had been 15 months in gaol in Ireland awaiting trial. It seemed an extraordinary thing for the Government, who professed to be wedded to broad principles of liberty, with all their machinery of law, with their Special Commissions, their Winter Assizes, their Crimes Act, their trial by Judges, their extraordinary packing of juries so that not a man who professed the religion of the majority of the people was allowed in the box—it seemed an extraordinary thing for them to allow a system to prevail in Ireland under which men could be kept in gaol awaiting trial 15 or 16 months with no possibility of being brought to trial for another six months to come. That system was in force in a country which the Government told them, from time to time, had the benefits of the British Constitution, which was so much admired throughout the world. If the country was governed so well, why were men kept in gaol for two years awaiting trial for agrarian offences? What was the reason for delay? The Crown, of course, alleged a reason of their own; but the people of Ireland alleged an altogether different reason, and both these allegations were worthy of the serious attention of the House. The reason for repeated postponements alleged by the Crown was, forsooth, that they were hunting in America—all over the Continent of America—for witnesses whose testimony was essential; but the reason the people of Ireland alleged—and in which he agreed—was that the Government wished, by continued detention, to force the prisoners to give evidence, to force them to save their own lives by sacrificing others, some of them probably innocent. And this continued detention without trial meant not only imprisonment, but isolation from friends and starvation. The food given to untried prisoners was less in quantity than that given to convicted prisoners. The Government, he could assure them, would never settle the Irish difficulty by such methods as this. He should be ashamed to see the day when his countrymen would give their assent to a system so scandalous. They had heard the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary make a comparison between English cities and Irish cities in regard to the police tax; but the right hon. Gentleman's figures were quite fallacious. There was no comparison to be drawn, the circumstances of the two countries being entirely different. English cities had their police under their own Government, and the people were prepared to sustain the Force. In Ireland that was not the case, the police being hostile to the people. The more the police oppressed the people in Ireland, the more they raised themselves in the opinion of the permanent officials. He would not trouble the House with any further observations. Some defence would be made on the part of the Crown, he trusted, in regard to the serious allegations brought forward against them and their system of government to-night. Hon. Gentlemen who supported the Government, of course, did not care for explanations; in fact, explanations were rather an inconvenience to them. He would do them the credit of saying that they had still some conscience left, and that they shrank from having it pricked by harrowing illustrations of the sufferings of the people of Ireland; but they might make up their minds that so long as a vestige of the present system of administration existed they would have Irish Members, in spite of the Rules that might be put in force against them, making them feel the influence of the passions and hatred they had excited in Ireland by their government.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that having listened to the violent language that had been used with regard to the administration of the law in Ireland, and having seen the results of that violent language in the excited feelings that had been roused, he did not suppose any arguments he might use in reply would have much weight. He would, however, shortly call the attention of the House to the cases mentioned by hon. Members, in order to show those who would consider them calmly how little there was of substance in the charges brought against the Government. In regard to the first matter which had been noticed—namely, the police of Cork, he did not, on the present occasion, propose to go into it, because he thought his right hon. Friend had gone very far in the direction of concession when he said that, during the Recess, he would investigate the matter, and if he found that those charges were justified, he would do all in his power to remedy them. Five or six specific instances had been mentioned as charges against the Irish Executive, which it would not be right for him to pass over without notice. The first case was one tried at the last Commission, where the murderers, or one of the murderers, of Philip Maguire, named James Johnson, was arraigned. The hon. Member who last addressed the House had said there was a disagreement of the jury; but that was not the case. The evidence against James Johnson—as he knew, not only from having heard the evidence, but from having read the informations—was stronger than against any of the other prisoners accused of the murder, so that, very naturally, the Crown had him tried first. He was acquitted, and, in consequence, the Crown entered a nolle prosequi in the other cases, deeming it useless to put them on their trial after the acquittal of the prisoner against whom there was the largest amount of evidence. It was now declared that there had been some partiality displayed because James Johnson was a Protestant, and the man who was killed was a Catholic. It had been often charged in this House, and made a subject of complaint by hon. Gentlemen opposite, that Catholics were unduly challenged on Irish juries. Well, in the case of these men there was not a single challenge; the case was tried by a Roman Catholic Judge—a Judge whom he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had the honour to know intimately, and who was undoubtedly a consistent, high-minded Catholic—and the Attorney General who prosecuted was a Catholic of the highest character and reputation. Was he to be told, therefore, that the trial was a partial one?

MR. O'BRIEN: You had 12 Protestant jurymen.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he would never believe that 12 gentlemen of the City of Dublin empanelled to try a case would ever stoop to partiality—would treat a prisoner with undue leniency because the man killed was a Catholic.

MR. HEALY: They only challenge the juries.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, the venue was changed from Derry to Dublin in order to escape all possible prejudice on the part of the jury, and yet complaints were made simply on the ground that the murdered man was a Catholic and the accused a Protestant. He denied that there was anything in this case to justify prejudice against the administration of the law in Ireland. As to the case of Matthews, in which the venue had also been changed, all that could be alleged against the administration of the law, and all that hon. Members opposite could say, was that the Judge before whom the case was tried, who heard the evidence, and was the person most likely to form a correct opinion in the matter, gave a light sentence. In the next case, Doherty was charged with shooting a man in Derry at some celebration. The venue was moved to Sligo to secure an impartial trial. It was not contended that the case ought to have been left for trial in Derry. A punishment of 18 months' imprisonment was inflicted on the prisoner. He was a man 70 years of age, and it had been made the subject of complaint in this House, by Members representing the other side, that the man had ever been convicted at all. In the case of Lord Ardilaun's bailiffs, there was a question whether the gun did not go off by accident.

AN HON. MEMBER: Did not the prisoner plead guilty?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, the prisoner did plead guilty; but as no one was injured, an arrangement was made which met with the approbation of the prosecution, the parish priest, and the Judge, that compensation should be paid, £40 to one man, and £20 to the other. With regard to Waters, it was declared that he was convicted wrongfully, and that he was, consequently, a martyr. But he was found guilty by a jury, and, therefore, could not be justly said to have been wrongfully convicted. He was taken ill; his uncle was informed that he was dying. The Home Secretary had said that it was barbarous not to release a man from prison whose life was jeopardized by his confinement; but Waters had no home to go to, and his state of health was such that it would have been a barbarity to have discharged him. In the case of another prisoner, he had been released in consequence of blood-spitting; therefore, there was an inconsistency in the arguments of hon. Members opposite. Waters was buried in Glasnevin Cemetery, the burying-place for Catholics, according to the prison regulations. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) had referred to the case in which four young men who were Protestants, driving on a car from Dromore to Omagh, met two young men who were Catholics and fired a revolver at them. The hon. Member had pointed out that the Protestants had been committed for trial, but let out on bail, and that one of them had escaped to America; but the hon. Member had omitted to mention that the three who remained were tried and convicted, and were this moment undergoing, one five years' penal servitude, another 18 months', and the other 12 months' imprisonment. He hoped, therefore, the House would agree that, in those cases, justice had been meted out to Protestants as well as to Roman Catholics. And now with regard to the question of extra police—

MR. HARRINGTON: How about the young man who ran away to America?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he had sufficiently referred to that matter. He was happy to say there were now in the whole of Ireland only nine cases of extra police, and it was hoped that they would soon be removed. The hon. Member for Westmeath had referred to the blood tax and the murder of the policeman Crowley; but, evidently, he did not know what had occurred in the case. He (the Solicitor General for Ireland) would tell the House what had transpired, and then, probably, the hon. Member would change his opinion. The widow of the policeman did present a petition to the Lord Lieutenant before the trial, declaring that the murder was agrarian. An inquiry was accordingly granted; but, after the granting of the inquiry, and before it was gone into, the prisoner was tried, and it was found that he was a lunatic and not responsible for his acts. The inquiry had taken place; but His Excellency had made no award, and it was not likely that he would make any, for, as it was shown that the prisoner was a criminal lunatic and that he was not responsible for his actions at the time the crime was committed, a fortiori the offence was not an agrarian offence at all.

MR. HARRINGTON: Then why hold the inquiry?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he had explained that point, he hoped, to the satisfaction of the House. An accusation had been made against the Lord Lieutenant with regard to his not taking the trouble to examine into matters himself, but in putting memorials aside for the sake of the enjoyment of his pleasure. Those who said that did the foulest injustice to the noble Lord, and, in saying it, showed that they knew but little of his character.

MR. O'BRIEN: The hon. and learned Gentleman has not replied to the charge in regard to the seizure of a horse.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he had already answered a Question on that subject in the House. The policeman went to receive the tax, and it was alleged that he stated he had received instructions to seize the horse. That was a most absurd statement, for the hon. Gentleman knew what the law was, or, at all events, if he did not, he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) could state it to him. The policeman would have no more authority to seize a horse for this tax than he would have to seize one for the landlord's rent.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was not prepared to say that the statements of the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the selection of juries shook his belief in the hon. and learned Gentleman's veracity, but they largely increased his faith in his credulity, and he certainly thought the House would be able to swallow most monstrous improbabilities if they could give credence to such an accidental concurrence of atoms. He had no intention to revive the controversy between his hon. Friend and the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the subject of his conversation was very different from that which was raised by the hon. Member. He had no difficulty in expressing his perfect confidence in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman; but he considered that the case brought forward by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) was one which demanded the concentrated attention of the right hon. Gentleman; and, although he was sorry to accuse the right hon. Gentleman of heartlessness, or of smiling at the death of an innocent man, he must charge him with a certain degree of levity in this matter. He was not surprised that his hon. Friend had imported into this discussion a considerable amount of strong and even fierce and passionate personal feeling. His hon. Friend was a man of strong emotions. This was a case with the details of which the hon. Member had made himself fully acquainted, and he remembered very well the strong speech which his hon. Friend made with reference to this man Michael Waters; and when he remembered that, in spite of the warnings of the hon. Member, the Government had allowed this man to die, he could not be surprised that his hon. Friend had expressed himself so strongly as to carry him beyond the limits of Parliamentary discussion. The case could be put in a nutshell. On the 27th of June, the Governor of Mountjoy Prison telegraphed to the uncle of Michael Waters that the prisoner was dying; on the 21st of August, the Chief Secretary announced in this House that Barnard Smyth, a fellow-prisoner with Waters, had been released because of blood-spitting. On the 23rd of August, the hon. Member for Monaghan brought the case of Waters before the House, and in the following October that man died. The Governor of the prison was aware that the life of that man was in danger, for he practically foretold his death, and, therefore, the Government were responsible to the country. The Chief Secretary was a Gentleman of kindly feeling; but he happened to be an Irish official, and had no public feeling that he cared for, while the Home Secretary was an English official, and had a public opinion which he dared not offend. The Home Secretary, in answer to his hon. Friend, declared that the retention of the prisoner, in a manner which would only be worthy of a savage country, was necessary; and he was defended by the Chief Secretary, because this happened to be committed in a country which was certainly savage so far as the administration of the law went, and so far as the present Government were concerned. This case, simple as it was, was quite sufficient to show the manner in which justice was done in Ireland. The Solicitor General for Ireland urged, as a plea for retaining this man in prison, that he had not a home to go to; but the man asked to be sent home, and his uncle applied over and over again that he might be sent home. To whom were these applications made, and how were they received? The uncle sent a memorial to be allowed to see this prisoner, who, according to the Governor's telegram, was in a dying condition; but he did not get even the courtesy of an answer. Nay, more, with a depth of meanness of which he could not have thought even the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland capable, Lord Spencer did not deign to reply to the prepaid telegram sent by the uncle. The hon. Member was perfectly justified in saying that if such a case as this had happened in Bulgaria or Turkey, and if a Tory Government were in power, the Liberals would come back to power upon that case, and Mid Lothian would be harangued, from one end to the other, on the barbarities of Turkish rule and the inherent wickedness of the Tory Government. This was one of the worst cases even among all the bad cases brought before this House, and justified him in saying that never in the past 80 years had there been a Government in Ireland more loathed, more detested, and more despised than the Government of which Lord Spencer was the head, and the Chief Secretary was the mouthpiece.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— GENERAL GORDON.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he was very sorry to interpose between the House and the Holidays; but the news had been confirmed by the Treasury Bench that the tribes between Khartoum and Berber were in full revolt, and that all communication with General Gordon had been cut off. In the face of this intelligence, the Government had stated that they were doing absolutely nothing to save General Gordon and the garrison and civil population in Khartoum. It was evident that the Government were wholly inappreciative of the danger in which General Gordon stood, and had decided to take no steps for his relief. The Secretary of State for War might not assent to that; but the Prime Minister had stated that General Gordon believed himself to be safe in Khartoum, and that he saw no danger; and the noble Lord himself had said that the Government had no knowledge that General Gordon desired that any troops should be sent to him. The Government had taken no steps to ascertain whether General Gordon needed troops or a military diversion at this moment. The Government had been accused of having abandoned the brave Governor of Sinkat; and that had been justified over and over again. Now a worse charge could be proved against them—namely, that they had betrayed General Gordon. The Prime Minister had stated that General Gordon was under no constraint to remain, but could leave; and yet, at that moment, the Prime Minister knew, as the noble Lord had subsequently informed the House, that the Government had actually asked General Gordon to remain at Khartoum in consequence of their refusal to appoint Zebehr Pasha as his successor. Could the Government say he was under no constraint to remain when they had invited him to remain in consequence of their refusal to assent to the only proposition he had made, and in face of the fact that he had undertaken to rescue the garrisons and the civilian population of the Soudan? As long as there was breath in his body General Gordon would consider himself bound in honour to remain and endeavour to save the people and the garrisons whom he was sent out to rescue. General Gordon informed the Government, four weeks ago, that he thought a military diversion was necessary to achieve the object the Government had in view. He urged that if Zebehr was at once appointed, a military diversion should be made by a British Force from Suakin to Berber, or by Wood's "Invincibles," to Wadi Halfa. He asked for that a month ago; but the Government now shielded themselves behind the pretext that General Gordon only asked for that aid because Zebehr was going to be appointed. Much had happened since to make this ten-fold more necessary. At that moment Gordon was in command of Khartoum and of the road to Berber; there had been no defeat of his Army; there had been no rising of the tribes; there had been none of that threatened revolt of the great Bishari Tribe; there had been no breach of communications. And yet, when Gordon gave that advice, and when the communications were perfectly secure, the Government decided that it was not necessary to make any diversion. Since then Gordon had been cut off; he had been surrounded, and Berber and Dongola were threatened. If there was any ungenerous and unworthy answer it was that which the Government had given. It was all very well for them to say now that the heat was too great to enable British troops to advance; but this was not a question of the present moment; they had had it before them ever since the 19th of January, when they sent General Gordon out on his almost impossible mission. They had repudiated the only important appointment that Gordon had made—the appointment of Zebehr. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had no great objection to that repudiation; but he would justify the proposal by saying that General Gordon only made it to save the Soudan from universal anarchy. Gordon practically said—"Better Zebehr than universal anarchy." The Government had known all along since the 19th of January that Gordon's position would probably become impossible—on the 12th of February, when they sent out General Graham; on the 29th of February, when Osman Digna was beaten at Teb; on the 14th of March, when the battle of Tamasi was won. Why, then, did they not take action, and send a few squadrons to Berber? It could have been done at a slight cost—they only wanted a few thousand camels to carry water. A slight cost would have saved Gordon, the Soudan, and the credit and honour of this country. But the Government allowed matters to drift along until they found themselves in this position, that this chivalrous officer, doing the highest work of humanity, had been cut off from communication with us, and he had practically been abandoned. That was the position with regard to General Gordon. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) asked the Government what had been the object of the slaughter—the frightful slaughter—near Suakin? What was it for? Why were 5,000 brave Arabs and 200 gallant Englishmen sacrificed near Suakin? What was accomplished by that terrible loss of life? A few earthworks, an expenditure of £10,000, and 1,000 troops—Indian troops, British troops, good Egyptian troops—would have protected Suakin against Osman Digna. But Her Majesty's Government, by the retreat they had ordered, had thrown away all they had gained. They did not relieve Sinkat; they were too late to relieve Tokar; they were too late to disperse Osman Digna's forces. If they had opened the Berber road and saved Gordon, and saved the garrisons at Kassala, at Khar-toum, at Berber, at Dongola, or at any of the other places, they might have something to show for this vast sacrifice. But what they had to show for it now, or would have to show for it in the future, he knew not. The Government could not explain it, the country did not understand it. Only this afternoon he had put a Question to the Government on the subject, and the Prime Minister's answer that that Question was "misleading" had justified him in taking up the time of the House to-night for 10 minutes while he put the matter again before them. His Question was not misleading; it was a very simple Question. If hon. Members tried to save General Gordon by putting Questions in this House they were accused of Obstruction; when the whole Press of the world defended General Gordon's claim to be relieved they were charged with being bribed by financiers. It was, however, essentially necessary that these Questions should be put. His own Question had simply been—"Do you intend the House and the country to understand that you abandon Gordon?" It was a pointed Question, not a misleading one, and it was a justifiable Question. He wished to make this protest against the course pursued by the Government with regard to General Gordon as a course which was most unjust and ungenerous to that gallant officer, and which was discreditable to Her Majesty's Ministers. It was a course which cried aloud to the country for the most severe reprobation.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I quite understand that the House should desire to go to a Division, and I can assure them that I do not intervene at this late hour from any wish to continue the discussion upon this subject. The hon. Member who has just spoken has probably felt a considerable anxiety to deliver his own soul, and is not very anxious that there should be any long reply to his observations. I can only say over again, and I hope without any disrespect to him, that Her Majesty's Government have on several recent occasions placed before Parliament, both here and in "another place," their views upon the situation in general, and in regard to the position of General Gordon in particular. I do not think it would be possible to enter with advantage at this late hour into any of the numerous points which the hon. Gentleman has brought before us; but whenever the proper time comes we shall be ready to enter upon all these questions, as we have done upon other occasions. We have had much Egyptian debate in Parliament of late; and I hope the hon. Member will be satisfied with making his own speech, and will not think me disrespectful to him if I say no more upon the subject now.

Question put.

PUBLIC HEALTH (CONFIRMATION OF BYE LAWS) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend 'The Public Health Act, 1875,' so far as relates to the confirmation of bye laws."—(Mr. George Russell.)

Mr. GRAY asked whether some explanation could not be given of the character of this Bill? Why was it proposed to amend the English Act of 1875 without amending the corresponding Acts for Ireland and Scotland?

Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL said, he had not intended to give any description of the Bill now, and would rather have reserved it for Committee. The Bill had been brought in in consequence of the decision of a Court of Law, who had given their view of the legal aspect of the question, and had made it appear that as the law now stood these bye-laws did not require the confirmation of the Local Government Board, which, up to the present time, had been thought necessary. The object of the Bill was to give the force of law to bye-laws which had already been passed, and to remove any doubt on the subject.

MR. GRAY said, he wished to point out that the same necessity would arise under the corresponding legislation for Ireland and Scotland, and he objected to this species of piecemeal legislation altogether. The hon. Gentleman ought to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and to be sure, before he brought in his Bill, that precisely the same condition of affairs, whatever it might be, did not exist in connection with the Irish law. He would ask the hon. Gentleman to delay the introduction of the Bill until he had made himself acquainted with the entire condition of the law on the subject.

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, that in the meantime it was necessary for the Bill to be introduced.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, and Mr. HIBBERT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 173.]

ORDER OF THE DAY.

REAL ASSETS ADMINISTRATION BILL.
(Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Warton.)

[BILL 98.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he desired to move the insertion of a new clause, providing that real estate should not be applicable to the debts of deceased persons till the personal effects had been exhausted. He thought that such a provision was desirable, and he believed it would come within the intention of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) who had brought in the Bill.

Clause (Saving of specifically devised real estate).—(Mr. Tomlinson.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time,"

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he should oppose the clause. It was objectionable, because it would discharge the real assets which were now available for paying the debts of specific legacies from that liability. He could hardly suppose that the hon. Gentleman intended to make so serious an alteration in the law.

MR. WHITLEY also opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would make far too serious a change in the law for the House to assent to unless they were directly advised to it by the responsible Law Officers of the Crown.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he declined all responsibility for the Bill, or for the proposed change in it. All that he had done was to give such assistance as he could when the Bill was in Committee to remove some of its defects. The responsibility rested rather with those who permitted the Bill to pass its second reading and to go through the Committee stage. He was entirely opposed to the clause now proposed.

MR. TOMLINSON asked leave to withdraw the clause.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday 21st April.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY (PARK RAILWAY AND PARLIAMENT STREET IMPROVEMENT) BILL.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that he rose to ask a Question of his noble Friend opposite, of which he had given Notice, and which Notice was in these terms—

“To ask Her Majesty's Government whether, in view of the difficulty, if not impossibility, of properly ventilating underground railways without openings into the outer air, as proved by the evidence given on behalf of the Metropolitan and Metropolitan District (Inner Circle) Railway Companies when their Bills were in Committee in 1879 and 1881, the Government will consider the propriety of making the assent of Parliament to the proposed new railway under the public parks contingent on the company undertaking to work the line by electric power and not by steam?”

Before putting the Question he wished to make a very few remarks, and he certainly should not in any way go into the merits of a measure that was now before the other House of Parliament, but would only ask his Question for the purpose of acquiring some information. Before Easter, in answer to a Question put by a noble Lord who sat upon his side of the House, the noble Lord opposite described the railway which was proposed to be made under the Parks, and, if he remembered rightly, it was said that the line was to consist of three sections. The first section was to pass through the Edgeware Road, and he presumed that that would be an underground railway of the ordinary description and carried in a tunnel. Then there would be another section, beginning at that point and running through Hyde Park to a point in the neighbourhood of Albert Gate; whilst another section would run all the way under St. James's Park and the Green Park down to a point in the neighbourhood of King Street, Westminster, where there was to be the final station, but which station was not to be in any way connected with the existing underground railway there. His noble Friend, on the occasion to which he referred, said that there was to be no opening for ventilation of the line in the Parks. Having sat upon the Committee of 1879, upon which his noble Friend also served, and having sat also upon the Committee that sanctioned the ventilators upon the Embankment two years afterwards, he was not at all sure that if these tunnels were not ventilated, and if the ordinary locomotives were used, there would be any ventilation at all. Before the Committee of 1879 the opponents of the Bill proposed that there should be made long chimneys beside houses, through which to draw up the fumes generated by the engines from the line by means of the draught caused by fires; but Sir John Hawkshaw strongly opposed that proposition, and he succeeded in convincing the Committee against it. If he understood what he read in the newspapers, it was now proposed to employ, in connection with the tunnels under the Parks, a mode of ventilation which Sir John Hawkshaw strongly opposed in 1879, and which the District Railway Company also afterwards opposed, and put Mr. Myles Fenton, who was formerly General Manager to the Metropolitan Railway, into the box to prove that the plan had been tried upon that line, under the superintendence of Mr. Fowler, the eminent engineer, and afterwards by Sir Edward Watkin, but without success. He was therefore very much afraid, in consequence of what he had gathered from the newspapers, that the plan of ventilation which was now proposed was the one that had been previously condemned by Sir John Hawkshaw, and which would not work satisfactorily in these tunnels. Now, he wished, under these circumstances, to draw attention to the fact that there had recently come into operation a plan by which steam locomotives could be dispensed with altogether. There had been for some months a railway six miles in length working in the North of Ireland, at Portrush. This railway, or tramway as it might be called, carried a large number of passengers, and with success apparently. Within the last few weeks he had himself personally tested this railway; and he had also had the good fortune to have the opportunity of being present when Sir William Thompson and other scientific authorities were trying experiments on the Company's premises. The line was carried upon the gradients of an ordinary public road, such as would have been made by any good engineer some few years ago; but, of course, the gradients of a railway would be much easier. The road upon which the carriages ran was also open to the wet, and not at all like a road which would be in a tunnel under the Parks, and quite protected from the effects of the weather. No doubt, improvements could be made in the way of working trains by electricity; but he was quite convinced that now, where there was a good railway, it was quite possible to run trains by this means. It was under these circumstances that he ventured to put the Question of which he had given Notice.

LORD SUDELEY: In reply to the noble Earl, I have to say that the approval of the Government to the scheme of constructing a railway across the Park was given under the distinct assurance of Sir John Hawkshaw, the great engineer, that there would be no difficulty in constructing it in such a manner as that there would be ample ventilation, and that there would be no necessity whatever for ventilating shafts. The First Commissioner of Works, on the understanding arrived at with the Railway Company, laid it down as a primary stipulation for allowing the railway to proceed that no ventilating shafts would be allowed. It was only on that distinct understanding that the Bill was allowed to proceed. The noble Earl referred back to the years 1879 and 1881, when the Metropolitan Railway Bills were brought before Parliament. Evidence was, no doubt, then given by eminent engineers to the effect that proper ventilation could not be secured without air shafts; but the circumstances connected with these railways and the present are totally different, and the noble Earl will remember that in that case the scheme was for a continuation of an old line—namely, that of the Metropolitan Railway. There was no proposition made then that the tunnel should be constructed in any way differently to the old one, or that it should not be exactly similar. There was, in fact, no reason why any new scheme or new plan should be carried out. In the present case it is an entirely new line that has to be considered, and it is the opinion of competent engineers that proper ventilation can be secured without air shafts; and, indeed, it is impossible to read the evidence given before the Committee on the Channel Tunnel a few years ago without being convinced that eminent engineers are of opinion that long lines of tunnel can be made without that means of ventilation being employed. If, in the opinion of these eminent engineers, it is considered possible that over 20 miles of tunnel can be ventilated without air shafts, surely it is possible to ventilate a line of 600 or 700 yards by some other means without any difficulty whatever. The noble Earl has said that the electric railway at Portrush is doing good work. There is no doubt that the electric railway at Portrush has been a great success; and that the experiments made in Austria and other parts of the world show that before long electric railways will be of great benefit, not only to small lines, but to main lines, for which they would act as feeders. When this is the case, and electric railways are used, of course all questions as to ventilation in tunnels will cease to be of such importance; but I must point out to the noble Earl that there is at present one insuperable difficulty with respect to the Parks Railway being worked by electricity. According to the scheme at present before Parliament it is intended that the line shall work in conjunction with the Great Western and Metropolitan Railways; and if the electric system were introduced in regard to the proposed line it would have to be worked not on one system, but upon two or three, and that is quite impossible at present. If the electric system is to be used it must be used as a separate and distinct system; and until the Metropolitan and Great Western work their lines by that method, the suggestion of the noble Earl cannot be carried out. Of course, as the noble Earl has stated, this Bill is before Parliament, and is about to go before a Committee of the other House, when the whole matter will be investigated; and it is quite possible that they may come to the conclusion that some better mode of working should be adopted, or some better system of ventilation should be carried out. But if that is so the Committee will be able to deal with it. In addition to this, the Bill, if passed in the other House, will come before your Lordships and be again sent to a Committee, and the whole matter will be dealt with.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— GENERAL GORDON.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I indulged hopes that, considering the extremely critical position which General Gordon now occupies, the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who was in the House only a few minutes since, might have condescended to give your Lordships some information upon the subject. Looking at the peculiar position of affairs, I do not think it was too much to expect that the noble Earl himself would have volunteered some statement upon the subject. As the noble Earl has abstained from doing so, and is no longer in his place to answer any Question, I beg to give Notice that to-morrow night I shall inquire whether the noble Earl will give this House some information as to the present critical position of General Gordon; and whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to take any steps to relieve him?

QUESTIONS.

STATE OF IRELAND — THE RIOTS AT LONDONDERRY — THE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.

MR. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the course of his examination before the Commissioners, Messrs. Bewley and White, appointed to inquire into the disturbance at Derry on 1st December last, Mr. Inspector Bernard deposed as follows:—

"I have a list of people who can be identified in both processions, and am prepared with evidence when instructions are issued for an investigation:

"As what? — As in the procession firing shots:

"In both processions?—Yes; some firing shots from the Corporation Hall, and others from the Nationalists:

"Give us the names of any persons whose shots are supposed to have hit Durnion?—I have the name of a man who is alleged to have fired shots from the procession:

"What is his name?—I do not wish to mention it:

"Mr. Bewley: I do not think the witness ought to be required to disclose it:

"Mr. Dane: Very well. At all events, you have the name of a man who is alleged to have fired shots?—I have:

"Was he in the Lord Mayor's procession?—He was;"

whether any investigation has taken place, or will take place, into the officer's statement; and, whether any prosecution will be ordered of the person whose name is known to the inspector?

MR. TREVELYAN: District Inspector Bernard did depose as stated in the Question. His statement was not founded on any knowledge of his own, but upon allegations made that a shot had been fired from the Lord Mayor's Procession by a person named Lawrence Nash, wounding Durnion. At the trial of Thomas Doherty, for the shooting of Kelly, evidence was given by two witnesses for the defence that a shot was fired by a member of the Lord Mayor's Procession, Lawrence Nash, which wounded Durnion. This evidence, which was given for the purpose of showing that Nash was the guilty party, in the cases of both Kelly and Durnion was not believed by the jury, and was not acted on by them. It is not intended to order any prosecution against Lawrence Nash, as there does not appear to be any reliable evidence against him.

ARMY — THE ROYAL IRISH FUSILIERS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, If Sergeant Clarke, 4th Battalion Royal Irish Fusiliers (formerly called Cavan Militia), has been kept recruiting since the July of last year up to the present away from his family and head quarters; and, is it the usual rule only to keep them half that time?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the non-commissioned officer referred to in this Question was upon recruiting duty from the 10th of July to March of the present year. He was at perfect liberty to take his family with him if he liked; but he preferred not to do so. Perhaps I may state that a letter has been received from the non-commissioned officer referred to expressing his surprise that the Question should have been put, and repudiating any connection with the hon. Member in regard to his action.

MR. BIGGAR: I may explain that only a very small part of the Question has appeared upon the Paper; and I have a very different reason for putting it from that which appears to strike the noble Marquess.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — NORTH OF IRELAND ROYAL ARTILLERY.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (for Mr. Sexton) asked the Secretary of State for War, What provision the War Department has made to secure for the Catholics of the 2nd Brigade, North of Ireland Royal Artillery, the ministrations of their religion during the time of preliminary drill and training this year at Carrickfergus; and, whether, in the event of the Department not allowing the necessary expense of a special service for the Catholics of the Brigade during their stay for drill at Carrickfergus, directions will be given that the Brigade be assembled henceforth for preliminary drill and training at Belfast, or Ballymena, or some one of the larger towns in the county Antrim, where the church accommodation at the disposal of the local Catholic clergy will enable them to admit the Catholics of the Brigade to the parochial mass?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Regulations provide a fixed rate of remuneration for such ministrations, which is usually found to be sufficient for the duties to be performed; but in this case the local priest considers it insufficient. I have no power to increase the allowance. The place of training has been arranged locally by the General Officer commanding with reference to the barrack accommodation available and other considerations. I cannot undertake to alter it.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) — OUTRAGES IN TIPPERARY.

MR. LEAHY (for Mr. MAYNE) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a series of outrages were committed on the night of Saturday the 22nd of March, or early morning of Sunday the 23rd, between the town of Tipperary and the Limerick Junction, two miles distant, including the breaking of railway lamps at Tipperary Station, the smashing of the distance signal of the Waterford and Limerick Railway at the Limerick Junction, and the robbery of the large lamp belonging to same, as well as the setting fire to a rick of hay belonging to Mr. James Dwyer, of Bohererne, about half-way between Tipperary Station and Limerick Junction; whether the night watchman in Tipperary met between 3 and 4 a.m. on Sunday morning, three youths with the large signal lamp stolen from the junction in their possession; whether these youths admitted their guilt on being arrested; and, whether they are being prosecuted by the authorities?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that no such series of outrages on the railway occurred; but that on the night mentioned three school-boys in a foolish freak took a signal lamp from the line and carried it openly into the town of Tipperary. It was found with them, as stated, by a night watchman; and they were subsequently arrested by the police and brought before two magistrates, by whose desire the matter was reported to the Railway Company in order that they might take proceedings if they wished. The boys were severely punished by the school authorities, two being expelled and the third flogged; and the Government do not think the matter calls for further notice. There is no reason to suppose that the boys had anything to do with the burning of Mr. Dwyer's hay, which occurred a mile and a-half away.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—IRREGULARITIES IN BELFAST WORKHOUSE.

MR. LEAHY (for Mr. KENNY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If disclosures of certain irregularities in the Belfast Workhouse have recently come to the knowledge of the Irish Local Government Board; and, if so, whether they are of sufficient importance to require a sworn investigation?

MR. TREVELYAN: Some irregularities in the Belfast Workhouse did come to the knowledge of the Local Government Board; and the Board inform me that they were carefully inquired into and dealt with by the Guardians, and that they do not consider a sworn investigation necessary.

Mr. Leahy

IRELAND—REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. LYNCH asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can state the number of documents registered, and the number of searches issued, by the Registry of Deeds, Ireland, in the year 1883; whether the officials engaged in making such searches and constructing the records of the Department are liable for any loss that may arise through error or otherwise; whether, in a memorial to the Treasury in 1865, the property annually registered was estimated at nine millions sterling; whether there is any other department in Ireland in which business of such magnitude is transacted, or in which the duties are of such a responsible and technical nature; whether a Royal Commission which inquired into the Registration of Deeds issued a Report in October 1880, containing certain recommendations intended to confer a present benefit on the clerical staff; whether his attention has been drawn to Mr. Armstrong's note in the said Report, to the effect that the existing staff should receive such special improvement as their position justified; and, whether, with a view to remove the existing widespread discontent, and to ensure the efficient discharge of the functions of the Department, he will grant such an improvement in salaries, classification, and annual increment as will place the staff on an equality with those of other important offices?

MR. COURTNEY: I have already dealt with all the points raised by this Question, in reply to the five Questions which have been put to me this Session on the subject of this Office. There is no necessity for increasing its cost, and no intention of doing so. On the contrary, we hope somewhat to diminish it by the substitution, when vacancies occur, of cheaper clerks than those employed in some of the Departments of the Office at present.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)—FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—THE MARKET AT ST. IVES.

MR. HICKS asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether, seeing that the local authorities of Cambridgeshire have no control over the market at Saint Ives, Huntingdonshire, to which market a large proportion of the cases of foot-and-mouth disease in Cambridge-shire have been traced, he will direct the travelling Inspectors to pay particular attention to that market?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, that he had not heard of any case of disease in the market of St. Ives; but the Inspectors had reported as to its unsatisfactory condition, and communications had taken place with the Local Authority. The market would be closely watched.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—DRUMCLIFFE WEST—SLIGO UNION.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (for Mr. SEXTON) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to a statement made in an official communication by the returning officer of Sligo Union to the Local Government Board—namely, that he had no knowledge of Mr. Thomas Simpson, one of the candidates in the election of a guardian for the Drumcliffe West electoral division, having illegally taken away the voting papers of persons entitled to vote for the said division, Whether it is true that, on the 21st ultimo, the day before the scrutiny, Mrs. Mary Currid, a person entitled to vote for the said division, declared to the said returning officer, in the Board room of the Union, and in the presence of the Rev. J. C. Madden, O.C. of Castletown, Drumcliffe, that Mr. Thomas Simpson had taken away her voting paper against her will, and against her demand and protest, and, on the next evening, had given her the paper of another voter; whether, upon this statement, it was the duty of the returning officer to declare Mr. Simpson disqualified and the other candidate elected, or to report to the Local Government Board, with a view to proceedings against Mr. Simpson, under 1 and 2 Vic. cap. 56, sec. 99, and 6 and 7 Vic. cap. 92, sec. 25; whether any steps have been taken by the Local Government Board, or by the returning officer, to initiate such proceedings or to take the evidence of Mrs. Currid and the Rev. Mr. Madden; and, whether the other candidate has been declared elected, or a new election has been ordered?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Returning Officer has reported to the Local Government Board that Mrs. Currid did not make the statement that Mr. Simpson had taken away her voting paper forcibly; but that she did state that Mr. Simpson had not given her back the proper voting paper, and that the policeman would not take the paper she tendered to him, as it did not bear the number of that given to her. Mr. Simpson had a majority of 23 votes, and the Local Government Board do not think that it was the duty of the Returning Officer to declare him disqualified, and the other candidate elected, on the statement of Mrs. Currid referred to. Nor was he bound to report the conversation or complaint to the Board, when the votes alluded to could not in any way affect the return. The Local Government Board have informed the defeated candidate that if he has any evidence to support an objection to the right of Mr. Simpson to act as a Guardian by reason of his not having obtained a majority of valid votes, they are willing to inquire into the circumstances; but it is not their practice to institute proceedings under Section 25 of 6 & 7 Vic. c. 92. It is open to any person who may feel aggrieved to take proceedings under that section.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—DISTURBANCES AT BALLYMACARRETT.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it true that complaints were made to the Constabulary of Ballymacarrett, Belfast, by the Rev. Patrick Farrelly, that his windows were broken on 26th December last, and again within a week of that date; was the stone-throwing on 17th March an attack on the Catholic Congregation leaving the Church on the National Holiday, and is it a fact that the only individual made amenable was caught, not by the police, but by the Priest, the Rev. Patrick Farrelly himself; is it a fact that the Constabulary suffered the individual to be at liberty though caught in flagrante delicto, and allowed him to be brought before magistrates on summons; did District Inspector Bull, on being personally informed by the Rev. P. Farrelly of the stone-throwing at his Congregation on 17th March last, reply to that gentleman that such a case was trivial; and, did Hon. Captain Forbes, R.M., when adjudicating on the case of stone-throwing on 17th March, express an opinion that it should have been at once brought up in the Custody Court?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that the Rev. Mr. Farrelly complained that one pane of glass was broken in his window on the 26th of December last, and another on the 31st. The stone-throwing on the 17th of March was not an organized attack on the Catholic congregation. The allegation is that the Catholic boys called the others names, and thus provoked the disturbance. It is the fact that the only person made amenable was caught by the Rev. Mr. Farrelly, who witnessed the disturbance. The reason this boy was not arrested when the police came up was that they did not know what he was charged with, and the Rev. Mr. Farrelly asked the policeman to tell him the boy's name, but refused to say why he wanted to know it. Subsequently the police ascertained what the boy was accused of, and had him summoned. It is not the case that Colonel Forbes, when adjudicating, said that the case should have been at once brought up in the Custody Court. Neither did the District Inspector, upon being informed by the Rev. Mr. Farrelly of stone-throwing at his congregation, say that such a case was trivial. What he states he did say was that he advised the rev. gentleman not to make a State case out of the matter, as no one was hurt, and no harm done.

IRELAND — DEFALCATIONS OF MR.
ELLIOTT, COLLECTOR OF RATES, BLACKROCK.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (for Mr. Sexton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. John D. Elliott, collector of rates to the Town Commissioners of Blackrock, is a defaulter as such collector to the extent of £2,600; whether the Commissioners, being apprised of Mr. Elliott's defalcation, have privately agreed between themselves to retain him in the position of collector, and have accepted from him a mortgage of £900 upon his house and furniture as security for the money of the township appropriated by him to his own use; whether the Commissioners apprised Mr. Elliott's sureties of the course which they had taken in accepting the mortgage from him, and, in case they did not apprise the sureties and obtain their consent, whether the course taken has cancelled the bond of the said sureties, and released them from liability under it; whether the Commissioners had the legal power to compound such a matter; and, what course the Local Government Board will take in regard to the position of Mr. Elliott as Poor Rate collector of Rathmines?

MR. TREVELYAN: I understand from various sources that the position of Mr. Elliott as collector of rates to the Blackrock Town Commissioners has been the subject of inquiry, which is still pending. The matter, therefore, being still sub judice, the Local Government Board do not feel that it would be right for them to take any step, or express any opinion, which would pre-judge the case. The Local Government Board will make it their duty to see that the proceedings come forward.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882 — COMPENSATION FOR MALICIOUS BURNING OF HAY — CASE OF LAURENCE REILEY.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (for Mr. Sexton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has made inquiry as to a case in which £60 was awarded to a man named Reiley at the Spring Assizes at Trim, for burning of hay; whether his original claim for £90 was passed at Presentment Sessions, but, on hearing that the ratepayers were holding a meeting to arrange a traverse of the presentment, he went to the meeting and offered to lower the claims from £90 to £50, if they consented not to oppose it, but the ratepayers declined the offer, and instructed counsel to oppose the claim at the Assizes; whether the hay had been burned at mid-day, in a field beside the town of Navan, where a number of men were at work, and the ratepayers' counsel produced before the Grand Jury evidence that the hay had been accidentally set on fire by children, and that Reiley, when he saw it burning, had said—"To — with it; I will be well paid for it;" whether the Grand Jury gave no heed to the evidence for the ratepayers, and awarded Reiley £60, being £10 more than he had offered to take; whether the ratepayers then arranged to traverse the presentment, and have the case heard, according to usage, before the Judge of Assize and a Jury; brought up their witnesses from Navan to Trim, and made all due preparation for the hearing of the case, but the Judge, Chief Justice Morris, returning to the Bench from luncheon with the Grand Jury, asked them if they had heard the case, and, on receiving an affirmative reply, declined to listen to anything on behalf of the ratepayers, and immediately confirmed the award; whether the Judge was authorised by Law to take such a course; and, what means of redress are open to the ratepayers who contested the presentment?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am informed that Laurence Reiley gave notice of his intention to claim compensation, and his application for £90 was passed by the Presentment Sessions without any objection. Subsequently, at a meeting of the ratepayers it was decided to oppose the claim before the Grand Jury, unless it was reduced to £50. Reiley was present at the meeting, and it did not appear that he consented to accept the amount. The hay was burned at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and it was alleged that there was evidence that it had been set fire to by children. The Grand Jury, after hearing the evidence on both sides, reduced the award to £60. It was a fact that the ratepayers decided to traverse the presentment before the Assizes; but the Judge, after hearing all the circumstances, refused to allow the traverse. He was informed that the discretion of withholding or allowing permission to proceed with the traverse lay entirely with the Judge. The matter was now closed, and no further proceedings would be instituted.

ARMY—THE ARMY CLOTHING FACTORY, PIMLICO—COST OF MANUFACTURE.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (for Mr. Dawson) asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to the fact that the cost of making clothing at the Government Factory, Pimlico, is from twenty to fifty per cent. in excess of that paid to contractors, and that the Director of Clothing, in his evidence before the Parliamentary Committee, admitted that there was a loss of £8,000 on the work done the previous year at the Government Factory; also, that the sum of £20,000, voted last year for making up clothing by contract, was not so expended, while the amount voted for the "Government Factory" was exceeded; that, in addition to the higher price paid at the Government Factory for making up, a larger quantity of material was used than that issued to contractors?

MR. BRAND: The cost of making clothing at the Government Factory is not from 20 to 50 per cent in excess of that paid to contractors; indeed, there is every reason to believe that the work is done as cheaply at the Factory as by the trade. The loss of £8,000 mentioned in the evidence of the Director of Clothing had reference to the work in the Factory prior to the re-organization of 1878, and since that period the Factory has been able to compete successfully with the trade. Taking the years 1882-3, 1883-4, the amount voted for making up clothing by contract was largely exceeded, although somewhat less was expended in the single year 1883-4. In one instance a less quantity of material was used by a contractor, owing principally to garments having been made less than the size roll furnished.

IRELAND—INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS ACT —DESTITUTE CHILDREN AT ATHY, CO. KILDARE.

MR. LYNCH asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the action of the Magistrates at Athy petty sessions, county Kildare, on the 4th ultimo, when the Rev. Mathew Doyle, O.C. applied to have two out of a family of ten orphans sent to an industrial school; whether three of the ten children are already in industrial schools, and of six remaining with the widowed mother, the eldest is a cripple, and the youngest a baby, all depending on her for support; whether all the conditions required by the Act of Parliament had been fulfilled; the Rev. Mr. Doyle having sworn that the children had been found begging, had not sufficient guardianship, the mother having to toil day and night for their support; that they were largely dependent upon charity, and that sufficiently destitute already, they would be helplessly so, if the mother were visited by sickness; whether, upon examination of an information by the Rev. Mr. Doyle, the Law Officers declared the objections to sending the children to an industrial school to be groundless; whether, subsequently, the local magistrates declared the children might be sent to industrial schools, but only on condition that the payment of five shillings per week for the two children should be made by them other who had just sworn she could not afford to pay three pence; her earnings as a washerwoman being from three shillings to five shillings per week, never exceeding the latter sum; and, whether any steps will be taken to have the orphans sent to an industrial school?

MR. TREVELYAN: From the Reports submitted to me, it appears that the magistrates, in the exercise of their discretion, refused to commit the children to an industrial school, because they did not think the circumstances to be such as would bring the case within the terms of the Act. It is true that evidence was given that the children begged from the Rev. Mr. Doyle; but he admitted they only did it once, and the Bench did not consider that they could be properly said to be, within the meaning of the Act, "found begging," or "found wandering," or "found destitute." The Law Officers gave no opinion on the subject—no information by the Rev. Mr. Doyle, or other papers in the case, having been submitted to them. On the occasion of a second application for the committal of the children being made, one of the magistrates asked the mother whether, in the event of an order being made, she would be prepared to contribute 5s. a-week for the support of her children; but it does not appear that any such declaration was made by the magistrates as is alleged in the Question. I am not aware that it is intended to take any further steps in the case.

STATE OF IRELAND—MEETINGS OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE—INTRUSION OF THE POLICE AT AUGHIRM.

MR. LYNCH asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, on Sunday the 16th ultimo, Sergeant Blair and Constable Shea, of the Hill Street Sub-District, entered the room in which the members of the Auhrim (county Roscommon) Branch of the Irish National League were engaged in holding a meeting, and, being requested by the president and secretary of the meeting to withdraw, or ~~to~~ ^{to} produce their authority for remaining, the sergeant replied that he was acting on his own responsibility, that he would not leave except removed by force, and remained with his attendant constable until the close of the proceedings, despite the protest of the members present; whether the sergeant had instructions from his superiors to insist on remaining at the meeting; whether he had instructions to demand, as he did from the secretary, a list of the members of the Branch; whether it was under instructions from his superiors that he went to the wife of the man from whom the room was rented, and told her she was exposing herself to great danger by giving the use of the room to the members of the Branch; and what notice will be taken of the sergeant's action?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he was informed that the presence of the police at that meeting was not objected to. The sergeant stated—"If I am required to withdraw I will do so;" and after a consultation amongst the members present the secretary stated that he might remain, which he accordingly did. He had no instructions to persist in remaining, and he did not do so. He had no instructions to demand the names of the members; but in meeting the president on the road he asked him, had he many members? He did not make use of any such phrase as was alleged in the Question. The circumstances appear to call for no further notice.

MR. LYNCH (for Mr. SMALL) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Under whose orders does Constable M'Hugh attend the meetings of the Davidstown (county Wexford) branch of the National League; and, is this the same constable who has made charges against men under his orders which were found to be ungrounded?

MR. TREVELYAN: The constable attended the meeting by the desire of his superior officer, and his presence was not objected to. It is not the case that this constable made charges against two of his men which were unfounded. Two years ago he reported two men under his command for an offence for which they were cautioned by the Inspector General.

ALLOTMENTS EXTENSION ACT, 1882—HOLY CROSS, CLENT, CHARITY LANDS.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked the Vice President of the Privy Council, Whether the charity lands of Holy Cross, Clent, come under the provisions of "The Allotments Extension Act, 1882;" whether the trustee has refused the repeated applications of the labourers of the parish to rent these lands; whether the labourers and the Allotments Extension Association have repeatedly applied to the Charity Commissioners for assistance in compelling the trustee to carry out the provisions of the Act; and, whether the Charity Commissioners have received any communications from or on behalf of the trustee, with a view of selling the lands so as to evade the operation of the Act?

MR. MUNDELLA: The charity lands of Holy Cross, Clent, do, in the opinion of the Charity Commissioners, come under the provisions of the Allotments Extension Act, 1882. The Trustee has not refused the applications of the labourers; but he is old and non-resident, and the Commissioners are taking steps to have new Trustees appointed. In reply to the last Question, the lands being copyhold, it will be necessary that a new tenant should be admitted on the Court rolls. As this will be attended with considerable expense, it has been suggested that a portion of the property should be sold to cover it. There is no desire, I am assured, to evade the operation of the Act. The Commissioners have been in communication with the Trustees of the charity lands in the parish of Adderbury, who are prepared to give effect to the Act in accordance with the decision of the Commissioners. Further information has been asked for as to a portion of the lands which have been leased since the passing of the Act, and this information is awaited. The Inspectors' Reports are of a confidential nature, and cannot be published without detriment to the Public Service.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— GENERAL GORDON.

MR. BOURKE: I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs three Questions, of which I have given him private Notice—The first is, Whether The Times telegram of this morning, stating that General Gordon had sent a telegram to Sir Samuel Baker, giving an account of his position at Khartoum, is authentic; the second Question is, whether the Government can give the House any information with respect to the condition of affairs at Khartoum, Shendy, and Berber; and the third is, whether there is any truth in the report that a European Conference is to take place with respect to the affairs of Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will answer the Questions of the right hon. Gentleman to the following effect:—As regards the first Question, we have no textual Report from Sir Evelyn Baring corresponding with the text given in The Times of this morning; but Sir Evelyn Baring has sent us a telegram, which appears to contain a very large part of the substance of, and to be in perfect concurrence with, the text of the telegram referred to. We have no reason to suppose that any part of it is otherwise than correct. With regard to the second Question, the answer I have to give is this—that Shendy is surrounded by hostile tribes. With respect to Berber, we do not know that it is surrounded; but very serious apprehensions prevail there as affecting both that place and the route to Khartoum. With regard to Khartoum itself, the telegram of General Gordon contains important information; and that information is in complete concurrence, so far as the question of Gordon's position is concerned, with what reaches us, and has all along reached us, from Sir Evelyn Baring; the general effect being, according to the expression used, that he is hemmed in—that is to say, that there are bodies of hostile troops in the neighbourhood forming more or less of a chain around it. I draw a distinction between that and the town being surrounded, which would bear technically a very different meaning. The supplies in Khartoum are abundant, and there is no apprehension at all of danger. With regard to the third Question of the right hon. Gentleman, I stated, when I last had the honour of addressing the House on Egypt, that Her Majesty's Government had arrived at an important conclusion for themselves with respect to Egyptian finance, and that the House was very well aware that it was impossible to move a step in that important question without complying with the necessity of communication with other Powers. I have nothing material at present to add to that statement; but as soon as there is any substantive information to be given which would interest the House the Government will take care to give it.

MR. BOURKE: One point the right hon. Gentleman has omitted—that is with respect to the massacre which we are told has taken place of persons who attempted to escape from Shendy.

MR. GLADSTONE: It was not in your Notice.

MR. BOURKE: No; but I asked generally as to the state of affairs at Shendy, thinking, of course, the Government would take advantage of the opportunity of stating whether the news of the massacre was true or not.

MR. CHAPLIN: I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the Government are taking any steps whatever to send to General Gordon that help for which, as I understand from the right hon. Gentleman's reply, General Gordon has appealed. when he asked whether the millionaires of England and the United States would assist him? Are the Government taking any steps, or making any preparations, to render such assistance?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, the hon. Member must understand that the communication from General Gordon to which we have just referred is a communication of which he has the same knowledge as we have. It is not a communication made to or through us, and I understand it in a sense totally different from that of the hon. Gentleman. General Gordon's testimony is expressed as to the present security of Khartoum, and the plan referred to is one of the many General Gordon is making, and has nothing whatever to do with his security in Khartoum. ["Oh!"] Gentlemen who interrupt me in that way, while answering a Question upon a matter of fact, may have opinions of their own, which they can state; but I state with confidence, and with better means of information than they possess, that it has nothing whatever to do with it. I repeat, upon my responsibility, that we believe it to be beyond all doubt that the plan of General Gordon has nothing whatever to do with the question of his security in Khartoum. With regard to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bourke), I limited myself to what he put on the Paper; but my noble Friend will read a telegram which will give whatever information we possess.

Mr. Gladstone

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In answer to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bourke) in regard to events at or near Shendy, it does appear that a portion of the garrison, with some of the civilian population of Shendy, left that place with the view of escaping, and that they reached a spot, the name of which appears to be Alieh. There the steamer ran aground; and I regret to say, from the latest information received from the Governor of Berber, that it does appear that they were surrounded and massacred there.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister if he still adheres to the statement he made the other day to the effect that General Gordon is under no inability to leave Khartoum?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have had no information since that statement in any manner bearing on it, or tending to shake it. I should, perhaps, add to what I stated, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that what we have heard in regard to Berber and Shendy of course indicates an increase in the difficulty of communication along that particular route.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: May I ask, Sir, whether it is true, as stated by the British Consular Agent at Khartoum, who is also Correspondent of The Times, that there arrived at Berber, on the 10th of April, from Sir Evelyn Baring, an unciphered telegram stating that no English troops would be sent, clearly showing that General Gordon and others faithful to the Government would be thrown over? May I also ask whether General Gordon has notified to the British Government that henceforward he will act on his own judgment and on his own responsibility? Further, I would ask the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, or the Prime Minister, whether the Government will provide arms and transports for a volunteer expedition to relieve General Gordon, if such be sent?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Question which the hon. Member has asked me as to the unciphered telegram is the only one that I can answer. The Foreign Office have no information whatever with regard to the arrival of this unciphered telegram.

MR. CHAPLIN: I am sorry to trouble the Prime Minister, but I am anxious to know whether the House is to understand that the Government are still of opinion that the position of General Gordon at Khartoum is one of security, and that General Gordon has no need or desire for assistance or help from the English Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not aware that there was any doubt or ambiguity in the words that I used just now, and likewise on a former occasion. The position of General Gordon is, so far as we know, a position of security; and, in point of fact, it was in a recent telegram that he even used the expression of his being as safe in Khartoum for a couple of months as in Cairo. [An hon. MEMBER: That is dated April 1.] No doubt the telegram is dated April 1, and we have some communications from General Gordon since. Here is one of April 8, which you have in the Papers this morning, and which is in complete correspondence with that of April 1. Of course, the question of sending help and assistance to General Gordon will relate to some totally different state of things.

MR. ONSLOW: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the Conference which Her Majesty's Government proposed to the Great Powers would have before it only the financial aspect of the Egyptian Question, or general questions relating to the administration of the country?

MR. GLADSTONE: We have not arrived yet at a state of things in which we can say that a Conference will be held. When anything in the nature of such a conclusion is arrived at, we shall lose no time in communicating it to the House.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Does the Government propose to lay any Papers upon the Table with reference to the mission of General Gordon?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes, Sir; Papers will be laid on the Table very shortly.

MR. RITCHIE: I wish to ask how the Prime Minister can reconcile his statement respecting the security of Khartoum with the passage in the telegram from General Gordon to Sir Samuel Baker—

"If the loyal way in which the troops and townspeople here have held to me under these circumstances of great difficulty were known, and the way in which my lot is involved in theirs, I am sure this appeal would be considered to be fully justified. I should be mean, indeed, if I neglected any step for their safety."

MR. GLADSTONE: The Question of the hon. Gentleman rather involves matter of argument than of fact; but I again say that I interpret—and I know that I am justified in interpreting—the appeal of General Gordon to have reference to the interest which the loyal population of Khartoum have in the general question of the Soudan; and it is in contemplation of very much more than the mere security, especially the present security, of Khartoum, that General Gordon has sent this message to Sir Samuel Baker. He may be contemplating I know not what in reference to the ultimate safety of Khartoum; but of that I cannot speak. His appeal for assistance has no reference whatever to any danger now over-hanging Khartoum.

SIR JOHN HAY: I wish to ask if it is true that Sir Evelyn Baring is coming home; and, if so, who is going to look after British affairs in Egypt in his absence?

MR. GLADSTONE: In consequence of the burden of Sir Evelyn Baring's duties, an arrangement was made some time ago to send a competent gentleman—Mr. Egerton—to Egypt to assist him. Sir Evelyn Baring will probably leave for England to-day or to-morrow, and in his absence Mr. Egerton will discharge his duties.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether it is a fact that General Gordon has requested the Consular Agent of the Government to leave Khartoum, and has stated that the only means of doing so would be by Equatorial Africa and the Congo?

MR. GLADSTONE: Will the hon. Gentleman give Notice of that Question?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I will do so.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister for some information with regard to the Order of Public Business, and whether it is proposed to take a Morning Sitting to-morrow?

MR. GLADSTONE: We propose to have a Morning Sitting to-morrow at 2 o'clock. We will then proceed with the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill. On Thursday my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make his Financial Statement.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The Representation of the People Bill stands for Thursday.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes; but we propose to take it on Monday.

MR. GORST: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman can give us any information with regard to the second reading of the Merchant Shipping Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Government will make arrangements for the second reading of that Bill as soon as possible.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

WESTERN PACIFIC—DEPORTATION OF FRENCH CONVICTS.

MR. GORST gave Notice that he would on Thursday ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can make any statement to the House as to the present position of the negotiations with the French Government in relation to the deportation of criminals to the Western Pacific; and, whether any communications have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the German Government upon the subject?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: May I ask whether Her Majesty's Government has received a Note from the French Government on the subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No Note has been received.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SCOTLAND—PROCURATORS FISCAL. RESOLUTION.

DR. CAMERON, in rising to call attention to the system of Public Prosecutions in Scotland; and to move—

Sir Stafford Northcote

"That Procurators Fiscal should be prohibited from acting as factors or agents managing landed estates, and, wherever possible, from engaging in private practice as solicitors within the districts over which their Commissions extend,"

said, two years ago he obtained a Return of those Procurators Fiscal who devoted themselves solely to their official duties, and of those who combined private practice with their public work; and he found that in all Scotland there were only eight who confined themselves solely to their official duties, and as many as 44 who did not do so, and of those 44, 23 acted as agents in the management of landed estates. Those facts, and others which he had learned in connection with them, had convinced him of the urgent necessity of some reform, and he took that opportunity of bringing the matter forward. In England the theory of the law was that it was the duty and the right of the person damaged by crime to prosecute the criminal. The evidence against him was laid publicly before him. The prisoner was committed after public investigation. A Grand Jury had to be convinced of his guilt; and when he was tried before a petty jury there must be unanimity in order to get a conviction. The Scotch theory was perfectly different. According to that theory, it was the duty of the State to prosecute crime and punish criminals, and State officials were the proper persons to judge whether crime should be prosecuted or not. If it was considered desirable the State prosecuted at the public expense. Private prosecutions were discouraged in every possible way, and consequently they were hardly ever heard of. In order to enable the State prosecutors to prosecute in the public interest, they were intrusted with powers which to Englishmen seemed most arbitrary and inquisitorial, and which Lord Moncreiff had admitted would be intolerable to the people of Scotland were it not for the direct responsibility of the Lord Advocate, the head of the Scottish Criminal Department, to Parliament. The party suspected of crime, having been arrested, was brought before the Sheriff for examination. His examination was private; no friend or legal adviser was allowed to communicate with him. He was told that he need not answer the questions which were put to him unless he liked, and he was warned that if he did answer them his answers might be used against him on his trial. But his refusal to answer questions put to him might also be used against him. When he was tried his declaration was not taken down in his own words, but written at the dictation of the Procurator Fiscal or the Sheriff, and he was asked to sign it. He was examined again and again until he was committed, which might not be until eight days after his arrest. During those eight days he might again and again be privately examined. During all that time he was not allowed to communicate with his friends or law advisers. In strict law, he believed, witnesses in criminal cases ought to be examined before the Sheriff; but, as a matter of fact, that was never done. They were examined privately by the Procurator Fiscal, who made abstracts of their evidence in his own way, and those abstracts were called precognitions. Those precognitions were submitted to the Sheriff, and on those precognitions thus taken the prisoner was committed. In the more serious cases the precognitions were forwarded to the Crown Office in Edinburgh, where the cases were considered, and directed how to be disposed of. Now, up to that point, the case against the accused was absolutely secret; and if he were discharged, an absolute secret it remained to the end of the chapter. Before the prisoner was brought to trial he was served with an indictment setting forth the charges against him, and also the articles or productions to be produced. On the other hand, he was allowed no access to the depositions of the witnesses who were to be brought against him; and if he wished to make any special defence he was required to give notice of it to the Crown some time in advance. Finally, he was tried before a jury—a bare majority of that jury sufficed for a conviction. Now, he was not going to find a word of fault with the system. On the contrary, he thought that in theory the Scotch law was infinitely better than the theory on which the English Criminal Law was based. But to many of the details of the system the strongest objection had been taken by high authorities. Lord Young, one of the most eminent of the Scottish Judges, said that it was neither right in itself, nor required in the interests of justice, that any person should be committed to prison on evidence taken behind his back, not even in the presence of a magistrate; and he stigmatized it as a blot on the criminal system of Scotland. With others of his fellow-Commissioners, he declared that it was neither fair, nor in the interests of justice, to deny the prisoner access to friends until he had been examined before a magistrate. He (Dr. Cameron) was not going to find fault even with these details; and he was describing the system simply to show the extraordinary power intrusted to the hands of the Public Prosecutors in Scotland, and the absolute necessity, in order that public confidence might be retained, of intrusting those powers only to men who were absolutely above suspicion, and in whose impartiality the public could have the most perfect confidence. The Procurator Fiscal was the sole substitute they had in Scotland for the Coroner in England. The Public Prosecutor decided whether a prosecution was to be proceeded with or abandoned; whether a minor plea was to be accepted, or the graver one insisted on. He also moved for sentence after the verdict had been given. If a man had been killed, with the Public Prosecutor it lay whether the slaughterer should be allowed to get off scot-free—as in the case of a woman who was shot in a sale-room in Edinburgh, by a man with a loaded revolver, before the eyes of her husband, from whom he had received a letter of bitter complaint—or whether he should be tried for manslaughter. If a ploughman snared a hare, or a schoolboy wrote a threatening letter to a man who might be the Procurator Fiscal's client, with him it rested whether their cases were to be treated in the same manner as that of the slaughtered woman to which he had referred; or whether the whole powers of the country should be brought to bear for the purpose of bringing them to justice. Such being the case, the office should be fenced round with precautions, making it, at least, as much above suspicion as were the Judges and Sheriffs of Scotland. Now, was that the case? Quite the contrary. He ventured to say that no class of officials in Scotland were regarded with as widespread suspicion as were the Procurators Fiscal, and against so many sins of omission and commission none were charged. A couple of years ago a Select Committee of the House was appointed to consider a Bill which he introduced, and which had since become law. Under that Bill it was determined, in certain cases, that prosecutions should take place before the Sheriff; and the question arose, who was to prosecute? Now, under the Scottish law the Procurator Fiscal was evidently the natural person to prosecute; but one witness after another gave evidence that if that duty were to fall on the Procurator Fiscal it would never be performed, and that it would be a dead letter; and accordingly the Committee relegated the duty to private prosecutors. Some years ago a law was passed specifying certain bankruptcy offences in Scotland as crimes, and the duty of prosecuting was naturally cast upon the Procurator Fiscal. Now, he had had scores of complaints regarding crimes under this Act, which had been publicly avowed and proved in the examinations of bankrupts before the Sheriffs; and yet, although they had been reported to the Procurator Fiscal, no proceedings had been taken. He had met with similar complaints in regard to almost every other species of crime, from manslaughter downwards. As he had mentioned manslaughter, he would illustrate that by facts contained in a letter which he received only the other day from a very intelligent medical man in Glasgow; and he produced the case the more readily, because it illustrated what was a notorious cause of inefficiency in the administration of justice in grave cases in Scotland. His correspondent was called suddenly to visit a young woman, from 16 to 17 years of age, who lay at the point of death. She survived his arrival only 20 minutes, and in the interval a medical friend was called in. Both those gentlemen thought the case was one eminently demanding inquiry, and that a post mortem was asked for. The girl had been at work only the day before. She had complained of ill-treatment at the hands of the person with whom she lived. She had taken a medicine, for which another medicine might have been substituted either by accident or design. There was no evidence whatever of the real cause of death. They reported the matter to the Procurator Fiscal, and urged the necessity of holding a post mortem examination. Some police inquiry was made, but no post mortem examination was held, and this woman's death was registered by the authorities in these terms—"Cause of death not ascertained; probably natural causes; no medical attendant;" and the woman was allowed to be buried. Now, why was there no post mortem or proper inquiry held in this case? It was a notorious fact that Procurators Fiscal had the very greatest difficulty in recovering expenditure which they might make in connection with post mortem examinations. He did not know whether the Treasury was to be blamed for that, or the Crown Office in Edinburgh; but it was notorious that this parsimony offered an obstacle to the proper investigation of serious cases in Scotland, and it had been repeatedly commented on in the public Press of the country. But if one asked why, in ordinary cases, the Procurator Fiscal did not take up cases which he ought to do, one was told that in olden times it was customary to pay Procurators Fiscal by fees on convictions. It was thought that that system caused many of them to prosecute vindictively for fees, and the system was changed, and they were now paid by fixed salary. Since then, it was said, they did not give themselves more trouble than they could avoid. Now, although the suspicion of a desire to avoid trouble might attach to Procurators Fiscal who confined themselves to their official duties, as well as to those who practised privately, there could, in the case of a Procurator Fiscal who devoted himself to his official duties, be no suspicion that he neglected his official duties in order to attend to private business, or that he neglected to prosecute because the prosecution might give offence to some wealthy client; there could be no suspicion that he undertook that prosecution to please a client, or for the purpose of obtaining information to be used in his private practice. Now, it was quite otherwise with Procurators Fiscal who practised as solicitors and acted as land agents. They might be innocent or guilty; but their position caused them to be suspected by outsiders with whose interests they interfered. Especially was this the case with Procurators Fiscal who, besides private practice, also held positions as factors, and confidential agents, and advisers to landlords. They were commonly regarded by the peasantry in the Highlands as objects of dislike and suspicion. Being frequently brought into collision with the tenantry in their capacity as partizans of the landlords, it was but natural that the peasantry should regard with distrust and want of confidence their impartiality in the discharge of their public duties. In fact, they had no belief in the impartiality of Procurators Fiscal who filled such manifold and frequently conflicting functions; and from the present state of popular feeling in the Highlands there was great danger, unless a proper reform was introduced in this matter, of their running the risk of impressing the minds of the population of the Highlands with the same sympathy with lawlessness and law-breakers which afflicted other parts of the Empire. And that this combination of the duties of Procurators Fiscal with the work of private practitioners gave rise to widespread suspicion and dissatisfaction there could be no doubt. In illustration, he would take first the case of the Procurator Fiscal of Aberdeen, and he selected him the more readily as he did not personally know that gentleman in the least, and further because, judging from the fact that he was one of the best paid, he presumed he must be one of the most respectable of his class. That gentleman, in addition to being Procurator Fiscal, was also allowed to carry on private practice. He drew £800 a-year salary from the Imperial Exchequer, and he got besides £200 a-year from local funds, and he was allowed private practice as well. His first complaint regarding that gentleman was in a Memorial which had been sent to the Home Secretary in reference to an alarming outbreak of disease or illness which had occurred in connection with the milk supply distributed from the Old Mill Reformatory dairy farm in Aberdeen; 322 persons supplied with that milk were attacked with illness, and of these three died. The inmates of the reformatory, who were said to have been supplied with the same milk, escaped without illness. An investigation was held into the matter, in the first place, by the Directors, and the Procurator Fiscal of Aberdeen acted as the private professional agent of these Directors. The result of that investigation was not made known. Then another investigation into the subject was made by the Procurator Fiscal himself in the public interest. The result of his investigation was that nothing was done, and that, according to the statement of one of the sufferers, he expressed himself convinced that the occurrence of the outbreak was not connected with the milk at all, but was due to an epidemic from other causes which had broken out amongst the wealthy classes in Aberdeen. Lastly, an investigation into the matter was ordered and held under the Public Health Act, and the same gentleman was again the professional agent for that inquiry. Well, nothing definite transpired from that investigation; but the Memorial to which he (Dr. Cameron) had referred, and which had been signed not only by 220 of the sufferers, but also endorsed by members of the leading Medical Societies in Aberdeen, pointed out that, according to the books of the Institution, the quantity of milk supplied was vastly more than that produced for such supply in the dairy, and that, therefore, adulteration must have taken place. Under these circumstances, it was most important that a prosecution for adulteration should have been instituted; but nothing of the sort had ever taken place. No wonder the Memorialists demanded another and an impartial inquiry, grounding their demand upon the very equivocal position of the Procurator Fiscal in connection with the three investigations which had taken place. The second complaint had come to him in an official letter from the Aberdeen City Parochial Board. It appeared that a convict named Brown had been discharged from Perth Prison on a ticket-of-leave. Some point having been raised regarding the man's sanity, the Inspector of Poor had him examined by five medical men, and not one of them certified the discharged convict as insane. But the Procurator Fiscal got two medical men to certify insanity, and the man was sent to a lunatic asylum. In connection with this the Procurator Fiscal sent in a bill for £40—£12 6s. 4d. of which went into his own pocket. Now, people argued that if Brown was a dangerous lunatic, he should not have been discharged on ticket-of-leave; and the Parochial Board thought that these investigations would be more satisfactory if the Procurator Fiscal were not allowed to make money in connection with them. And the lunatics themselves did not like the business either. One man who had had the misfortune to suffer from temporary mental derangement, which necessitated his removal for a time to a lunatic asylum, found upon returning home a bill against him by the Procurator Fiscal several times larger than what his treatment and cure in the asylum had cost; and he (Dr. Cameron) had been informed by the Chairman of the Parochial Board that the same Procurator Fiscal had, in connection with similar cases, sent in other bills to the Board amounting to some £97 in the course of less than a year. He thought he had shown that in Aberdeen a large portion of the respectable inhabitants had reasonable cause for suspicion as to the manner in which the Procurator Fiscal administered his functions. The Medical Faculty, the parochial authorities, and the solicitors had reason for dissatisfaction. As to the dissatisfaction of the solicitors, an advocate or solicitor wrote him that on the day previous he had occasion to prepare a petition in connection with a breach of an interim interdict which had been granted against a person, of whom the Procurator Fiscal was the agent. It was necessary that the formal concurrence of the Procurator Fiscal should be appended to the document, and a clerk was sent over to his office for his signature. The clerk noticed that he was detained in getting change when he was paying the small fee. On crossing the street to the Sheriff Clerk's office to present the petition and obtain an extract, he found that he had been forestalled, and that a caveat had been lodged against extracting judgment. The gentleman wrote that it appeared one of the Fiscal's partners had utilized his clerk's detention while obtaining change to be beforehand with him at the Sheriff Clerk's, thus lodging the caveat and preventing the immediate remedy which his client would have obtained. This appeared to be precisely one of those cases where there was no earthly excuse for a continuance of the present state of matters. In Glasgow, Dundee, Paisley, and other places, the necessity had been recognized of preventing Procurators Fiscal from engaging in other than their official work. In Aberdeen the Procurator Fiscal, as he had already stated, received £1,000, besides being allowed his private practice; and he had shown the results of such combination, so far as the public interest was concerned. But the evil results of such a system were far worse in country districts, for there the lawyers belonged generally to one class of society, and the criminals, whom it was their duty to prosecute, belonged to another. The crimes were mostly class crimes—poaching cases, petty thefts, disturbances arising out of evictions, &c.; and the Procurators Fiscal were the land agents and friends and legal advisers of the landlords. A man had only to be appointed Fiscal to obtain such advantages over his fellow-solicitors as to secure all the outlying business. He did not say that the landed proprietors employed him because they thought it might be useful to have him on their side in case occasion should arise; but they certainly did employ him because he travelled about the country in the course of his official business, and could thus, when in the neighbourhood, attend to their private business while travelling at the public expense. If this were denied, he had received numerous complaints from country solicitors on the point, and one of them sent him a letter in which the reason for appointing the Procurator Fiscal agent to an important Highland estate in preference to his correspondent, who was also a candidate for the post, was distinctly stated to be that his official duties so frequently called him to the district. They monopolized all sorts of business. One correspondent complained that a certain Procurator Fiscal was not only a practising solicitor, member of a firm which managed a large number of estates, but clerk and treasurer to a Road Trust, secretary to a Parochial Board, assistant to an assessor in the valuation of lands, sub-collector of county assessments, and a bank agent. Another correspondent called attention to another gentleman on the list, who was not only Procurator Fiscal, practising solicitor, and land agent, but was, or had been, clerk to four school boards and secretary to a Harbour Commission. No wonder these gentlemen had often no time to attend to their official duties, and that they were often obliged to delegate the investigation of criminal matters to young clerks, and allow accused persons to lie in prison longer than was at all necessary. From a Highland county he had a complaint last year that, a couple of months previously, two cases of infanticide had occurred in the district, in one of which the body of the child had been found in an ashpit; and that another case had been reported in another part of the county. He had put a Question to the Lord Advocate on the subject, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman answered nearly three months after the date of the occurrence; and from that it appeared that precognitions had not been sent in to the Crown Office till after the appearance of the Question on the Paper. The Procurator Fiscal in that case figured in the Return as a practising solicitor and a land agent. A couple of years ago, his hon. Friend the Member for Inverness (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) called attention to the fact that in the case of the Loch Carron evictions, which resulted in rioting, the eviction proceedings had been carried through by a gentleman who was no other than the Procurator Fiscal, who might be called upon to prosecute the rioters. Only a few months ago, he (Dr. Cameron) had had his attention called to another case, in which 41 eviction summonses had been taken out by a land agent who was also Fiscal in the district. Happily, the evictions were not carried out; and the evils of such a system did not, therefore, receive practical illustration. But the people naturally distrusted the administration of justice under such a system. Anyone who had watched the proceedings of the Royal Commission on the Highlands and Islands must have observed numerous instances of this; and he should be greatly disappointed if a recommendation that Fiscals be not allowed to act as agents for landed proprietors were not embodied among the recommendations of the Commissioners. With one case which had arisen out of the proceedings of the Commission he proposed to conclude his illustrations of the evils of the present system. General Burroughs, proprietor of the Island of Rousay, in the Orkneys, took such umbrage at the evidence given by the delegates from his tenantry before the Commission, that he point-blank refused to give any assurance to the Commissioners that no one of his tenants should be evicted in consequence of the evidence given by them before the Commission. And he was as good as his word, for he afterwards proceeded to evict two of the delegates who had given evidence. ["Oh, oh!"] He (Dr. Cameron) was not going to say anything of General Burroughs, who, no doubt, had acted within his legal rights, and who had, by this mode of proceeding, unintentionally rendered great service to the cause of land reform in Scotland. But his actions were, of course, unpopular; and he received a threatening letter, of which he complained to the Procurator Fiscal, who was also his private agent. That gentleman (the Procurator Fiscal) set out in one of Her Majesty's gunboats with the Sheriff and the chief of police to the Island, and then set about the investigation of the case by examining a boy named Leonard; having before doing so obtained also a warrant for the arrest of a boy named Mainland, son of a tenant. In examining the lad Leonard, a lad of 14 years of age, son of one of the evicted tenants, according to the boy's own account, the Procurator Fiscal asked him to write, to see, he said, if the lad was a good or a bad writer. The lad wrote half-an-hour or so, and filled a page and a-half of large paper. Then the Fiscal said something about his being a good writer; but he had been so frightened that he was glad to get away. The lad said he had been asked to write some bad expressions, which he at first hesitated to do, but was too frightened to refuse. He did not know, he said, why he had been asked to write; but he had heard afterwards that General Burroughs had received a threatening letter, and that they were after him. He (Dr. Cameron) had addressed a Question to the Lord Advocate on this subject; and the explanation given by the Fiscal was that, having been satisfied himself of the lad's innocence of the crime by his precognition, he had asked him to write certain sentences from the threatening letter, in order to confirm his impression of the boy's innocence. Now, it appeared to him (Dr. Cameron) that this official explanation was most suspicious and objectionable. If the boy was suspected of guilt, why was he not examined before the Sheriff? What business was it of the Procurator to extract corroborative proof of the boy's innocence? For whose satisfaction did he do it? Was it for the satisfaction of his client, General Burroughs? Under the circumstances, one could not wonder that the peasantry of Orkney and their sympathizers all through Scotland believed that the Procurator had made a most indefensible attempt to entrap this frightened boy into making a confession of guilt in the interest of his employer, General Burroughs. Now, the other boy (Mainland) was arrested in another Island, and during his passage to Kirkwall, and prior to his examination, had been kept 20 hours without food. He was submitted to an examination of four hours' duration. He was, among other matters, asked about the proceedings that had taken place at a crofters' meeting, and—according to his own statement—what had been said there about the laird, to which he replied that he did not remember. The Fiscal, he said, thereupon got very angry, and spoke in a loud, threatening manner, striking the desk violently with his fist. He put the same question to the boy several times, to which the lad gave the same answer. Now, this was according to the statement of the boy. It might be quite untrue, just as it might be untrue that the Fiscal had urged him to answer certain questions, and said that if he did not it would be the worse for him. But he (Dr. Cameron) did say that the examination, to his mind, would have appeared much more satisfactory if the examination of the boy had been conducted with less secrecy, and by some other person than a Procurator Fiscal, the agent of a proprietor who had displayed so much vindictiveness and irascibility in connection with the case. The Procurator Fiscal of Perth received £950 per annum from the Imperial Exchequer, and £100 locally; the Procurators of Falkirk and Stirling received each £800, in addition to sums from local funds; and of 38 Procurators Fiscal also allowed to carry on practice, whose salaries were given in the Estimates, 16 drew £500 or upwards, and 28 £300 or upwards, the average of the 10 lowest in official salary being £160. £1,400 additional would raise the salary of each of these to £300, and £2,000 to £350 each, and this in addition to their receipts from local funds; and that would be a larger income than the income enjoyed by country clergymen and other professional men in the country districts in Scotland. In fact, to put this matter on a satisfactory footing in Scotland, what was wanted was not expense, but reorganization. Let the Government recast the whole system. Since the establishment of railways and the electric telegraph, it would be a very easy matter to combine several small districts under one man, who might work in conjunction with a Commissioner, to deal with cases of extreme urgency. Cut down extravagant salaries where now paid, and there would be a surplus to deal with. Promote men who were the lowest paid, but who showed an aptitude for the work, to the higher posts, and that would afford a motive for activity and energy, which, unfortunately, did not now exist. Take long service into account as a claim for retiring allowances, as in the case of Judges. There would then be found no difficulty in obtaining a better class of men than were appointed at present. All this might be done, he believed, with very slight additional expense; but even if a little additional expense were required in order to remove from the administration of Criminal Law in Scotland a blemish which interfered with its efficiency, and which alienated public confidence and sympathy, still Scotland was entitled to it. Scotland was more heavily taxed in proportion to its wealth than any other division of the United Kingdom. Scotch administration cost little. There was no hankering, among Scottish Representatives, after useless subsidies. But to whatever money might be necessary to secure the administration of justice freely, impartially, and in a manner that would commend itself to the public confidence, they felt they had a right, which he believed the Central Government would be the very first to admit. He had, however, expressed his conviction that little expenditure would be required if reorganization was properly set about; and, in conclusion, he begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had very great pleasure in seconding the Motion. If he were to criticize the speech of his hon. Friend, he would say that by addressing himself, not to the use, but to the abuse of the Scotch system, he was afraid the hon. Gentleman had given the enemy occasion to blaspheme, as it might be thought that the whole system was bad. He entirely disagreed with that view. He thought that the Scotch system was an excellent system; but it was liable to the abuses which had been pointed out. The question was a most important one, both in its relation to the administration of local affairs in Scotland and as regarded jurisdiction affecting a wider area. It seemed to him a very extraordinary thing that, both in the House and outside, those people who ought to know something of the British Empire were extraordinarily ignorant of the Scotch system of Criminal Law. He thought he might claim to have had a very considerable experience of criminal procedure in various parts of the world; and his experience showed that the Scotch criminal system, when not abused, was the very best system with which he was acquainted. His personal acquaintance with the system was a favourable one. In the county of Fife, where they had Procurators Fiscal who were public servants, and not engaged in private practice, the system had worked admirably; but, unfortunately, as his hon. Friend had stated, the machinery for carrying out the Scotch system had not been developed and increased in proportion to the needs of the country, and the consequence was that in some cases there was great deficiency, and in others great abuses had arisen. Under those circumstances, he thought his hon. Friend had made out a case showing there was great reason for want of confidence in many of these functionaries, who were not only public servants, but were engaged at the same time in private practice. A functionary charged with such delicate duties as a Procurator Fiscal had to deal with ought to be removed from any suspicion of partiality, and it was in order to secure this result that his hon. Friend had brought this question forward. He thought his hon. Friend was quite right in saying that it was impossible that they could longer submit to have these delicate public functions exercised by a sort of makeshift, by a functionary who was in the nature of a half-mongrel functionary or half-private practitioner. By a good system of re-organization these evils could be cured without great expense to the public purse. People in Scotland were not desirous to get more from the public purse than was absolutely necessary in the interests of justice and good order. They did not want subsidies for this, that, and the other thing that was unnecessary; but they did think they were entitled to have good justice, and those establishments necessary to secure good justice. While it was necessary for the Treasury to restrain the demands of various Departments of the public administration, they should avoid a cheese-paring policy. They should take a discriminating view of their functions, and, above all, steer clear of being penny-wise and pound-foolish. This country was not so poor and over-taxed that they could not give the small sum necessary to put the administration of justice on a proper footing. Millions of money were spent on military expeditions upon the slightest pretence, to the detriment of all other outlays, however just and reasonable. He agreed with his hon. Friend that it would be possible to have a good official functionary for a district, by which a number of smaller men might be dispensed with; and it might also be possible to unite the office of Procurator Fiscal with other public offices, and thus avoid the necessity for the private practice which, as had been shown, was apt to produce a suspicion of partiality. It was quite true that Scotland was more heavily taxed than any other part of the United Kingdom. It was also true that the Returns did not show this; but the reason was that an enormous amount of taxation was from London, which was just as much the capital of Scotland as of England. England would do well to adopt the Scotch criminal system, instead of maintaining the miserable system of public prosecution supposed to be now established. If this were done Scotland would not grudge her share of the cost. With respect to commercial frauds, he was inclined to think the Scotch system at the present time was not sufficient; but if Procurators Fiscal were put on a better footing than they were, it would be found that their dealings with fraud would be more efficient than they could be now. He looked forward to the time when there would be a general Criminal Code applicable to all parts of the country.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Procurators Fiscal should be prohibited from acting as factors or agents managing landed estates, and, wherever possible, from engaging in private practice as solicitors within the districts over which their Commissions extend,"—

MR. MACFARLANE said, he was very glad that his hon. Friend had brought this question forward; but he could have wished that before it was discussed the Return promised by the Lord Advocate had been laid on the Table with respect to Sheriffs and Sheriffs' Clerks, his object in moving for that Return being to show that the abuses complained of were not confined to Procurators Fiscal. He did not desire to go into the minute details of his hon. Friend; but he wished to point out to the Government that the system in Scotland of Procurators Fiscal, Sheriffs' Clerks, or other officials acting as landlords' agents was at the root of half the difficulties arising in Scotland. If this system had not existed, he did not believe the atrocious oppression that had been perpetrated in Scotland in the name of the law would have been possible. By this corrupt and rotten system the landlords were able to carry on their oppression in any manner they chose, and it was an absolute barrier to the poor obtaining justice. The poor ignorant people being served with notice of eviction by the Procurator Fiscal, as the agent of the landlord, abstained from appealing to the law for protection, not that the law would have given them much protection even if they had appealed. He could tell the Lord Advocate that there was a spirit rising in Scotland upon this subject that would not be easily quelled, and in the City of Glasgow, a few days ago, he saw a part of that spirit. It was a spirit he did not wish to see raised in Scotland or anywhere else; but if they wanted to put down that spirit, and obtain peace and prevent Communism, they must do justice. It was their injustice that was bringing about that spirit. There was not a more law-abiding people than the people of Scotland; but he believed, if they could get the evidence of the cases of oppression perpetrated by Scotch lairds on their own people, the House would be shocked, and it would exceed in atrocity and enormity almost anything that had been perpetrated in Ireland, which was certainly saying a good deal. But there was no public opinion in Scotland. The people were isolated, and were thus prevented from combining for self-defence, and they had been trampled upon in consequence. He was anxious to hear the defence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate, and what he was going to propose in a practical shape to put an end to this atrocious system; because, as he had said before, there was a spirit rising in the Island of Skye which it would be hard to suppress without bloodshed, and if there was bloodshed in Scotland the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew the consequences. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would deal with this question in a serious spirit, and do something to check this movement that was rising and increasing every day, and which might soon be a very serious embarrassment to the Government.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he thought the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had done great good in bringing forward this subject. The Lord Advocate would be strengthened very much by this debate in carrying out the reforms which were needed. He would like the right hon. and learned Gentleman to state the facts connected with the Procurator Fiscal of Aberdeen, to whom the hon. Member for Glasgow had referred. He was an official who was highly esteemed, and in whom great confidence had been shown.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir George Balfour) that the subject was of great importance; but the Motion did not require the kind of support which it received from the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Macfarlane), who imported into the discussion a great variety of topics which really had very little to do with the subject. This was not the occasion to inveigh against the Land Laws of Scotland, nor, indeed, to refer to the excitement which prevailed in some parts of the Western Highlands, with which, possibly, the hon. Member might have had something to do. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour) that the hon. Member for Glasgow had done good service in bringing this question forward, and he also agreed very much with what the Motion proposed. He thought, however, that in recent appointments there had been a stipulation that Procurators Fiscal should not take private practice, and that was a step in the direction of the present Motion. He was afraid that there would be a difficulty in cases where those officials received only small salaries if they were not to be allowed to take private practice. It would also be an evil if a lower class of men were appointed to fill these offices; but even such cases might be met by the suggestion of giving a Procurator Fiscal several districts in common. The fact that the Procurator Fiscal was engaged in private practice and employed as a land agent might render his task a difficult one; but he (Mr. Dalrymple) could not admit that the result was of the kind that had been described. It had been said that a Procurator Fiscal so engaged might be too ready to proceed against persons on account of any offence; but his impression was that the result of such business relations was apt to be that crime was not proceeded against enough, rather than that it was proceeded against with too great celerity. Whatever might be the state of matters in particular districts, he was of opinion that, as far as possible, the Procurators Fiscal should devote themselves to their public duties; and he trusted that that would be the view taken by the Lord Advocate.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, he thought the hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow deserved credit for bringing forward this Motion. Personally, he had for many years taken a great interest in it; and in 1877, on the Sheriffs' Court Bill, he moved an Amendment in the direction of his hon. Friend's Motion. That Amendment the House divided upon in his absence; but it was, although lost, nevertheless supported by a majority of the Scottish Members. He was quite aware that it was stated on that occasion that there was difficulty in confining a Fiscal to his duties as prosecutor, owing to the expense which would be incurred in the payment of larger salaries. No doubt, some years ago a Royal Commission reported against such a proposal; but a very considerable minority on that Commission were of opinion that that circumstance should not be allowed to stand in the way of the change. As the Report of the Commission on the Highlands and Islands had been laid upon the Table of the House, although it was not yet in the hands of Members, he thought he was entitled to refer to it so far as to say that the Commission which sat last year found it necessary to touch in their Report upon this particular point, and by a very large majority, indeed, they reported that Procurators Fiscal should be strictly confined to their duties. He trusted the Lord Advocate would look at this matter seriously, as the speech of the hon. Member for Buteshire (Mr. Dalrymple) showed that it was not a Party question. The time, he thought, had come when the Government must take up this question by deciding it as a whole. It was not, he thought, necessary to have a Procurator Fiscal in each county. An efficient person might be appointed to a certain district, and deserving men could have their positions improved by transfer from minor to more important districts. He thought they were entitled to call upon the Lord Advocate to give a very explicit answer as to what the Government intended to do. If they did not obtain such an answer, the hon. Member for Glasgow was bound, by a Division, to test the opinion of the Scottish Members.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that he did not altogether agree with all that had been said by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane), and neither could he endorse some of the observations which fell from the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron). A main principle of the Motion of the hon. Member, however, was one which must commend itself to the House. It was most desirable, wherever it was possible, that Procurators should be paid entirely by salaries, and not by private practice. The question was a practical and financial one, as well as one of area; but he had doubts as to whether the proposal in the Motion could be carried out in every case, both on account of the area of the district and the salary to be given. He hoped the Lord Advocate would be able to tell them that the object they had in view, if not entirely, would to a large degree be entertained. With regard to General Burroughs, he thought it was a matter of regret that he had refused to give a promise to the Commission that he would take no steps against any tenants who came forward as witnesses. In one case that had been brought forward against General Burroughs the man was not a tenant at all, but merely the relation of a tenant who had been allowed to remain on.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): There can be no doubt of the importance of the question that has been raised by this Motion; but I scarcely think it will be expected that I should traverse the earlier part of my hon. Friend's address, in which he entered into, or touched upon, some of the more general questions arising as between public and private prosecutions. We know that that is a very vexed question; but, I think, on the whole, we in Scotland prefer our own system. Of course, that system is not perfect; but the statement I have just made will have general assent. I should scarcely have thought it necessary to say this much had it not been for some language which fell from the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Macfarlane) in regard to that system. The system which prevails in Scotland, I believe, not only leads to the detection of crime more effectually than the system which prevails in the South, but it affords very important safeguards to the innocent. We have in Scotland prosecutions conducted by responsible public officials; and inquiries which are carried out, not by any means with the object of obtaining a conviction, right or wrong, but for the purpose of obtaining full information in the first place, and of seeking a conviction only if the responsible authorities are satisfied that the accused are really guilty. Each case is examined in a judicial spirit; and no proceedings are directed to be taken except in cases where it is believed there is guilt, and where there is a reasonable prospect of that guilt being established by evidence. Undoubtedly, a very important protection is thus thrown around persons who may have become the victims of suspicion, or of charges which prove to be unfounded. On that point I think there is great superiority in the Scotch system. I do not go into the matter of declarations, which my hon. Friend touched upon; but that does seem to me to be a very important feature of our system, because it gives an accused person, as soon as he is apprehended and put under charge, an opportunity of saying anything he chooses, but he is not compelled to speak. An opportunity is offered to him to say anything he has to say; and I well know from experience that this not infrequently results in innocent persons, when they tell what is a true story, which is immediately investigated, being set at liberty. No doubt, it does sometimes happen that embarrassing admissions are made by guilty persons, or falsehoods told, which, when they come to be confronted with the evidence given at the trial, aid in their conviction; but I do not suppose anyone will think that is to the public disadvantage. In one criticism of my hon. Friend I very much sympathize—namely, that which he made in regard to prisoners not being allowed access to their solicitors or their friends during a particular stage of the inquiry. On that point I feel the force of what has been said. But, in coming to the main question raised by my hon. Friend, I think it right to say he must be under some misapprehension. Those who are not familiar with our Scotch system would greatly err if they supposed Procurators Fiscal have nearly the amount of power which he—no doubt inadvertently—led the House to suppose. A Procurator Fiscal, in what he does, acts both under the Sheriff of the county, and under the Lord Advocate and his subordinates in the Crown Office. He is amenable to both; and while it is true that some of the more trivial cases are not reported to the Crown Office, all grave cases are reported to that, where they are considered, and further proceedings or further inquiries are directed, or no proceedings ordered, as the Lord Advocate or his deputies think right. It would, therefore, be quite a mistake to imagine that a Procurator Fiscal has anything like large judgment and entire control which might have been supposed from some portions of my hon. Friend's speech. The system is well known to Scotch Members; and I do not think it is necessary to say more on that head. In regard to the more general question of principle which has been raised, I should entirely assent to the view that, wherever you can get competent and efficient men to devote their services exclusively to this or any other public duty, it is desirable that such exclusive services should be obtained; and that, I think, is the main proposition that my hon. Friend desires to have affirmed. But that must always be under conditions; and I think my hon. Friend recognizes this in one part of his Resolution, when he says that "wherever possible" they shall be restrained from engaging in private practice. This I interpret as a recognition of the fact that, without greatly higher salaries, it would be quite impossible to obtain the exclusive services of gentlemen of the class who have hitherto held the office of Procurator Fiscal. It is, however, not merely a question of money, as I shall immediately point out. Something has been said in regard to the union and the consolidation of the areas which are under the charge of different Fiscals; and if this could be accomplished, one very great difficulty would be got over. If it were possible, by placing a larger district under the authority of one man, to amalgamate offices now held separately, this would afford a means of providing an adequate salary for one good official. But anyone who is familiar with Scotland must know that that is very seldom possible. The great difficulty is that you cannot, if our system is to be effectively worked, have Procurators Fiscal located at too great distances from each other. You must have the Procurators Fiscal reasonably accessible to the inhabitants of the particular area, so that the police may report to him, and he may be able to proceed with his investigation as speedily as possible, going personally, in many cases, to the place where the crime has been committed, and also that witnesses may be brought to him for precognition. It will, therefore, be seen that there is a practical limit to the consolidation or union of areas; and it often is necessary, and, I fear, will remain necessary, to have a Procurator Fiscal at places where his official duties do not give him full employment. In many other branches of the Public Service you can work a man to the full by putting more districts under his authority; but, for the reasons I have stated, this frequently could not be done in the case of a Procurator Fiscal. There is nothing more familiar in human experience than this—that if you are to have an efficient man you must have a man in reasonably full employment. You get the best work out of the man who is worked up to nearly or altogether to his full power, and there can be no doubt that if in the area which is under the charge of a man who has not full employment in his official duties, and who is debarred from taking other work, he would degenerate. His energy, his vigilance, his sagacity, his penetration—all those qualities which make a good Fiscal—would seriously suffer. So that, while I acknowledge the general principle contended for by my hon. Friend, I say that the qualification “wherever possible” should be extended to the whole of his Resolution. This matter was very fully considered by the Royal Commission which sat on the Scottish Law Courts from 1868 to 1871; and we who are familiar with it know that it was probably one of the strongest Commissions which has ever inquired into the important range of subjects submitted to it. A great deal of evidence was laid before that Commission, and most of the Members were men who had themselves had great practical experience of its working. It is only right that I should read the few lines in which they dealt with the subject now before the House, for the purpose of showing that it is not quite so easy or so plain a matter as might be thought from the speech of my hon. Friend. These lines read—

“With reference to the office of Procurator Fiscal, we approve of the mode in which these officials were appointed, and the conditions under which they hold office. The majority do not concur in the suggestion that Procurators Fiscal should be prohibited from private practice, and think the effect of such a prohibition might not infrequently be to prevent the public from obtaining for this important office the services of the most suitable person. The minority, who consider that the ends of justice would be better attained if the Procurators Fiscal were debarred from private professional practice, are at the same time persuaded that this view can only be carried out by enlarging the present rates of salaries allowed to these officials, and giving them a corresponding retiring allowance.”

It will be seen that there was a majority of that exceedingly well-informed and influential Commission who did not see their way to laying down any such hard-and-fast rule.

MR. MACFARLANE: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman read the names?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): The list is a long one. I will give it to the hon. Member; but I may only mention to the House that the Members comprised many of the most eminent lawyers in England and Scotland, and gentlemen representing varied interests. The hon. Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr-Ewing), the right hon. Member for North Hants (Mr. Sclater-Booth), and the present Lord Provost of Edinburgh (Mr. Harrison) were Members of that Commission, which, alike from its constitution and the result of its labours, commanded the greatest respect in Scotland. To the general principle I entirely assent; and the best evidence of this, both with respect to this particular office and another office that has been referred to, is that in nearly every case of the appointment of a Sheriff Clerk with which I have had to do, a clause has been inserted in the Commission restraining the person appointed from engaging in private practice. I may point out that the appointment of Procurators Fiscal does not rest with the Government. Under the Act of 1877, Fiscals are appointed by the Sheriff, and only the approval of the Home Secretary is required. But I may add, with respect to the vacancies that have occurred since I have been in Office, that whenever the Sheriff has spoken to me before making an appointment, I have asked—"Is there such a salary as will induce a good man to accept the office, giving up other work?" In some cases such a man has been found, in others he has not; but I think the House will see that the general principle is recognized by the Government, and that as far as the conditions of the case will permit.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY: What of the case of Aberdeen?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I cannot speak as to that; the appointment was made before I came into Office. I think it is to be regretted that my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow should have thought it necessary, in support of the general principle which he advocated, to say some things to which I cannot assent, but from which I must express a very emphatic dissent. He said, among other things, that there was no class regarded with so wide suspicion as the Procurators Fiscal in Scotland. ["Hear, hear!"] I entirely dissent from that statement. I think I have had as good means as most people—and better, perhaps, than my hon. Friend—for many years past of knowing what sort of men Procurators

Fiscal are, and also of ascertaining the public estimate of them; and I can say that I do not believe that there exists in Scotland, or in any other country, a body of more honourable, or more zealous public officials, or of public servants who are more efficient in the discharge of their duties. I have not only to judge of their work, but to consider any complaints that may be urged against them, either in respect of omission or of over-zeal; and the result of the inquiries made has been generally, if not almost invariably, to vindicate the Procurators Fiscal. In none of the cases which we have had occasion to investigate have we found the conduct of any one of those gentlemen deserving of censure on the ground of impropriety. There may have been errors of judgment; but I regret that my hon. Friend used the expression to which I have referred, as I am satisfied that it was not in accordance with the fact. He mentioned a number of particular cases in aid of his general argument, and he classed these under various heads. The first I understand to be cases in which he says that proceedings should have been taken and were not taken; and he mentioned a class of offences under an Act of Parliament of which he was the author which dealt with certain classes of bankruptcy frauds. In this connection he stated that there were scores of cases in which no proceedings were taken. I daresay there are scores of cases in which no proceedings are taken, because I have considered many of them myself, and have directed that proceedings should not be taken; but if my hon. Friend means to say that there have been scores of cases under that Statute in which proceedings were not taken when they ought to have been taken, then I must entirely deny the statement. Numbers of cases have been reported and sent up in due course by the Fiscals to the Crown Office and there considered by the Advocates Depute—very often by the Solicitor General and myself—and where we have thought that a case of contravention of the Act was made out, we have always directed proceedings to be taken; but many cases have been reported in which there was really no ground for proceeding under the Statute. This is, perhaps, a class of cases in which people are sometimes disappointed that proceedings are not taken ; because creditors are very apt to smart when they do not get their money, and a certain element of intelligible vindictiveness enters into their conduct in pressing such charges. It, therefore, becomes the duty of those who have to examine such cases to apply their judgment and knowledge of the law and of facts ; and I think, if my hon. Friend had the details of these cases, he would not be able to show any case in which proceedings should have been taken and were not taken. A number of other matters were entered into by my hon. Friend, in regard to which I do not think it would be right to detain the House. The Old Mill Reformatory case was the subject of a very careful and detailed inquiry by Mr. Rutherford, now Sheriff-Substitute in Edinburgh, and Dr. Littlejohn. It was a very mysterious business in the end as well as in the beginning ; but it certainly is not the case that the facts were not sifted. The facts were sifted in the fullest possible way, not only by local inquiry, but by this Commission sent down from Edinburgh, consisting of gentlemen having no sort of connection with the locality. My hon. Friend referred to another case where he said there should have been a prosecution—

DR. CAMERON explained that he was referring to the same subject.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) : The result of not one, but of several inquiries into this matter, failed to show that there had been any adulteration of the supply of milk. I know there was a statement sent out in a document purporting to show that from the quantity of milk sold compared with the actual yield there must have been water in it. Rival calculations were made ; but the judgment of that entirely impartial tribunal was to establish that nothing of the kind had been proved. It was, undoubtedly, a very mysterious disease ; and it was supposed that it must have been due to some singular fungus which had got into the water used either in washing out the pails or put into the milk. But there was no evidence which would have warranted a prosecution in any Court. Something has been said in regard to the expense of certain proceedings with reference to lunatics. I have been asked a Question about the same matter before, and it seemed to me then, as it does now, that the expense was very great. Some communications have taken place on that subject, and the matter is being inquired into. There are some other detailed matters that have been mentioned ; but I do not think I should detain the House by going into them. While we assent to the general principle—and I think we have shown the sincerity of that assent by carrying out that principle as far as it was in our power—I am afraid that there are difficulties in the way of carrying it fully into effect which my hon. Friend may not have appreciated, but which I think, from what I have said, the House will understand. It is not necessary to occupy the time of the House by going into what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George Campbell). He recognized the general excellence of the system, but thought it might be improved ; and, of course, all of us would be glad to improve it if we could. I did regret the language employed by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane), and it did come in very striking, as well as very sudden, contrast to the language of my hon. Friend the Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs ; because while my hon. Friend the Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs spoke with approbation of the criminal system of Scotland generally, the hon. Member for Carlow thought fit to characterize it as “corrupt and rotten.” I am glad that language was not used by a Scotch Member. I am quite sure it would not be endorsed by any Scotch Member ; and I think I may say the same of a good deal of the other language which the hon. Member for Carlow thought fit to employ. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour) put some questions in regard to some particular accounts. I have not all the details of these accounts. The head he referred to contains a great variety of expenses. There are still a few Fiscals who are paid by fees. Most of them are paid by salary, but there are still a few who are paid by fees ; and these, with other charges, are entered under the general head to which my hon. and gallant Friend refers. I may point out, before sitting down, that while this matter has been, and will be, kept in view in future appointments, it would, of course, be impossible, without very large compensation, to alter the tenure of those who took office under the system which now prevails. It has been always regarded—and I think rightly regarded—as of paramount importance to get the services of the very best men for this class of work—men who will command—as I believe they do command—the confidence of the country as a whole. Many of them have been engaged in private practice before and since their appointment; and it is quite plain that the tenure of their office could not be altered after they had accepted it without seeing that full justice was done to them. I hope my hon. Friend will be satisfied with what I have said, and will see that the matter has not been overlooked, and will not be overlooked.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE considered the statement of the Lord Advocate entirely unsatisfactory. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had distinctly admitted that it would be desirable, if possible, to have Procurators Fiscal devoting all their time to the duties of the office; but he had gone on to point out various objections, which resolved themselves into this—that it would cost more. He (Mr. Dick-Peddie) thought that in a matter of so great importance to Scotland a few hundred, or even a few thousand pounds should not be allowed to stand in the way of a change which was necessary to secure public confidence in the administration of justice. The Lord Advocate had also contended that it would be necessary, in some parts of the country where the population was scanty, to maintain the present system. But those were the very districts in which it was necessary for the Procurators Fiscal to be free from every kind of entanglement with local interests; for in the large towns, such as Glasgow and Edinburgh, the chances were that the Procurators would not be interested in the cases brought to their notice otherwise than from their official position, whereas in the country districts the probability was that the reverse would be the case. As to the salary to be paid to officials of this class, he thought the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) took too low an estimate of the amount when he spoke of £300 or £350. He thought that men having the necessary qualifications for the post, with regard alike to legal knowledge, high character, and experience of life, would not be properly remunerated at that rate. The question was one which the Treasury must face. It was monstrous that in a country which contributed so much as Scotland did to the Imperial Exchequer a matter of a few thousand pounds should be allowed to stand in the way of a more efficient method of administering justice. He thought that in a discussion of this kind, turning, after all, upon a question of money, they ought to be favoured with the presence of a Representative of the Treasury. He observed the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) looked in a short time ago; but apparently he just came into the House to go out. Certainly he was not here more than five minutes. The Lord Advocate confessed that the difficulty was one of money; and he knew perfectly well that there was a strong feeling in Scotland that until this money difficulty was got over, and Procurators Fiscal were made entirely independent of other influences of every kind, the poorer classes in Scotland would never be sure of receiving justice. Although he was far from joining in saying anything against the Procurators Fiscal generally—for he knew the great majority of them were men who were above suspicion—still, the system exposed them to temptations which ought not to exist. No system ought to be maintained in public life which did so expose them. He did not wish to prolong the discussion; but rose merely to tell the Lord Advocate that he must not suppose that his statement would satisfy the Scotch people, or that the Scotch Members would allow the matter to rest until the Government faced the financial difficulty.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he thought the Scotch Members had great reason to be dissatisfied with the action of the Government in this matter, especially as no Representative of the Treasury had been present. He was much disappointed by the speech of the Lord Advocate, for the right hon. and learned Gentleman defended the system to a large extent. In his opinion, the system of appointing public prosecutors who were also engaged in private business was altogether indefensible. He was not prepared to say that in very many cases serious harm to justice arose; but certainly, where the Procurator Fiscal was engaged in a large private business, he often found himself in a position in which no man should be placed; and though he might not give way to the temptations to which he was exposed, yet he was open—and necessarily open—to suspicion in many cases. He assured the Lord Advocate that there was a very strong feeling of dissatisfaction in Scotland; and he hoped the Scotch Members would take a Division on the subject as a protest against the present system, and against the manner in which Scotland was being treated by the Government and the Treasury officials. The Lord Advocate had admitted that the question was a question of money, and the proper Treasury official ought to have been present to hear the views of the Scotch Members on the subject.

MR. McLAGAN said, there could be no doubt that it would be for the advantage of the public that Procurators Fiscal should have no private practice, but that they should be paid sufficient to enable them to perform the public business without any extraneous support. At the same time, he dissented from a great deal that had been said as to the position of the Procurators Fiscal of the country. There was not a more capable body of men, so far as he was acquainted with them. They discharged their duties most impartially, and in their hands the administration of justice was perfectly safe. He could not, however, conceal the fact that their conducting private practice, and having landed proprietors and others as their clients, exposed them to suspicion which they did not deserve. It would, therefore, be for the advantage of the public that they should be paid from public funds, and have no private practice whatever. The speech of the Lord Advocate seemed to him to have been somewhat misrepresented. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he defended the Motion theoretically; but that, under present circumstances, he did not see his way to yield to the proposals made by the hon. Member for Glasgow. Still, he agreed with those hon. Members who had stated that this question seemed to have been shunted, and not treated as it ought to have been by the Government. Certainly, some Member of the Treasury ought to have been present to give his views on the subject, seeing that this was more a financial question than anything else. If a Division were taken he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow, for this reason—that he thought Procurators Fiscal should be paid by salary and have no private practice.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he hoped that before they went to a Division the House would know clearly what they were to divide upon. There was an apparent contradiction between the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow and the speech in which he introduced it. In his Motion he proposed that the change he suggested should be made wherever practicable—in other words, he admitted that there were cases in which it was impossible. The Lord Advocate had, moreover, shown that he was anxious to adopt the principle wherever it was possible. Therefore, on that point, the Government and the hon. Member were agreed. He thought the hon. Member had fixed the salary too low in placing it at £350 a-year. They were now obtaining the services of some men to whom they paid £800 to £1,000 a-year, some of them being the most influential and able men they could obtain; and he thought the scale of remuneration suggested by the hon. Member was much too low. The hon. Member had also said that he did not object to Procurators engaging in private business outside the area in which they were officially employed; but the only private business a man could undertake would necessarily be in that area. He thought that if the House were asked to divide on the Motion as it was worded, it would be placed in a very awkward position.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 35: Majority 17.—(Div. List, No. 63.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," again proposed.

POST OFFICE OFFICIALS—APPOINTMENT OF SOLICITORS TO POSTMASTERSHIPS.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL called attention to the impropriety of appointing solicitors in practice to Postmaster-ships. The hon. Baronet had given Notice of the following Resolution, which, however, by the Forms of the House, he was precluded from moving:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the responsibility of appointing to Postmasterships, whatever the salary attached to the appointment, should rest solely with the Postal Authorities, and that the present system of making such appointments in certain cases conditional upon a nomination by Members of Parliament, endorsed by the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury, is anomalous, and calculated to interfere with the efficiency of the Postal and Telegraph Service.”

He remarked that the Motion was not at all of a personal or local character, and that it was one which had a very wide application. As it originally stood on the Paper, it applied specifically to an individual case in his own country—namely, the appointment of a solicitor to the Postmastership of Keith on the recommendation of a Member of that House. But now he brought the matter forward entirely in the public interest; and hon. Members opposite would be the more inclined to admit this if he reminded them that this Motion was verbatim the same as one which was submitted to the House by the hon. Member for Glasgow in the last Parliament, and supported by a considerable number of the Gentlemen who now sat on the Treasury Bench. The support of the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite whom he had mentioned divested the Motion of anything like a personal or partizan character. He believed there could be nothing said against Mr. Fraser, who had been appointed Postmaster at Keith, either as regarded his private character or his business qualifications. But it so happened that a very sinister colour was thrown over the transaction by the fact that Mr. Fraser was at the time of his appointment political agent of the hon. Member for Banffshire (Mr. R. W. Duff). That position he had since resigned; but the wider objection still remained. In the two instances in Scotland in which solicitors had been appointed Postmasters, of which Inverness was one, both appointments were made previously to the telegraph being taken over by the Post Office; consequently, the objection which he and most people entertained to solicitors having access to controversial confidential information conveyed in telegrams did not apply in those cases. But the objection did apply now; and therefore he submitted that the appointment of a solicitor, as in this case, to an office which gave him such an insight into the affairs of his neighbours was most undesirable and improper. The terms of the present Motion, as he had said, were identical with one moved in the last Parliament by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron). In that case his hon. Friend the Member for Bucks (Mr. Fremantle) had recommended an individual in his own county for a certain Postmastership. This individual was not a solicitor, so there was no objection to him on that ground; but the hon. Member for Glasgow characterized his appointment on the recommendation of the hon. Member for Bucks as a discreditable piece of jobbery. The hon. Member for Bucks candidly said the reason he nominated him was not only that he was well fitted to discharge the duties, but that he was a good Tory. Perhaps that was the reason which led the hon. Member for Glasgow to characterize the appointment as a piece of jobbery. He, however, did not wish to use any such expressions as to the recommendation of his hon. Friend the Member for Banffshire (Mr. Duff); but if he did he should have a precedent which was endorsed by the support of eight Members of Her Majesty's Government when in Opposition, including the present Postmaster General. It was on no personal or private grounds that he objected to this appointment. He appealed to the Postmaster General whether it would not be in the public interest that appointments such as this should be made by the Department over which he presided, and entirely without any reference either to the Member for the county in which the office was situated, or to the Government candidate at the last Election? It would be in the public interest, and in the interest of Members themselves; because he could imagine few things more irksome or more harassing than to have to decide between the competing claims of half-a-dozen candidates for some twopenny-halfpenny post office in a rural district. He submitted these considerations to the Postmaster General in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would show himself of the same mind as he was in 1878; and if he was not able to support the Motion by his vote, that he would give some very good ground for departing from the conclusion at which he then arrived.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, he was not prepared to go into the general question which had been raised by his hon. Friend; but in the course of his speech he had alluded to an appointment for which he (Mr. Duff) might say he was responsible. With regard to Mr. Fraser's appointment, at the time the office became vacant he (Mr. Duff) applied to the usual authorities to know if a practising solicitor was capable of holding the appointment, and he ascertained that such an appointment had frequently been made. There was no doubt Mr. Fraser was admitted to be a most competent person for the office. A Memorial had been addressed to the Postmaster General since the appointment had been criticized, to which there were 989 signatories, two-thirds of whom were householders in the district, expressing their confidence in the appointment. On the other hand, a Petition had been got up against Mr. Fraser, signed by eight individuals, two of whom were non-resident, and who happened to be agents of the Conservative Party in the district. His hon. Friend had also alluded to an occasion when a similar subject was brought before the House some years ago. On that occasion he (Mr. Duff) voted in favour of these appointments being given by the Treasury; and he was much obliged to his hon. Friend for recalling the fact, because it was a proof of his (Mr. Duff's) consistency on the present occasion. With regard to the opinions entertained by the Postmaster General, he thought his right hon. Friend would rather like to see the appointments in the hands of the Post Office; but during the time he had been in Office the Treasury had always exercised that patronage, and he did not suppose those who held Office under the Treasury would like to see it given up. And if his hon. Friend would refer to the Division List in 1878, he would find that all his own Friends connected with the Treasury were in favour of these appointments being given to the Treasury. With regard to the fact of a Postmaster being a solicitor, he had no doubt objection might exist on the ground of his having access to telegrams; but, on the other hand, the Post Office was not prepared to pay people to do the work of the Post Office exclusively.

If an appointment of this kind was given to a grocer he would equally know all about everything that was going on among the other grocers, and he did not know that such an appointment would be any improvement upon the present system. He might remind his hon. Friend, in view of his objection to a solicitor having the appointment, that the Inverness Post Office, which was a much more important office than Keith, was given, he believed, by a Conservative Member who was very much respected—Mr. Baillie.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: That was before the telegraphs were taken over by the Post Office.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, that was quite true; but the Conservative Government never cancelled the appointment after that date. He did not think a case had been made out against the appointment in question; and he was quite satisfied it was one which had given great satisfaction to the neighbourhood.

MR. GORST said, he thought that the hon. Member had done good service by calling attention to the matter. This was the only instance of patronage in which a Member of the Party which happened at the time to be in Office was allowed to recommend a person to the Public Service, not for his fitness to discharge the duties of the office, but because he happened to be a political supporter. In that question both Governments were equally to blame; but he was quite sure that the Postmaster General would not say one thing when in Opposition and another when in Office; and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would support the Motion. He had no desire whatever to throw any blame in this matter upon the present Government, because he was confident that if the Front Opposition Bench were occupied when the Estimates were being discussed, the Members of the late Government would have to confess that they were as much to blame with regard to this subject as their political opponents. The real fault lay with the system under which these appointments were made. He trusted that now that the attention of the Government had been drawn to this subject, that system would be put an end to.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, with all due respect to the hon. Member for Parliament. The question was, would the Government allow the Charity Commissioners to override an Act of Parliament? He was tired of applying to the Charity Commissioners. He was told that if he went to them he would get what he wanted; but he went to them once, and he would not go again. He did not see why he should ask as a favour that which they were bound to do by Act of Parliament. A case had been brought to his notice in which the Trustees were selling a piece of land; and when the purchasers found that the sale was contrary to Act of Parliament they wished to withdraw; but the Charity Commissioners would not allow them. The sale was completed, and the land lost to the men. There was very little doubt that the Charity Commissioners were at the back of the vendors in this case, and that they had arbitrarily overridden an Act of Parliament, the terms of which were mandatory. If they continued to act as they had hitherto done, it must follow that the Orders of the House of Commons would become subordinate to those of the Commissioners. If necessary, he could give 60 or 70 cases where the Act had been disregarded; and it was rendered absolutely impossible for those for whose benefit it was passed to reap any advantage from it. Men began to despair; and in a letter, which he had unfortunately not brought with him, a labourer in Norfolk said that, before the passing of the Act, he had intended to emigrate, but had decided otherwise when the Act was passed. He had thought he could get along with a bit of land; but now, since he had seen that the Act had not been carried out, he was determined to emigrate, as this country was evidently no place for a poor man. He (Mr. Jesse Collings) believed that that was true to a large extent; and what he contended for was that the Commissioners were not judges of what the Act should be. They were intended to be simply a Court of Appeal to compel unwilling Trustees to carry out the Act. It might be urged, however, that there had been a Select Committee appointed to consider the subject, and why not wait? But it must be borne in mind that a year and a-half had gone already, and comparatively little had been done. The people whose cause he was advocating were not Soudanese or Blacks, or they might get attention, but common English people, who were suffering a great wrong through being deprived of the benefits which that House had intended to confer upon them. He hoped no mere perfunctory answer would be given by the Government to the serious case he had brought before the House.

MR. MUNDELLA asked what other answer could be possibly made to the elaborate statements which had taken over an hour to lay before the House? There was no man in the House more thoroughly in sympathy with the Allotments Act than himself; and he believed almost any man who had the interests of the peasantry of this country at heart would be anxious to facilitate the Act. The course taken by the hon. Gentleman was inconvenient and somewhat unfair. The charges made by the hon. Gentleman should either have been communicated to him in advance, so that he could have made inquiry, or they should be investigated by the Select Committee which was appointed a short time ago. His right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works was the Chairman of the Committee; and a Member of the Committee was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), than whom no one had done more in obtaining allotments for labourers. He thought the constitution of the Committee was a guarantee that the subject would be thoroughly threshed out. The Commissioners had come before him in cases affecting his own Office, and he had always found them as anxious as he was himself to carry out the Act. [MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The men have not the land.] As the Act only came into operation last year, they would hardly have the land by this time. Undoubtedly, there were difficulties and obstacles in the way in some cases; but the Commissioners had endeavoured, over and over again, in those cases, to induce the Trustees to facilitate the working of the Act. As to the removal of Trustees, that was no easy matter, and a good deal of legal procedure had to be gone through before that could be done. Then, again, his hon. Friend had said that the answers he had made in a particular case were not candid answers. As far as he was con-

most cases, the applicants were now no better off than they were 18 months ago, when they began their applications. There were thousands of men who, when the Allotments Extension Act was passed, looked upon it as a little salvation for them, and their disappointment was very great when they found that they had been deprived of the benefit which it conferred upon them. The applications made to the Charity Commissioners during the last 16 months to see that the law should be enforced had proved fruitless. The men had been, in many cases, told that the land was too remote, while, in fact, it was quite near and very suitable. These English agricultural labourers had displayed exemplary patience in the matter. While in Scotland they heard that something like revolution would ensue if justice were not done, the labourers in England were very patient, though they had in one case threatened to out the church bell ropes. The men felt the grievance all the more acutely, because the provisions of the Act of Parliament were clear and precise. He maintained that the Commissioners had no right to decide, as they had done in some cases, that grass land should not be put into the hands of the men. The Commissioners excused themselves by saying that the income from grass lands would be greater than if these lands were cut up. But what were the facts? Among others, he would mention to the House a case which occurred at Haddenham. There the land was grass land; but the men were refused it. The land was let locally at about £5 for 10 acres, and the men were asked to pay 32s. an acre for it. That land was let at the rate of about 10s. an acre. Now, where was the advantage to the Charity? Then there was another case which was published in The Bury and Norwich Post. The editor of that paper complained very properly of the manner in which the labourers were treated. He said that the land was let in allotments to 16 villagers. That word "villagers" sounded very well; but the worst of it was that the land had previously been let at 40s. an acre, while the cottagers were obliged to pay 55s. for it. That was illegal, because the Act said that the plots should be let at the same rate as land of the same quality in the parish. The editor went on to say, however, that he did not think the men would gain much by their plots this year, owing to the high rent, though they might, perhaps, do so next year. The men were afraid of the Charity Commissioners, and they mistrusted them. When the Act was before the House of Commons a Petition was sent in its favour from a district with which he was acquainted, and the Petitioners prayed that no power should be placed in the hands of the Charity Commissioners for the purpose of granting allotments; but that the power should be vested in the Vestry, which had hitherto exercised wisely the powers that had been intrusted to it. He hoped that when a Local Authority in counties was created the management of these lands would be one of the duties intrusted to it. He would point out that in many cases the labourers were willing to give a higher rent for the land than the Trustees obtained from others to whom they let it; and that when the Allotments Association wrote to the Charity Commissioners on the subject they declined to discuss it, except with persons interested under the Act. It was not a question now between the labourers and the Charity Commissioners, but between the Charity Commissioners and the Government. He hailed the time when local self-government would be established, which would enable the labourers to protect themselves. People talked about setting class against class; but the action of the Charity Commissioners, especially in the matter of these allotments, had tended more to set class against class than any agitation that he knew of. He had seen it, and could prove it by letters which he had received. Sometimes, also, the Trustees demanded payment of a year's rent in advance. Now, to ask an agricultural labourer to pay down two or three sovereigns in advance, as had been done, was adding insult to injury. Representative rural governments would prevent such injustice as he had described, and would be only second in importance to the Representation of the People Bill. The condition of these men was one that entitled them to fair and generous consideration; and that, he thought, they had not had. He had himself taxed the Chairman of the Charity Commissioners (Sir Seymour Fitzgerald) with unhandsome opposition to the Bill during its passage through of potato cultivation would render the land barren and unfruitful, and certainly not worth half or even a fourth so much rent as it now fetches. Again, with regard to the possibility of carrying out this Act, I am inclined to say that, in the majority of the cases, it is almost impossible to carry out the Act. In the county with which I am most intimately acquainted, many parishes had allotments made when the common was inclosed, for the purpose of cutting fuel. If there be any fuel in the shape of peat to be dug it is dug up, and the land is consequently rendered comparatively valueless; and if the allotment be not suited for the purposes of fuel, it is often situated at the remote end of the common, and at a considerable distance from the houses. I know of several instances in which these allotments run to the extent of from 10 to 20 and even 30 acres; and they are, generally speaking, let to small traders or small farmers in the adjacent village. But if they are to be let as allotments they are, in the first place, often very inconveniently situated. I may also say that I do not think the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ipswich has the slightest knowledge of the difficulty that is experienced in taking two or three acres of these fields for the purposes of allotments. The expense of putting up and maintaining fences, and of providing a road or even a path is considerable; and there is no certainty, as the hon. and learned Gentleman near me (Mr. Elton) has pointed out, that the tenants will continue to hold the land. Also, I am quite sure that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ipswich is not aware that the allotments have gone very much out of favour with agricultural labourers during the last few years. In my own district these allotments are, I am happy to say, very general, and when situated near a village and where they are let in plots not exceeding half an acre or a quarter of an acre—which is usually about all a man can cultivate with a spade—in such cases the allotments are most valuable. But I am sorry to say that I have noticed in that district within the last seven or eight years, and more particularly within the last two or three years, that a number of these allotments have remained unlet, and that the cultivation of others has very seriously deteriorated.

POST OFFICE OFFICIALS—APPOINTMENT OF SOLICITORS TO POSTMASTERSHIPS.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he was sorry to draw the attention of the House from this subject back to the remarkable conduct of the Ministers, and especially the Postmaster General, in not making any answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell). He had risen to speak upon the question when the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) had caught the Speaker's eye. He observed the Secretary to the Treasury in his place; and he hoped that, as the Postmaster General was absent, he would deal with the question which had been raised by the hon. Member for Wigtonshire as to the patronage of the Treasury in the case of the smaller Postmasterships. That patronage was a great misfortune both to the State and to individuals. It was admitted that the hon. Member for Banffshire (Mr. R. W. Duff) had obtained the appointment of Postmaster for his local agent at Keith—a solicitor—and it was obvious that great injustice might be done to other legal practitioners in the town by the circumstance that all telegrams passed through his office. It was an unusual course for a Member of the Government to take to remain silent when a question was raised impugning the manner in which the patronage of his Department had been administered. This silence was the more remarkable that the right hon. Gentleman had, some few years ago, voted in support of a Motion almost identical with that which had been put on the Paper by the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigtonshire but which he was not able to move by reason of the Forms of the House. The Motion to which he referred was also supported on that occasion by the Secretary to the Treasury, the present Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Ashley), the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), and by several other Members of the Government. He hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would assure the House that the Treasury was willing to hand over this patronage to the Post Office.

Mr. E. STANHOPE said, he thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Eye was quite justified in calling attention to the great want of courtesy on the part of the Government. Surely the question now raised was of sufficient importance to claim some little attention even from Her Majesty's Government. The absence of the Postmaster General at that moment was somewhat significant.

MR. COURTNEY: He went away because the discussion was over.

MR. E. STANHOPE: As far as I can judge, the discussion is still going on.

MR. COURTNEY: There has been a long discussion on another subject.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he was aware that some speeches had been interposed; but he thought the Government should offer some explanation of their silence, and tell the House that they either would or would not look into the matter.

MR. COURTNEY said, that the discussion had been raised an hour ago in the presence of the Postmaster General. He himself had not been in the House when the discussion began, and the Postmaster General left when the discussion dropped. ["No!"] At all events, the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) got up and raised a discussion on a new subject. The hon. Member for Eye had attacked him (Mr. Courtney); but he knew as little about the matter as the hon. Member for Eye himself, so that his attack was perfectly uncalled for.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK held that it was the duty of the Members of the Government to remain on the Treasury Bench until the House went into Committee of Supply. Not long ago the House had to comment on the absence of Ministers from that Bench, which showed what a great change was coming over the conduct of the Business of the House. Unless hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who received pay for sitting on the Treasury Bench attended to their duties, it was high time the House took the matter into its own hands.

MR. WARTON said, that the present conduct of the Government was part of a system which began the very first night of the Session by having a Minister present who was not to speak, and by having the Minister absent who was to speak. So, that night, they had a Minister present who said he knew nothing whatever about the subject before the House, and the Minister who knew about it was absent. He thought the House had a right to complain of this.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER declared that the conduct of the Postmaster General in leaving the House without replying to the speech of the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell) was unworthy of a right hon. Gentleman occupying such a position. In his (Major General Alexander's) view, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) was right in expressing an opinion that the patronage, as far as the appointment of Postmasters was concerned, should not be in the hands of private individuals, but of a public Department.

MR. BIGGAR observed, that the Members of the present Government were too much in the habit of blowing hot and cold, advocating political purity when they were in Opposition, but pursuing a different course of conduct when they came into power. The case brought before the House was a glaring instance of indirect corruption, and the real reason the Postmaster General did not reply was that he felt the transaction was indefensible. All these appointments should be made by competitive examination. It was most unjust that a political attorney should have the means of knowing what private telegrams to his political and legal rivals were about. In his opinion, judgment ought to go against the Government in this matter by default.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON complained of the contemptuous manner in which a question affecting the interests of the agricultural labourers had been treated by the Government, and expressed his surprise that when a charge of having perpetrated a job had been brought against the Government, the Secretary to the Treasury, who knew nothing about the matter, had been put up to reply.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £30,603, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Maintenance and Repair of Royal Palaces."

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR wished to make an appeal to the Secretary to the Treasury in regard to this Vote, which was one that had been subjected to a considerable amount of criticism year after year. What he desired was that the Secretary to the Treasury should give hon. Members a detailed statement with respect to the alterations and repairs which had been effected in some of the Palaces, and for what purposes made, so that they might have a proper idea of what the real state of things was. The last Government had consented to follow the plan as followed on the introduction of the Army and Navy Estimates, and for two Sessions made a statement for the purpose of placing the House in full possession of the facts of the case; and he thought it would only be fair that some explanation should be made in regard to the Civil Service Estimates by the Secretary to the Treasury, similar to those which the Secretary of State for War and the Secretary to the Admiralty now gave. There was also a statement made with regard to India. For years they had obtained from the Secretary of State for India a full and clear explanation of the alterations in the Indian Expenditure; and in regard to the Civil Service Votes, he thought that it was desirable that the Heads of the different Departments should draw up statements which would enable the Secretary to the Treasury to place the Committee in possession of full detailed information as to the various items included in the different Votes. He hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would hereafter attend to that request. What he particularly wanted in regard to this Vote was that some explanation should be given by the Chief Commissioner of Works in regard to the heavy charges which year after year took place in reference to the Royal Palaces. It was well known that some of these Royal Palaces were placed at the disposal of persons who were not Members of the Royal Family; and as they were allowed to occupy the Palaces free of expense, he was certainly of opinion that they ought to do the repairs that were necessary to maintain them in proper order.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was not quite sure whether he had properly caught the opening observations of the hon. and gallant Gentleman; but if he had gathered their purport rightly, the hon. and gallant Gentleman was of opinion that it was desirable that in introducing the Civil Service Estimates a statement should be made by the Minister in charge of them as to the variation in the different Votes similar to that which was given in regard to the Army and Navy Estimates. Upon that point he cordially agreed with the hon. and gallant Member. He certainly thought that the alterations made in many of the Votes were well worthy of the consideration of the Committee, and that some explanation should be given with regard to them. In the present Votes he found that there was an item of £548 transferred from Vote 3 to Vote 8, and having reference to Longford River, in the neighbourhood of Richmond. Last year, however, the amount of the Vote was only £110; and, therefore, the entry in the present Estimates intimating a simple transfer in the Vote was entirely misleading. Then, again, the third item in the Vote had reference to Hampton Court Palace, which appeared to have cost £12,000 out of a total of £36,000. Last year the amount required was £13,000. He thought it was a matter of interest to ascertain how much Hampton Court Palace had cost the country; and he would ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he was willing to furnish an Estimate of the amount of money spent on Hampton Court Palace during the last five years?

MR. LABOUCHERE congratulated the Government on the fact that they had succeeded in reducing this Vote by the sum of £4,000 from what it was last year. He had no doubt the reduction had been brought about in consequence of the criticisms which were passed upon the Vote last year; and he believed that if the same course were pursued this year there would be a further reduction next. He would, therefore, ask the Committee to agree to a Motion for reducing the Vote by a sum of £2,000. He thought, if that were done, there would be a reduction in the expenditure upon the Royal Palaces during the coming year by Her Majesty's Government, which would amount at least to another £4,000. There were at present in the Vote many items which ought not to figure in it at all; and he wanted to know upon what grounds so many Royal Palaces were maintained? He could well understand that, so long as the country was ruled by a Monarchy, there ought, at least, to be two Royal Palaces; but Her Majesty already possessed one at Windsor, which was one of the finest in the world, and in London there was Buckingham Palace. If hon. Members would look down the list given in the Vote they would see a large number of houses, palaces, cottages, and gardens, and goodness knew what, all of which cost a large sum of money to maintain. He did not know what their object was; and his own opinion was that a good many of them ought to be sold, or let, or pulled down. He saw one item for Frogmore House and Grounds, and another for the White Lodge in Richmond Park. With all due respect to Her Majesty, he wished to know if she ever resided at White Lodge or at Frogmore House, and why those buildings were put down as the Royal residences of Her Majesty? He did not object to St. James's Palace in London, because that was occasionally used for State purposes; but he saw items for Clarence House, and the residence of the Duke of Cambridge, &c. Now, very large sums of money were voted to every Member of the Royal Family; and he did not see that, in addition to those sums, the country should not only be bound to provide, but also to maintain a house for each of them. The expenditure was one which ought to be taken into consideration at the time provision was made for the Royal Family. His hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) complained of the expenditure incurred in regard to Hampton Court Palace. No doubt, Hampton Court Palace was a kind of poor-house for the aristocracy; but it was also a Palace for the people; and he doubted whether it was desirable to diminish the expenditure incurred in keeping it up.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR remarked, that ample provision was made for it in another Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had no doubt that was so; and that when the attention of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, or whoever represented the Government in the matter, was called to it, he would say that he did not know anything about it. He was glad to see that the Government had made some reduction from last year in the item of the Hampton Court Stud House. Instead of £900 being asked for, a sum of £490 only was to be spent this year upon that Stud House. He hoped the Government would be able to inform the Committee what the Stud House was wanted for at all. Then, again, there was an item of £495 for Bushy House, gardens, and stables; upper lodge, and paddocks; the cottage; Hawthorne Lodge; Waylands; and the park, and carpenters' cottages in Bushy Park. They were establishments which, probably, nobody had ever heard of before; and he should like to know what they were. Considering that the Royal Palaces provided for, and actually occupied by, Her Majesty, were liberally maintained by the country, and that the other Members of the Royal Family received large and handsome allowances, he thought the places they selected for their residences ought to be maintained out of their own means. He would, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £2,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £28,603, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Maintenance and Repair of Royal Palaces."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he hoped that no reduction would be considered necessary by the Committee, in regard to Hampton Court Palace at least. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had described Hampton Court Palace very incorrectly and unjustly as a retreat for the aristocracy. It was well known that Her Majesty, through the Government, had given up Hampton Court Palace to the relations, and especially to the widows, of distinguished officers who had fallen in the service of the Crown; and certainly the apartments of the Palace could not be devoted to a better use. The hon. Member admitted that it was also a people's Palace—that was to say, that it afforded a great amount of pleasure and recreation to the people of the Metropolis. There was also a valuable and interesting collection of paintings gathered together in Hampton Court Palace. He was bound to say that the criticisms which had been passed upon the Vote assumed, to his mind, a niggardly and pseudo-economical aspect. He did not think that any special reason had been given by the hon. Member for the reduction of the Vote; and until the hon. Member made a more authoritative statement it was desirable that the Committee should pause. He would take, for example, the criticisms which had been passed upon Bushy House and Park, and upon the lodges which were now maintained and kept up. Of course, in the preservation and maintenance of Parks of that kind some expense was necessary from year to year; but it would be found, on reference to the total expenditure, that it had only reached the sum of £394. He had no wish to defend the Vote in general. That was not his business, but must rest with Her Majesty's Government. He had only risen to defend the Vote for Hampton Court Palace; and he was bound to say that no reason had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Northampton for the reduction of the Vote.

Mr. RYLANDS said, the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) seemed to think that the demand made by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) for a more economical expenditure of the money of the country was only a pretence and a sham. Now, he (Mr. Rylands) did not wish to depart one iota from any of the conditions under which the public were charged with the maintenance of the Royal Palaces; but he wished to ask his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works to state under what Act these Royal Palaces were in the charge of the country, in order that hon. Members might distinctly understand which of these buildings they were bound under the Statute to maintain, and to what extent they were bound to maintain them? They would then be able to consider whether any of the buildings now brought under the Vote were brought under it without full justification. He should be perfectly ready himself to defer to the Act of Parliament. On a previous occasion his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works alluded to the fact that the Statute was passed in 1838, on the accession of Her Majesty to the Throne; and he would be very much obliged to his right hon. Friend if he would lay down distinctly the conditions under which the country was called on to maintain the various Palaces in the occupation of Her Majesty, and those which were not in her occupation. What he maintained was this—that the Government ought to be careful, under the present system of voting grants for repairing and keeping up these buildings, that they did not give to irresponsible people an opportunity of charging much larger sums, under cover of improvements and repairs, than were necessary. That was the point he wished to raise. A very considerable amount of expenditure went on from year to year which never would be incurred at all if the Royal personages who occupied these buildings had to pay for it out of their own pockets. He did not mean to say, under the present arrangement, that they ought to be called upon to bear the expense out of their own pockets; but what he contended was that the system which ought to be adopted should be one which would provide that the public would not be called upon to pay more than the persons who occupied the buildings if they had to pay it out of their own pockets. No doubt, the public had the greatest possible interest in maintaining Hampton Court Palace. It was one of the Establishments which the people of the Metropolis and of the country largely frequented and enjoyed to a very considerable extent. In point of fact, it was a national institution; and it would be most absurd to refuse to maintain it. At the present moment Hampton Court Palace might be said to be divided into two—that was to say, that one part of the institution was made use of for the occupation of persons who had, more or less, a claim upon the Crown for a recognition of their services, while the other part was thrown open for the enjoyment and recreation of the general public. Only a short time ago, in consequence of part of this national property being occupied in this peculiar and very objectionable manner by private persons, it was nearly burnt down, through some carelessness on the part of the servants of one of the persons who happened to be provided with one of the apartments. It was stated in the public Press at that time that it was a most short-sighted policy to have this people's Palace, thus occupied by private individuals, running the risk of having it destroyed in consequence of the carelessness of some housemaid, or of some servant employed in the building. It would be much better if the distinguished persons who were now supplied with apartments, or who had a claim on the Government, should have special grants provided for them, rather than that Hampton Court Palace should be converted into a kind of rabbit warren. Hon. Members must also bear in mind that it did not follow, because it was desirable to keep up Hampton Court Palace, that they should spend upon it the large sums now expended. The question was, were they spending more than was necessary? He suspected that they were spending more than was necessary, and that Hampton Court Palace could be maintained in such a manner as would amply protect the property for three-fourths of the amount now expended. He saw in the Vote another item for the Royal Mews at Pimlico, which had cost no less than £1,257 for ordinary repairs and maintenance. Hon. Members must further consider that this was not an exceptional year, because last year the Royal Mews at Pimlico cost just as much. [An hon. MEMBER: Rather more.] He could not conceive that, in maintaining the Royal Mews at Pimlico in a proper state of repair, it was necessary to expend anything like £1,250 a-year. He did not believe that anything of the kind was really incurred. He was quite satisfied that hon. Members in that House did not pay anything like the same proportion for keeping up their own mews; and that the amount now asked for in the Vote was far in excess of what it ought to be, compared with the amount which noblemen and hon. Members paid. ["No, no!"] He, certainly, had not much experience in the matter; but he had an idea that noble Lords and hon. Members would grumble somewhat strongly if they had to pay £1,250 a-year for the maintenance of their mews. If his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) went to a Division he should certainly vote with him; not from any indisposition to maintain the Royal Palaces, or to depart one iota from any condition in the agreement under which the House had undertaken to maintain all these buildings; but simply on the ground that in the Estimates from year to year there was abundant evidence to prove that that care and economy of administration were not practised which would be exercised if parties who enjoyed the advantage of those improvements and repairs had to pay for them out of their own pockets.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said, his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had commenced his remarks by admitting that the Vote showed a reduction of £4,000 as compared with the Vote of last year. He could assure the Committee that he had gone through the various items in the Vote with the greatest care; and, granting the necessity of maintaining and preserving these Royal Palaces, he did not think it was possible to make any further reduction upon them. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) asked under what Act of Parliament the duty of maintaining the Royal Palaces was thrown upon the country? His hon. Friend was mistaken in supposing that the duty was imposed by an Act of Parliament. The Royal Palaces were maintained by Votes of Parliament under an agreement with the Crown, which was made at the time when Her Majesty came to the Throne, and which was similar to the agreement entered into with previous Sovereigns. Under that agreement the Government undertook to maintain and keep certain Royal Palaces in repair. If Her Majesty had undertaken to defray those charges herself, as a matter of course the Civil List would have been much greater than it was. As the matter stood, the Government were certainly under an obligation to maintain and repair all the Palaces included in the Vote; and he did not think it was now open to them to decline to repair and maintain any one of them. Those Palaces were divided into two classes—first, those which were in the occupation of Her Majesty; and, secondly, those which were not in Her Majesty's occupation. With regard to those in the occupation of Her Majesty, the obligation of the Government was more full and complete than it was in respect to the second class; because the Government had to undertake the internal as well as the external repairs, but not the internal decorations. In the case of the Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty, but occupied by the persons placed there by Her Majesty, the internal repairs and decorations were not paid for out of that Vote; but the persons residing there, as in the instance of Hampton Court, had to do for themselves the internal repairs and decorations. The external repairs and improvements of the fabric came, however, under the present Vote. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley had called attention to the cost of Hampton Court Palace. No doubt Hampton Court Palace was a very large building. He did not think that hon. Members could have any idea of its extent, or of the consequent obligations of all kinds which it entailed in the shape of repairs. Reference had been made to Longford Canal. That was a small canal, which supplied Hampton Court with water. It was 10 miles long, and it cost £600 a-year to keep it in repair. That was one of the items which required to be paid in connection with the maintenance of a Palace of this kind, which covered more than four acres of land. It was not necessary that he should detain the Committee with further details in reference to Hampton Court. Mention had been made of the Royal Mews at Pimlico, and the same subject gave rise to some discussion last year. He had inquired into the matter during the Recess, and he had come to the conclusion that it was a much larger work than most hon. Members supposed. The establishment covered $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres of ground, and there were no less than 230 persons permanently living there. He was quite surprised, when he investigated the case, at the extent of the establishment. There were a great number of official residences in the Mews, including those of the Crown Equerries. There was provision for 147 horses, and more than 100 horses were permanently located in the stables there. The permanent establishment consisted of 17 very large coach-houses, containing between 70 and 80 carriages; a riding school, 200 feet long by 50 feet wide; and a large number of rooms and establishments of various kinds. There were official residences for the Crown Equerries, the Master of the Horse, the clerks and superintendents of the Royal Stables, grooms and coachmen; and, as he had just stated, there were no less than 230 persons permanently residing there. Considering the large number of persons accommodated, the sum charged in the Vote was not, he thought, excessive. The hon. and gallant Member behind him (Sir George Balfour) asked what changes had been effected in the Estimates of the present year as compared with those submitted last year. The only change he was aware of was the transfer of Vote 3 to Vote 8. He thought he had now answered all the points which had been raised in the course of the discussion.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the right hon. Gentleman to explain the difference between the sum of £110 last year and the sum of £500 this year for the Longford River Canal?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that, if the hon. Member would refer to the Vote last year, he would find that the charge amounted altogether to £680.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, if he was to understand that 230 great officers of State were placed in the loose boxes and stalls of the Royal Mews at Pimlico, it was a pitiable and lamentable state of things, which fully justified him in moving the reduction of the Vote in regard to the maintenance of those Palaces which were not in the occupation of Her Majesty at the public expense. If these persons were really squatting in the Royal Mews, he had no doubt that, so long as there were any apartments vacant in the Palaces, there would be some persons squatting in them, so as to necessitate a charge for repairs and maintenance. He wished to say one word with regard to Hampton Court Stud House. The country was called upon to pay for the maintenance of the Stud House; but, so far as the foals which were the produce of that Stud House were concerned, the money they brought evidently went to somebody else.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the Stud House at Hampton Court had long been established for the breeding of horses, and had always been kept up.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked what became of the foals?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was not aware.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the Vote, as it appeared in the Estimates, was apparently reduced by the sum of £4,000 from what it was last year. As a matter of fact, however, it really exceeded the Vote of last year by the sum of £600; because the original Vote of last year was for £36,033, whereas the sum now asked for was £36,633. They were told there was a reduction, because last year there was an accidental increase of £4,000, which was included in the Supplementary Estimate. From the manner in which the Vote had been drawn up, it appeared that there had been a reduction of £4,000; whereas the real Vote of last year was £36,033, against an Estimate now prepared this year of £36,633. Therefore, as a matter of fact, instead of there being a reduction this year as compared with last, there was an increase, and the supposed economy did not really exist. The additional expenditure included in the Supplementary Estimates was for works at Hampton Court Palace in consequence of the fire, and it was an expenditure which he hoped they would not expect to have every year. He thought the right way of treating the Estimate would have been to put the original Estimate of last year against the original Estimate of this year, and then add to that £4,000 for accidental expenditure incurred during the year, with the expression of the hope that it would not be repeated. So far, however, from taking credit for economy, it appeared to him that the Government had actually increased the expenditure. He gave his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works every credit for being actuated by a desire to effect economy; but, nevertheless, the actual expenditure this year upon the Royal Palaces was £600 more than it was last year.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he did not mean to deny that £36,000 was the original Vote asked for last year, and that it was supplemented by a sum of £4,000 on account of the fire at Hampton Court Palace; but against that item he was entitled to put the sum of £3,900 asked for this year in continuation of the provision against fire of Hampton Court. He, therefore, still contended that, compared with the original Estimate of last year, there had been a reduction of more than £3,000, of which sum £2,400 were due to reductions in the cost of maintenance and repairs.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, the First Commissioner had stated that, in the case of Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty, provision was made in the Estimate for exterior repairs only. Now, he wished to point out that for Kensington Palace, which was a plain building of no very great extent, there was an estimated expenditure of £1,233. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Works if that was really the average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the exterior of the building? It certainly seemed to him an unreasonable sum for such a plain building as Kensington Palace, which was of very limited dimensions.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT wished to protest against the assumption which ran through the remarks of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) in reference to the observations which he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had made. He had not said one word with regard to extravagance, or against the principle of economy wherever it was practicable. All he had said was that he regarded the manner in which apartments in Hampton Court Palace were employed as a useful means of providing homes for the widows and relations of officers who had rendered distinguished service to the Crown. He protested against the time of the Committee being wasted by pseudo-economists sitting on the other side of the House, who sought to gain a certain amount of notoriety by making serio-comic criticisms upon petty details of expenditure in regard to the Royal Palaces. He confessed that he was unable to find any sufficient reason for the criticisms which had been advanced. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) commenced his observations by commenting upon Bushy Park; but, finding himself unable to make out any case in regard to that item, he quickly passed over it. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), casting his expansive eye down the list of items included in the Vote, was only able to fix upon the Royal Mews at Pimlico; and it appeared that the hon. Member was entirely unaware of the size of those Mews, or of the number of grooms, and even officers of State who were housed there. This was a clear case of wasting the time of the Committee. Before the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) came down to the House for the purpose of attacking this Vote, he ought to have informed himself whether the expenditure was excessive or not, and so also should the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). Neither hon. Member had done so; but one had selected an item in the Vote containing a number of odd names in it, and the other had chosen the Pimlico Royal Mews. Both of these pseudo-economists had been bowled over in a moment by the Minister in charge of the Estimate. This was an unfortunate position for these economists to place themselves in. Let them, if they could, bring to the notice of the Committee any real case of extravagance; but they should not waste the time of the Committee by criticizing trivial items of expenditure, when they were so ready to go into the Lobby with Her Majesty's Government to vote away millions for some unnecessary war in Egypt. To do that one day, and then to object to an item of £500 for certain Royal residences, and to another item of £1,200 for the Royal Mews, was ridiculous inconsistency. Hon. Members knew very well that the cost of Royalty in this country was very much less than the cost of other forms of government elsewhere, and that it was infinitely less than the cost of the Republic of France, or the Republic of America. He ventured, with great respect, to advise the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) and the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) to study the matter more carefully in future before making these complaints.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that if the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) desired a sufficient reason for voting in favour of the proposed reduction he would be able to find it in the manner in which the charges for Windsor Home Park and Adelaide Lodge, Windsor Royal Kitchen Garden, and Frogmore House and grounds were provided for. These were under the Office of Works, while Windsor Park was under the Commissioners of Woods and Forests; and owing to the divided authority which prevailed a great deal of extravagance took place. Nothing could be more extravagant than the way in which the expenditure was administered under the divided authority of the Chief Commissioner of Works and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The items in this case amounted to £3,000; and if the hon. Member wished to have a good reason for voting in favour of the reduction proposed by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) he would find it in this part of the Vote. Anyone who had a competent knowledge of expenditure of this kind would be satisfied that if the whole estate were administered by one authority, £2,000 would only be a small part of the cost that would be saved.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 74: Majority 42.—(Div. List, No. 64.)

Original Question again proposed.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR wished to ask a question in reference to the unoccupied Palaces. He wished to know who it was who nominated the persons who occupied the apartments in these buildings? There was no one in that House who would be more delighted than himself to find that deserving officers were able to obtain apartments in the Royal residences; but he was afraid that many of the persons for whom provision was made were not entitled to such costly consideration from the country as this occupation involved. The First Commissioner of Works had been invited to state the nature of the agreement made with Her Majesty on her accession to the Throne; and he thought the Committee ought to know from the right hon. Gentleman what that agreement was. He had no hesitation in saying that if the persons now permitted to occupy apartments in the Royal Palaces were allowed £500 a-year each instead, it would be a more economical arrangement for the country.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty were at the disposal of Her Majesty; and it depended entirely upon Her Majesty's favour who were to occupy the apartments.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked if he was to understand that all the Palaces unoccupied were at Her Majesty's entire disposal? [MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes.] He hoped the Government would consent to lay the agreement with Her Majesty upon the Table, so that hon. Members might understand what the nature of its provisions was.

MR. TOMLINSON pointed out that Pembroke Lodge had been occupied by Earl Russell, and another Royal building by Sir Richard Owen.

(2.) £1,160, Marlborough House.

MR. RYLANDS said, he would be glad if his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works would lay on the Table of the House the formal agreement under which the Government undertook, as Trustees of the public, to maintain certain Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty, because he had reason to believe that Marlborough House was not looked upon as one of those Palaces.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE remarked that Marlborough House came under a separate agreement.

MR. RYLANDS said, that, under those circumstances, he would ask his right hon. Friend under what arrangement or agreement Marlborough House was chargeable for its repairs upon the public funds? He believed he could say with perfect confidence, acting on what he believed to be sufficient information, that some years ago the Treasury refused to allow the repairs of Marlborough House to be chargeable on the Exchequer. That went on for some time, until the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), who was then First Commissioner of Works, acting upon the application of the Prince of Wales, placed this charge for the first time upon the Estimates. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman might not be aware that this was so. If his right hon. Friend did not know it, he (Mr. Rylands) would be glad if he would inquire as to whether he (Mr. Rylands) had been accurately informed of the circumstances under which this charge had come upon the Estimates. Whether he was accurately informed or not, he had received the information from a gentleman who formerly occupied a high position in the Treasury; and, at all events, the Committee had a right to ask upon what authority this charge was placed upon the taxpayers? His right hon. Friend said that it did not come under the agreement with the Crown. [MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No.] He understood his right hon. Friend to say so; and he should be glad if he could have the agreement put upon the Table, as it would show what the character of the agreement with the Crown really was. If this charge for Marlborough House did not come under the agreement with the Crown, then under what arrangement was the charge placed upon the taxpayers? It seemed to him a very important matter that the Committee should get to know that. If it was not right to charge the expense of maintaining and repairing Marlborough House upon the Civil Service Estimates, the whole thing ought to be done away with. If, on the other hand, it was right to place the charge upon the Exchequer, he thought they ought to complain of the excessive amounts which appeared from year to year in these Votes. The right hon. Gentleman would say, no doubt, that the present Vote showed a diminution, and he (Mr. Rylands) was glad to find that there had been a diminution as compared with the amount voted last year; but, still, the sum put down for the repairs and maintenance of Marlborough House was no less than £2,160, a sum which he considered altogether excessive and extravagant. In regard to the amount by which the Vote had been reduced, £400 arose from the fact that the building last year cost £400 for outside painting, which, of course, was not required this year. It did appear to him that £2,160 was a very much larger amount than ought to be charged upon the Exchequer for the maintenance and ordinary repair of a house of this size; and although he was not prepared to move the reduction of the Vote, seeing that the Estimate had already been reduced, and he was in hopes that it would be still further reduced in other years, he trusted that he might receive from his right hon. Friend information—first of all, in justification of this charge being placed upon the Vote at all; and, secondly, a satisfactory intimation as to the prospect of further economy in future in this large expenditure.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that Marlborough House did not come within the category of Royal Palaces, and had never been considered a Royal Palace in the same sense as other Palaces occupied by the Crown, nor was it subject to the agreement made with Her Majeesty when she came to the Throne; but by a special Act of Parliament, passed in 1860, Her Majesty was authorized to vest Marlborough House in the Prince of Wales during the joint lives of himself and the Queen. It had accordingly been so vested by Act of Parliament in the Prince of Wales during the life of Her Majesty. For many years the repairs were undertaken by His Royal Highness himself, who spent no less than £50,000 in improving Marlborough House; and in 1878, in consideration of that large expenditure, the late Government undertook to insert an annual sum of £2,000, or thereabouts, in the Estimates for the repair of this dwelling house of His Royal Highness, and since that time an item for the repairs had always been voted every year by Parliament. For some two or three years past the expenditure had been something over £2,000; but he was happy to say that it had now been brought down to about that sum, and he had reason to hope that it might be further reduced in future. The repairs some time ago had been allowed to get into arrear, and it was necessary to expend a larger sum than would be required permanently. These arrears had now been completed, and he entertained hopes that there would be some reduction in the amount of this item in future.

MR. RYLANDS said, he was not satisfied with the explanation given with regard to this item. He believed that until 1878 the Treasury had declined to accept responsibility for the repairs. In that year, however, under the auspices of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), then Chief Commissioner of Works, acting on the application of the Prince of Wales, made the cost of them a charge upon the Public Revenue. For this, in his (Mr. Rylands's) opinion, there was no justification at all; and he begged to give Notice that if the charge appeared on the Estimates of next year he should feel it his duty to move that it be rejected. He thought the Committee were entitled to further information as to the circumstances under which this charge was placed upon the British taxpayer; and although he should not move its rejection on the present occasion, he could assure his right hon. Friend that, in his opinion, the time had come when it should disappear from the Estimates.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he thought the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), carried away by his virtuous indignation, had omitted to notice the explanation of his right hon. Friend. The hon. Member had said that His Royal Highness would not in common prudence have expended this money on buildings that were not his own. Had the hon. Member heard the statement of his right hon. Friend he would not have indulged in some of the observations which had fallen from him.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked why the charge for repairs to Marlborough House were not upon the Estimates before the year 1878?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that Marlborough House had been specially vested in His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. In that respect it differed from Clarence House, which had always been considered one of the Palaces of the Crown.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £91,685, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

MR. RYLANDS said, he had a Motion to make for the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £2,000, for the expenses of removal of the statue of the Duke of Wellington from Hyde Park Corner. He had, however, no wish to shut out the Motion of any hon. Member who might wish to reduce the Vote by a larger sum.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) to the fact that the road through St. James's Park had been shut up for a considerable time. Generally speaking, that was the case more than once during the year. He saw on the Estimate a charge for maintenance of £23,695, which he presumed would include the road between St. James's Palace Gate and Buckingham Palace Gate, through which the traffic ordinarily passed. Now, he believed that the repairs that were necessary could be done in a much shorter time than was usually spent upon them, so as to mitigate, in some degree, the great inconvenience which was occasioned to the inhabitants of London whenever the stoppage of the road in question took place. He would like to know the amount expended upon that road, and whether the work was done by contract? If that were the case, he was bound to say that the contract was every year carried out in a very dilatory manner. He had seen the stones put upon the road, and could assure the Committee that, instead of the work being got through expeditiously, not more than a half-day's work was done on the average. Hon. Members would be aware that in any other capital of Europe arrangements would be made, under similar circumstances, to re-open the thoroughfare immediately by working day and night; but here a lengthened stoppage of traffic was allowed to take place, which, he ventured to say, was very detrimental to business of all kinds. He should be glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman opposite why it was that so long a time was occupied in these repairs; and whether it was not possible to make some better arrangement with regard to them than at present existed? The suggestion that the road should be paved with wood had been met by the objection that this would not be in keeping with the characteristics of the Park, although a side path of asphalt had been laid down. However that might be, he thought it would be preferable to the present state of things. If the work was in the hands of a contractor it was evident to him that he charged more money, and consumed more time, than was necessary for effecting the repairs. For these reasons, he believed that any information which the right hon. Gentleman could give on the subject would be interesting and useful to the inhabitants of London, and to the people of the country generally.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he could not at that moment separate the cost of repairing the road referred to by the hon. and gallant Baronet from the cost of the other repairs stated in the Estimate. An inquiry, however, should be made into the matter, the result of which should be communicated to the hon. and gallant Baronet, and with that assurance he trusted the Vote would be allowed to pass.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he did not think the Committee ought to be satisfied with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, that he could not separate the item of cost for the repair of the road in question. Was it the case that the cost of the flower-beds in the Park was mixed up with the charge for repairs? He remembered that some years ago a large reduction of the Vote was moved in connection with a charge for tulips, which was, however, withdrawn on its being shown that a considerable advantage resulted from the arrangement; but here was an enormous sum charged for repairs, as to which the Committee could obtain no explanation whatever. They were certainly entitled to this; and, for his own part, he should not be satisfied unless further information were forthcoming.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the repairs were in connection with the road through Hyde Park, St. James's Park, and the Green Park; he could not, therefore, separate from the rest the cost of repairing the portion of the road from St. James's to Birdcage Walk; but, as he had already stated, he would inquire into the matter, and let the hon. and gallant Baronet know the result.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: Is the work done by contract?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No.

MR. GORST said, with reference to the contribution of £400 per annum from Indian Funds towards the cost of the Kew Establishment, that he should like to know what were the services rendered by that establishment to India which justified the charge; how long it had gone on, and how long it was intended to be continued?

MR. COURTNEY said, the arrangement was one of some standing. The contribution was partly for the purpose of maintaining the Museum, containing specimens illustrative of the produce of their Indian Empire, and partly for the services of the experienced gentleman who had charge of the Collection. He was not cognizant of the particular cases in which services had been rendered to India under this arrangement; but from his own experience at the Colonial Office he was in a position to say that the references made to Kew in respect of the Colonies were very numerous; and he had no doubt that the work done at Kew in relation to the Indian Empire was of considerable value. Take the case of the diseases of trees and plants, for instance. One subject of great importance—the disease in the coffee plant in the Island of Ceylon—had been investigated at Kew, and similar questions had arisen and been investigated there in respect of other Colonies.

MR. GORST said, he thought this was an instance of the petty injustice committed by Her Majesty's Government upon India. The Secretary to the Treasury said there were services of great value and of similar character rendered to the Colonies. Now, would the hon. Gentleman venture to suggest to the Australian Colonies that they should vote sums of money to be spent at Kew? [MR. COURTNEY: Yes.] Had the hon. Gentleman ever done so? The Government had the Revenues of India under their hand; they took this money out of those Revenues; but they dared not take a halfpenny from the Colonies for similar purposes. He said the Committee were entitled to some better explanation than they had received from the Secretary to the Treasury on this subject. If the Government intended to make Kew an Imperial Establishment, contributed to by every Colony whose products and flora were represented there, it would be well if they announced that policy at once. It seemed to him extraordinary that they should select the one Dependency of India, and make it contribute to the maintenance of the Establishment.

MR. COURTNEY said, the question of contribution had reached a practical shape in the case of the Australian Colonies. If the Colonies stood in the same relative position as India, there would, no doubt, be a contribution from them. There was no ground whatever for the statement that the Government made India contribute to the maintenance of the Kew Establishment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) that India was always made to contribute in matters of this kind, and not the Colonies. The Botanic Gardens at Calcutta rendered great service to this country and to the Colonies; and he should be glad to know whether any compensation was made for the amount of work done in that respect?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL observed, that the sum of £100 was voted annually for the payment of experts for naming cryptogams. He wished to know whether this sum was paid for the invention of new names for new cryptogams, or for the correct naming of existing cryptogams? In the former case he thought the work might be done for less; and in the latter case that it might be done by the officials of the Establishment.

MR. RYLANDS said, he rose to move the omission of the item of £2,000 under Sub-head E, in connection with the alterations made at Hyde Park Corner. In doing so, as he had already said, he did not wish to shut out any hon. Gentleman who might desire to reduce the Vote by a larger sum. Now, his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works had given the House last year some information with regard to the statue of the Duke of Wellington. On that occasion he said that a Committee had been appointed, of which he was a Member, and that that Committee had recommended that the statue of the Duke should be broken up; that the metal should be sold; and that the proceeds should be devoted to the cost of a new statue to be erected after competition had taken place; the object being to obtain a new equestrian statue of high character by the hand of a British sculptor. Since that time, however, the whole position had changed. The original Committee had disappeared, and a private Committee—not a body representing the Government—had come into existence. His right hon. Friend, in order, as he supposed, to distinguish it from the Committee appointed last year, had described this as an Executive Committee; and that Committee, of which his right hon. Friend was not a Member, had formed an entirely different plan with regard to the statue. They no longer proposed what was felt by many to be the Vandalism of breaking up this famous statue. He did not know whether this had resulted from the fact that one of the Colonies had offered to pay a larger sum for the statue than would be produced by the sale of the old metal. However that might be, the former arrangement had been given up, and it was proposed that the statue should be removed from Hyde Park Corner and placed at Aldershot. But the great departure from the plan of the former Committee was that there should be no competition, and that the commission should be given to Mr. Boehm. There was the secret of this devolution. The Committee had been established by some means or other; and they gave Mr. Boehm permission to execute the statue, without other artists being allowed to compete. History repeated itself. His right hon. Friend, in an interesting article on the statues and monuments of London, had said, with reference to Bacon's monument of Chatham in Westminster Abbey—

"The sculptor appears to have outwitted his rivals in obtaining an order for the monument in the Abbey; for while the members of the Royal Academy were considering the terms of a competition, he went direct to the King, who said to him—'Bacon, Bacon, you shall make Chatham's monument, and no one else.'"

It was precisely similar in the present case. While the Executive Committee were considering the terms of the competition, Mr. Boehm had waited on an illustrious personage, who had given him the commission. He (Mr. Rylands) said that the original plan of the Committee, that there should be competition, ought to be adhered to. He knew one sculptor who, in consequence of the statement of his right hon. Friend that there would be competition, had gone to great expense and trouble in preparing models of an equestrian group; and, although he was not aware of the fact, others might have done the same. His right hon. Friend said that artists were disinclined to compete in this case. No doubt they were under certain conditions; but he was sure that if the work were left quite open to competition, a work would be produced worthy of their great sculptors. He had no wish to depreciate Mr. Boehm; but did that gentleman occupy such a position that the work could be placed in his hand with the feeling that the result would necessarily be a success? Hon. Gentlemen would be familiar with the statue of Lord Lawrence, which his right hon. Friend had described as—

"By no means a satisfactory figure, in an attitude singularly at variance with his dignified and modest demeanour."

That criticism appeared to him most gentle; and, for his own part, he should speak of the statue in a very different way; he would say that the attitude, the clothing, and the protuberance of body, as well as the vulgarity of features, would lead anyone to suppose that it was intended to represent a tapster of a hostelry in times gone by. Again, what did The St. James's Gazette say about the statue of Lord Beaconsfield in Westminster Abbey? The opinion expressed was that—

"It is little more than a caricature; it might, in fact, have been taken from one of the more ill-natured of Mr. Tenniel's cartoons. The look of superficial keenness, which ceased to be the characteristic of Mr. Disraeli's features long before he won the right to wear the Earl's coronet, is the only look Mr. Boehm has caught; the thought and responsibility of the Prime Minister find no expression whatever. The action, too, is not appropriate to the place; while the treatment of the Peer's robe is clumsy and ungraceful."

He was bound to say that this criticism appeared to him justifiable. When he looked upon the statue of Lord Beaconsfield from one point—he would not say from every point—it reminded him of nothing so much as one of "Spy's" cartoons in Vanity Fair. It did not strike him as being of the highest order of Art; and while he did not dispute for one moment Mr. Boehm's great ability as a sculptor, he could not but feel that he did not occupy that position amongst the sculptors of the country which would justify his having the commission to the exclusion of every other artist. He regarded this as a serious departure from the intention of the original Committee, and he considered that everyone who took that view should support the Amendment he was about to move. If there was to be a statue without competition, undertaken under the proposed conditions, he would rather see the statue of the Duke of Wellington placed upon a large pedestal in the neighbourhood with which it had always been associated than run the risk of having a similar statue executed under conditions which might render the statue less satisfactory than the existing statue. There were some people who very much disliked the idea of the statue being taken to Aldershot; and he would ask them to join him in this Vote, and in that way to request the Government to reconsider the whole matter and to get rid of this Executive Committee, and come to the House of Commons upon a subsequent occasion with a proposal more likely to meet with the approval of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £2,000, the Contribution of Her Majesty's Government for a New Statue of the Duke of Wellington, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Rylands.)

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wished to make a few remarks in consequence of what had fallen from the hon. Member for Burnley. It seemed to him very much to be regretted that the Government cared so little for the encouragement of British Art that they had allowed a great work of this kind to be given to a gentleman who, however distinguished, was not of British birth; and that they had also thought it within their duty to break faith with the House of Commons, and depart from the pledge which was solemnly given by the First Commissioner of Works last year, on the strength of which he induced the House of Commons to agree to his Vote. He did not at all agree with the hon. Member for Burnley as to the work of Mr. Boehm, because he imagined there were not two opinions amongst English artists that, in regard to English or foreign sculpture, Mr. Boehm had no superior. He believed that opinion would command considerable assent at home and abroad among artists; and, at any rate, if there was to be a new statue, the public would have some security, if it was to be intrusted to Mr. Boehm, that it would be a statue invested with a high degree of artistic merit. But he rose rather to appeal to the Government, and particularly to the Prime Minister—and to what he might say were the well-known Tory instincts of the Prime Minister on matters in which no Party issues were raised—to allow the statue not only to be preserved, but replaced. He was certain that the Prime Minister could do no act which would add more to his well-known popularity with the people of London, and with the English people generally, than by stepping in and diverting from this well-known statue the disgrace and destruction with which it was threatened. It was understood that the statue was to be carted off to Aldershot, and placed in some corner of the Aldershot Camp, where nobody would see it, except the soldiers stationed there. The statue was intimately connected with everybody's earliest ideas of the military history of the Great Duke, and, in fact, of the great exploits of the British Army.

He himself never could agree with the criticisms which had been passed upon the statue as to its being inartistic in its position on the top of the Arch. It was a curious fact that in that very spiteful and ill-natured book, written by a very clever Frenchman, entitled John Bull and his Island—a book which was widely read, and in which everything in England was held up to very bitter and, in many cases, very true criticism—the writer, while finding fault with almost everything else in this country, expressed approval of this statue. That, he thought, was testimony of a strong order against those who criticized this statue. In fact, all the criticism of the statue had come from æsthetic persons, with whom the statue was something quite "too-too." Artists of the present day were a great deal too much under the domination of that school, which he believed was generally supposed to be represented in that House by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour). That hon. Member would, no doubt, give the Committee the reasons why that particular school of æstheticism should object to the statue; and, for himself, while he would not further take up the time of the Committee, he must express the earnest hope that the Prime Minister would consider this subject worthy of his special attention, not only as Prime Minister, but as one of the greatest authorities on Art in this country, and would see if he could not meet the wishes of an enormous majority of the people by replacing the statue upon the Arch where it formerly stood.

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that this question of granting £2,000 would be dealt with, he apprehended, in a Bill which had not yet been read a second time—namely, the Hyde Park Corner Improvement Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that was merely a matter of repairing roads.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he was sorry that that was the case, and that the Bill did not deal with the question of removing the statue of the Great Duke. He agreed with his noble Friend, and, to a considerable extent, with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that it would be far better to replace the statue where it formerly stood. In 1838 Her Majesty gave her direct sanction to the locality selected, and the Committee who had charge of the matter concurred in the advisability of placing the statue there; and he hoped that the Government, having moved the Archway from its old position, would follow the advice of his noble Friend, and replace the statue on the top of the Arch. The expense of carting the statue down to Aldershot would be considerable; and he thought the Government might just as well send it to the Nile, or anywhere else, if it was not to be allowed to remain in London, where everybody would have an opportunity of seeing the features of the Great Duke. If necessary, he would second the proposal to reduce this Vote by £2,000; but he could not quite agree with what had been said about Mr. Boehm. The hon. Member for Burnley had said he knew of one sculptor who he thought would be far preferable to Mr. Boehm.

MR. RYLANDS said, he had not meant that. He had simply alluded to the fact that one sculptor, acting on the statement that there would be a competition, had gone to great expense, with a view to a competition, and that he felt aggrieved at not being allowed to compete.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Yes; he had gone to great expense with a model for an equestrian statue, and he felt aggrieved at being excluded from the competition. He himself was not concerned with the qualifications of the persons who were to be charged with the new statue; he was entirely against any new statue at all. He maintained that the old statue ought to remain where it was; and he should vote now, and on every other occasion, against the proposal, and try to save the country from the enormous expense which would be entailed by carting away this statue to Aldershot, and the alleged contemplated improvements consequent thereupon. Every statue in London was probably bad, and this was not a question of Art, but of sentiment; but if there was a good statue foreign opinion was, perhaps, more valuable than English opinion on matters of Art; and certainly the foreign writer already referred to had expressed himself strongly in approval of this statue. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give some assurance to the Committee and to London that the statue of the Great Duke would not be ignominiously carted away to Aldershot, or elsewhere; but that it would remain where Her Majesty wished it to be in 1838, and where the country wished it still to remain.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that with regard to the wish of the right hon. Baronet, that the statue should be replaced on the Arch, he must remind the Committee that the original intention of the Government and of himself was to remove the Arch bodily with the statue upon it; for they were well aware that whenever that statue came down it would be extremely difficult to determine where it should be placed, and wished to prevent that difficulty arising. But the members of the Royal Academy unanimously petitioned the Government to take advantage of the opportunity to remove the statue altogether; without a single dissident, the members of the Royal Academy petitioned the Government to that effect, and stated that, in their opinion, the position of the statue on the Arch was utterly opposed to every canon of taste; that it was a disgrace to Art that the statue should be in that position upon an arch; and that it was totally unsuitable to the Arch. Upon that the Government came to the conclusion that the statue should, at all events, be removed from the Arch; and accordingly the Arch was pulled down, and the statue brought to the ground. He then appointed a Committee to advise the Government as to what should be done in the matter; and he believed the appointment gave general satisfaction, the gentlemen appointed being regarded as representing Art as fully as any gentlemen that could be selected. Upon that Committee were Sir Frederick Leighton, Lord Hardinge, the present Duke of Wellington, and three or four other gentlemen. The Committee at first recommended that the statue should be placed in front of the Horse Guards; and they gave as one reason for that suggestion, and for not keeping it at Hyde Park Corner, that owing to the huge size of the statue, if it was placed on a suitable pedestal it would overpower and crush its surroundings, and so could not be maintained in front of Apsley House. They reluctantly recommended its removal; but believed that in front of the Horse Guards it would be in a less objectionable position, and its defects would be less glaring. That was the first recommendation of this Committee, which, when it was appointed, gave general satisfaction to the House. As the House would recollect, a model of the statue was erected in front of the Horse Guards; but he must admit it gave general dissatisfaction, and he then referred the question again to the Committee; and after further consideration of the matter the Committee came to the conclusion that there was no place in London where they could recommend the statue being placed on account of its very great size and its artistic defects, and they then recommended that it should be re-cast and a new statue should be made and placed at Hyde Park Corner. The Government assented to that proposal, and he informed the House last autumn that they would ask the House to vote £6,000 for a new statue. He also stated that the work would be offered for competition, and that he should invite a limited number of the principal sculptors to compete. But in the course of the Recess it came to his knowledge that the proposal to break up the statue would not give satisfaction to the country and to the Army; and it therefore became impossible to carry out that part of the recommendation of the Committee. At that stage of the matter His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales came forward, and proposed that if the Government would undertake to carry out the proposal to spend the £6,000 on a new statue, he would put himself at the head of a movement to further decorate the new place at Hyde Park Corner; and he suggested that the statue should be moved to Aldershot, where it could be placed in a position in view of the whole Army. That appeared to be a fair compromise for dealing with this extremely difficult subject, and it also offered an opportunity of decorating Hyde Park Corner in a suitable way. The Government acceded to that proposal, and His Royal Highness then appointed an Executive Committee to advise him generally on the whole question as to what should be done in the way of decoration; and that Committee was the one alluded to by the hon. Member for Burnley. It included all the Members whom he had himself appointed, and many other distinguished men; and the Committee could see the Report of that Committee, which had been laid upon the Table. That Committee again went into the question of the disposal of the present statue, and considered all the possible sites where it might be placed in London; and they came to the conclusion that they could not recommend any site in London itself, on the ground mainly of the colossal size of the statue, which would crush all its surroundings; and that if it was placed on a suitable pedestal, it would be out of place in any site which had been suggested in London. They, therefore, concluded that the plan of removing it to Aldershot was, on the whole, the best plan; and accordingly the Government now made that proposal to the Committee, in accordance with the recommendation of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, that the statue should be removed, and a new statue be executed to be placed at Hyde Park Corner. With regard to the question of competition, immediately after he made a statement last autumn that there would be a competition, he received from the present Duke of Wellington a very strong protest against that proposal, in which he said it would be impossible to obtain a good work of Art in that way, and that he objected very strongly to that course. He further said that he would never have given his consent to any dealing with the statue if he had understood that there would be a competition for a new statue. The Government felt that great deference ought to be paid to the present Duke of Wellington in this matter. [An hon. MEMBER: Why?] On the question of sentiment. The Government felt that his views were entitled to very great consideration. Moreover, he made inquiries as to the sculptors who were likely to compete in this limited competition, and three of the most distinguished sculptors who were approached stated that they would not enter into a competition for a work of this kind. Under these circumstances, and looking to the objections raised by the Duke of Wellington, and, above all, finding that the most eminent sculptors would not compete, the Government determined to leave the selection of a sculptor to the Executive Committee appointed by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. That Committee discussed the matter, and they came to the unanimous opinion that Mr. Boehm should be intrusted with the execution of the new statue, and that selection was further ratified by a large meeting of distinguished men—60 or 70 in number—held at Marlborough House, under the Presidency of the Prince of Wales. The hon. Member for Burnley had made some remarks on the artistic work of Mr. Boehm, and had been good enough to quote from an article which he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had written for one of the Reviews on the monuments of London, in which he had made some unfavourable comments on one of Mr. Boehm's works—namely, the statue of Lord Lawrence. The hon. Member might have quoted from the same article that he had praised Mr. Boehm's statue of Mr. Carlyle as one of the best statues in London; and he thought it right to state that Mr. Boehm had himself written to him thanking him for his remarks on the statues of Lord Lawrence and Mr. Carlyle, stating that he entirely agreed with those remarks, and was so dissatisfied himself with the former statue that he was at that very moment occupied upon another statue of Lord Lawrence, which he hoped would replace the existing statue. That, he thought, was a very generous act on the part of Mr. Boehm, and one which entitled him to great consideration by that House. Mr. Boehm had executed many other very important monuments and statues in London, amongst others one of the late Dean Stanley in Westminster Abbey, which would do great credit to any sculptor. He was sorry the hon. Member had alluded to Mr. Boehm as a foreigner, and that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) had expressed regret that the Government should have intrusted this matter to a foreigner who, he thought, would not have sufficiently studied British Art. He had never thought of the consideration whether Mr. Boehm was an Englishman or not; but Mr. Boehm was a member of the Royal Academy, and therefore he thought Mr. Boehm might, for the purposes of sculpture in this country, be considered an Englishman. In this connection he would remind the noble Lord that when the admirers of his late Leader, Lord Beaconsfield, had to choose a sculptor to execute a statue of Lord Beaconsfield in Parliament Square, they selected a foreigner, Signor Raggi, who had produced a work of high art, such as he was glad to see in this country. Many of the best works, in the way of sculpture, in this country had been executed by gentlemen who, at least, had been naturalized in this country, and had brought great credit to England. He need hardly remind the Committee of the splendid works of Roubilliac, and others who were foreigners by birth, as Mr. Boehm was; and he ventured to hope that no more would be heard of this argument, and that Mr. Boehm might be considered, for this purpose at all events, an English sculptor. He believed that Mr. Boehm was almost the only living sculptor who had produced equestrian statues. He had produced two equestrian statues which had done him great credit. Both of these were he believed, in Calcutta, one of them being a statue of the Prince of Wales, and both had acquired for him great repute in the civilized world. On the whole, therefore, he thought the Committee might be perfectly satisfied with the selection of a sculptor made by the Executive Committee. The only question which remained for the Committee to consider was whether, on the whole, the proposal which had been made by the Prince of Wales, and which was now submitted by the Government, was worthy of their consideration. That proposal certainly offered this advantage—that it would enable the decorations of the new place at Hyde Park Corner to be completed. That place was at present in an unfinished state; it required fountains and other works of Art to complete it; and it was proposed by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, if the Committee consented to this Vote, and that part of the work was carried out, to appeal to the public for funds to complete the scheme. If the Committee did not agree to that Vote the whole arrangement would fail, and it would be difficult to say what could then be done. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) had expressed a wish that the statue might be replaced on the Arch, and he had complained of the great cost of removing it to Aldershot; but he did not appear to know what the cost of replacing the statue on the Arch would be. He had had an estimate made when the removal was first contemplated, and the amount estimated for replacing the statue was £3,500. [LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Who made it?] The same contractor who made the estimate for the original removal.

COLONEL NOLAN asked how much it had cost to take the statue down?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the statue was brought down at the cost of removing the Arch—there was no separate item. Hon. Members seemed to think that the cost of removing the statue to Aldershot would be excessive; but that was not the case. He could not say exactly what it would be; but it would not be a very large amount.

COLONEL NOLAN: What is the estimate?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the estimate was £3,200. The statue was cast in four pieces, which were soldered together. It could be removed to Aldershot piecemeal.

COLONEL NOLAN: What does it weigh?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE replied that its weight was 40 tons. All that the plan now suggested would cost was £6,000; £2,000 this year, and £4,000 in the following two years. No further expense would be incurred. The whole of the cost of the removal to Aldershot, and placing the statue on such pedestal as was necessary, would be undertaken by the Committee appointed under the auspices of the Prince of Wales; so that, on the one hand, the Committee would give £6,000, and, on the other, a considerable sum of money would, it was believed, be raised on the appeal of His Royal Highness, to place the statue on the pedestal, to get a new statue, and ornament Hyde Park Corner. He might mention that the present Duke of Wellington entirely approved of this plan; and, as a matter of sentiment, it could not be denied that this approval must go a long way. His Grace agreed that they were doing all they could to honour the memory of his father; and that the statue which it was proposed to place at Hyde Park Corner would be worthy the fame of the Great Duke.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL desired to make a personal explanation. The right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood his reference to Mr. Boehm. He had not taken any exception to that gentleman as a foreigner; and all he had expressed surprise at was that the Government had departed from the solemn pledge they gave to the House of Commons last Session that the contemplated statue was to be thrown open to competition by British artists. He had said that he had the highest regard for Mr. Boehm as an artist; and, so far from throwing any imputation on him, he believed that, as a sculptor, he was without a superior.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The noble Lord went farther—

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I did not.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: He expressed regret that Mr. Boehm was a foreigner.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I expressed no such regret of any sort or kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the Committee never showed to less advantage than when it resolved itself into a Committee of Art critics; and, for his own part, he considered there were many methods in connection with the Estimates by which the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) could better employ himself than in giving an opinion as to the curve of beauty and the proportions of the human form. His noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) had been good enough to point him out as a Representative of "the modern æsthetic school." Well, it was difficult to make out what school his noble Friend belonged to, seeing that the only authority he had quoted was the author of John Bull and his Island. He did not think the question of this statue should be decided at all on æsthetic grounds. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had told them that the whole body of Royal Academicians had come forward and asked him to take this opportunity of removing the statue. Well, the Royal Academicians might be admirable authorities on matters of Art—although that did not appear in a recent celebrated case to be the opinion of a British jury—but this was not primarily a question of Art. It was rather one of historical association; and it was for that reason that he considered the House of Commons perfectly competent to give an opinion upon it. The right hon. Gentleman had already spoiled the whole architectural merit of Hyde Park Corner by taking down the archway that, after all, however inconvenient to the traffic, was symmetrically arranged with the gate of Hyde Park, and by erecting it half-way down the hill and askew. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman had made the site much more convenient for passenger traffic; but he had entirely spoilt the artistic merit of the place. The question, whether or not the Arch would look better with the Duke of Wellington on the top of it, was not worth discussing. It was because the House reflected the feeling of the English people on a question of historical interest that he considered it competent to give an opinion on this subject. He earnestly hoped the Committee would decline to give the £2,000 to the Government.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that before they went to a Division on the matter, it should be pointed out by some person not a Member of the Government that there appeared to be a partnership arrangement with the Executive Committee to which reference had been made; and that being the case, the Committee should insist that it should only be done for solid and real reasons. He knew of no class of men in the Empire who had shown less appreciation of their public duties than the great landowners of London, who had received millions in increased ground rents whilst they were exempt from local charges; and he did very much hope that if the Committee should consent to this Vote it should be on the understanding that the illustrious and other Members of this Executive Committee had a great claim on these landowners to raise a larger sum than was contributed by Parliament for the improvement of Hyde Park Corner. The landowners of London had been excessively backward in contributing towards the cost of improvements in this great and important Metropolis. He hoped, however, that now they would rise to the occasion, and avail themselves of this opportunity of acknowledging a duty which had been very much neglected in the past. He hoped that a sum which would be adequate for the carrying out of the desired improvement would be forthcoming from those who had been hitherto backward in their duty in this respect.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had received a Memorandum from the Duke of Rutland of an entry made by his Father, on the 6th of May, 1839, and it was as follows:—

"The intention is to represent His Grace as he appeared on the evening of the 18th of June, 1815, towards the close of the battle of Waterloo, and His Grace has been so obliging as to sit to the artist in the costume he then wore."

That was a consideration which should have great weight with the Committee. He confessed that, so far as he was concerned, he was not actuated in the view he took in supporting the Motion for the reduction of the Vote by sentimental considerations. If he were, he might point to the circumstances that the old statue had been placed so that it might be supposed that the Duke was pointing with his truncheon to the Horse Guards; and that the new statue, if replaced on the Arch, would be pointing to the Euston Square Railway Station, or to the swamps of Pimlico. Her Majesty's Government were, he considered, in this as in other matters, open to the charge of vacillation and inconsistency. As to the Executive Committee alluded to, it would be difficult to fix responsibility upon them, or to declare who of their Body was responsible. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had said he was responsible; whereas the Representative of the Government in the House of Lords, in his hearing, had thrown the responsibility on the Executive Committee. The Government threw the responsibility on the Executive Committee, and the Executive Committee returned the compliment by throwing it upon the Government. It was rather a curious fact that of the Members of the House who were also Members of the Executive Committee appointed last year, not one was now in his place. The noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) was not present, neither was the Chairman of the Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg). The Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) was also conspicuous by his absence; so that it did not seem that the Members of the Executive Committee had any very great confidence in their own opinion. Then, as regarded the original plan of competition for the construction of the new statue, it had been entirely thrown overboard. The right hon. Gentleman had declared that if the selection were decided by competition all the best artists would be excluded; but the right hon. Gentleman seemed to forget that, in times gone by, the system of competition had made known the existence of some of the best artists this country had produced. The First Commissioner of Works, in an article lately written by him in The Nineteenth Century, had referred to Mr. Stevens' monument of the Duke of Wellington in St. Paul's Cathedral as the greatest work executed in England since the time of Torrigiano, and the right hon. Gentleman might recollect that it was only through public competition that the merits of Mr. Stevens and of his design were realized. Mr. Stevens had had to contend with many difficulties, and he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had taken no small part in supporting Mr. Stevens, when Mr. Ayrton and not a few Members opposite had endeavoured to get rid of the monument altogether. Their efforts, however, failed, and at length the monument had been completed. He entirely concurred in what an hon. Friend of his had said about Mr. Boehm, believing that it would be a misfortune if the work were given to that gentleman instead of to an English artist of equal talent, who would not be difficult to find. He could not agree that Mr. Boehm had made any success with the statues he had erected in London. In addition to the failures already quoted, he would add that of the statue of Lord Russell in the Central Hall of the Parliament Building. The Prime Minister had known the noble Lord very well; and he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) would put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether he had ever seen him in the attitude in which he appeared in the statue? No doubt, great care should be exercised in the selection of artists for these statues. It was said that Mr. Boehm was unrivalled in his execution of horses; but he should like to know where the sculptured horses were in this country from which hon. Members could judge of Mr. Boehm's unrivalled ability? His (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck's) general objection to the new proposal was that, by reason of the removal of the Triumphal Arch to its present position, where it stood sideways, and leading from St. George's Hospital to no where at all, it had become an incongruous absurdity, and no sum of money, however large, could invest the locality with any artistic beauty, unless they began de novo and took down the Arch, to erect it elsewhere.

Mr. ALBERT GREY regretted that the statue of the Duke of Wellington had not been removed long ago; and he, therefore, did not think the Committee ought to quarrel with the decision the Government had arrived at with regard to it. With regard to the Memorial of the Royal Academicians, to which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had referred as a justification for the course pursued by the Government, he thought that if the Government considered it their duty to take the advice of that Body in one respect, they should take it in another respect. The members of the Royal Academy last year sent a Memorial to the Prime Minister, asking the Government to appoint a Committee of experts to inquire whether it would not be possible to finish the monument of the Duke of Wellington in St. Paul's Cathedral? That Memorial had been supplemented by a Memorial from artists and literary men, and by a Memorial signed by 100 Members of the House of Commons. He, therefore, hoped that, as the Government had allowed themselves to be guided in their course of action in one respect by the Memorial of the Royal Academicians, they would also allow themselves to be guided by their Memorial and the other Memorials he had mentioned in regard to the completion of what was admitted by everybody to be the finest monument which had been produced in this country for many years. He would willingly have voted against this grant of £2,000, if, by so doing, he could have secured that that sum could have been expended in finishing the unfinished monument in St. Paul's Cathedral; but he was afraid, after the discussion which had taken place, that to vote with the hon. Member for Burnley would mean an expression of opinion that the Hyde Park Statue should remain where it was. He should, therefore, vote against the hon. Member.

SIR EDWARD J. REED should have preferred to see the statue remain in its present vicinity; but because he considered the improvements which had been effected at Hyde Park Corner of such great public benefit, and the First Commissioner of Works so zealously devoted to the public interest, he should certainly give the right hon. Gentleman his support in the Division about to be taken.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 54: Majority 3.—(Div. List, No. 65.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he desired to ask a Question of the First Commissioner of Works with respect to Richmond Park.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that before the hon. Member raised that point he wished to make an appeal to the Prime Minister, and to ask him whether, after the debate which had taken place and the extremely close Division they had had, he would allow the matter to stand over for further consideration, and would not bring it forward at an hour when the House could not have a fair opportunity of discussing it?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he conceived that the vote which had just been taken was a conclusive vote as regarded its immediate effect. ["No!"] As he understood the question of the noble Lord, the Government were asked to give a fair opportunity for the further consideration of the matter when the Vote was reported. He did not deny that that was a fair request.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked if the right hon. Gentleman would undertake that the Vote should be taken at such a time as would afford the House a fair opportunity of giving its attention to it, and not at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, of course, his answer implied that the Report of this particular Vote would not be taken at a time when it could not be discussed.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF expressed a hope that no steps would be taken in regard to the statue or anything else, until after the Report was disposed of.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE wished to ask a question of the First Commissioner of Works with respect to Richmond Park. For many years there had been a question raised with regard to the opening of Roehampton Gate to the public, and he wished to know if anything recently had occurred in regard to it? Richmond Park was one of the free open spaces in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis, and it was highly desirable that the inhabitants of London should have free access to it, and Roehampton Gate was the nearest approach to it. He believed that the property leading to that Gate was owned by a lady; and although the Park itself was open the approach to it in that direction was not. He believed that some negotiations had been going on with the lady who owned the land, with a view of securing free admission to the Park by way of this Gate. At present the House voted money for keeping up the Roehampton Gate; but it was found that two authorities were jointly interested in opening up the approach, and that neither of them—neither the Ranger nor the lady who owned this property—had any right of entrance or exit from the Park whatever except by permission of the other. The public had no means whatever of proceeding to the Park by Roehampton Gate except through the land belonging to this lady, and the lady herself had no right or control over the Park itself. All that was wanted was an arrangement by which the public could obtain access to the Park by means of Roehampton Gate. He understood that the land belonging to this lady could be bought for a reasonable sum; but it could only be bought by means of an arrangement made through the First Commissioner of Works. He believed if any additional sum were asked for the land beyond the actual value which the Commissioners of Woods and Forests placed upon it the Metropolis would be prepared to pay it; but they were unable to take any steps in the matter except by means of an arrangement with the First Commissioner of Works. As a matter of public convenience, it was highly desirable that this access should be rendered free. At present the public, instead of driving directly into the Park by way of Roehampton Gate, were obliged to go round for a distance of two miles beyond Roehampton Gate. It would really be of great advantage to the Metropolis to have this gate thrown open, so that the inhabitants of London might be able, for purposes of recreation and enjoyment, to make free use of Richmond Park. He believed that cabs were admitted into the Park itself; but that they were unable to obtain admittance to it by means of Roehampton Gate. In the East End of London, Epping Forest had been preserved by the action of the Corporation; and he thought that something should be done in regard to Richmond Park, so as to give the public at the West End of London the freest and easiest access to it. It would, however, be impossible to do this until Roehampton Gate was made available.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is entitled to ask a question upon this point, but he is not entitled to debate it, because it has reference to another part of the Vote already disposed of.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he would confine himself to asking a question of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works—namely, whether he did not consider that it would be of the greatest advantage to the inhabitants of the Metropolis that Roehampton Gate should be opened to the public, that being the nearest means of access to the Park? If it were opened up it would be of great advantage to large masses of the people who wished to visit the Park. ["Order!"]

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR rose to a point of Order. He wished to know if it was not competent for the hon. Member to move the reduction of the Vote in order to place himself in Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member can move the reduction of the entire Vote; but by the Rules of the House he would not be entitled to enter into a debate upon this particular item at this moment.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE asked whether, if he moved the reduction of the Vote, he would not be in Order in discussing this matter?

THE CHAIRMAN: No.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said that, under those circumstances, he would confine himself to the question whether any negotiations had recently taken place with the view of securing the opening of Roehampton Gate to the public; and, if not, whether the right hon. Gentleman would not consider it necessary to make inquiry whether some arrangement might be effected by the payment of a small sum of money for the purchase of the land from the lady who now owned it, such payment to be recouped by an arrangement with the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, the object being to secure for the inhabitants of the Metropolis this easiest way of access to Richmond Park?

MR. LABOUCHERE wished to ask his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works, whether it was not possible to put an end to the preservation of game in Richmond Park, so that the public might not be kept out of the enjoyment of one-third of a Park for which they paid largely, in order that a very few individuals might amuse themselves by wandering about and shooting rabbits? ["Oh!"] He was simply asking a question whether this fact was not known to the right hon. Gentleman; and whether, if it was known to him, he would not take some means to see that the public, who paid largely towards the expense of keeping this Park in order, should not be deprived of the enjoyment of a considerable portion of it, in order that two or three individuals might have an opportunity of amusing themselves?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE desired to say, in answer to the first question which had been put to him, that he thought it would be of great advantage to the public if Roehampton Gate were opened. The difficulty was that the approach to that Gate was private property. It belonged to a lady who was willing to sell it under certain conditions; but he could not hold out any hope to the hon. Member for London (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) that the Treasury would advance the sum of money that would be necessary to pay for its purchase. Neither did he see any indication that the Metropolitan Board of Works, or any private persons, were ready to come forward and to advance the money. Whenever they did so he should be glad to enter into negotiations with this lady for the purchase of the property in question. At the same time, he could not hold out any hope that any Vote of money would be submitted to the House for the purpose; and he did not think that it was a matter which ought to fall upon the Public Exchequer. With regard to the question of his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), he could only say that the Park had been vested in the First Commissioner of Works for the purpose of a Park, and for the benefit of the public; but there was a distinct reservation of all the rights of the Crown, and among those rights was the right of sporting, which right Her Majesty had made over to the Duke of Cambridge, and the Government had no power of diminishing that right in any way.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINOK said, that complaints had been made of the closing of the footway across St. James's Park at an early hour in the evening. He wished to know if any change had been made in that respect?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE believed that the footway across the bridge was to be kept open all night.

MR. RITCHIE said, the right hon. Gentleman promised to consider the propriety of keeping open the broad path across Kensington Gardens until a later hour than at present. It was now closed at a very early hour, and considerable inconvenience was occasioned in consequence. The right hon. Gentleman had promised to keep it open later, and he (Mr. Ritchie) wished to know if steps had been taken to give effect to that promise?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE replied in the affirmative.

MR. RAIKES wished to say a word in regard to Roehampton Gate. Did the right hon. Gentleman think it worth while to spend £2,000 a-year for the maintenance of the Park, and refuse to give the small sum that would be necessary in order to render it accessible to the people of London? He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he was not disposed to recommend a Vote, or any outlay of money, for the purpose of securing that access, which would be most convenient.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that no doubt the opening of Roehampton Gate would be convenient for the people of the neighbourhood who lived within easy reach of Richmond Park; but it certainly appeared to him that the expense of obtaining the opening up of this access to the Park ought to fall upon the inhabitants who would be benefited by it, and not upon the public generally.

MR. TOMLINSON wished to ask a question about the Green Park, which had been raised last year. There had been a Vote for new railings at the Hyde Park Corner of the Green Park. The new railings were much more pretentious than the old ones; and he wished to know whether it was intended to continue the new form of railing, or whether it was intended to leave the railing in its present unsightly condition?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he had not included in the Estimates any sum for such a purpose this year; but, of course, it might be a question for consideration in the future.

MR. MOLLOY asked if the First Commissioner of Works would state now how many acres of the enclosed land had been opened to the public in Regent's Park, and whether the total quantity which it had been decided to give up to the public would, when opened, be free of access to everybody? He believed that three or four weeks ago a portion of the land given to the public had been again enclosed.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he thought the area thrown open to the public in Regent's Park was about 20 acres. The whole of it was opened on the 1st of March of the present year.

MR. MOLLOY: The whole of it?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes; the whole of it.

MR. LABOUCHERE begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £7,161 in reference to Victoria Park. He would also move the reduction of the Vote by the items asked for in reference to Battersea Park, and Kennington Park.

MR. RITCHIE asked if the hon. Gentleman was in Order in moving to reduce a Vote which had already been passed, inasmuch as it was antecedent to the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands)?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, upon that point of Order, and in reference to a previous ruling of the Chair, wished to point out that the reduction moved by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) was for £2,000 in connection with Hyde Park Corner which appeared in Sub-head E; but later on in the Vote, in Sub-heads G. H. and T., there were the sums mentioned by the hon. Member?

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no doubt that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) would be in Order in moving the reduction of the Vote by any sum short of the aggregate amount; but in moving the reduction of the Vote by a specific item which appears in the Vote later than the items included in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) he would not be in Order.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that these points of Order were of great importance. If a ruling of this nature were given somewhat hastily, it might be found that the discussion of the Votes in Committee would be practically futile,

The reduction moved by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), in reference to the sum of £2,000 which came under Sub-head E, related to certain works in Hyde Park; but in Sub-head F there was a further sum for the maintenance of that Park, and, in point of fact, the question of maintenance in connection with the different Parks ran all through the Vote; and therefore he thought, with all due respect to the ruling of the Chair, that it was competent for any hon. Member to move any reduction covered by the different sub-heads which came after Sub-head E.

THE CHAIRMAN: As to giving the ruling hasily, it was given in accordance with the ancient Rules of the House. The hon. Member has specified certain items relating to public Parks which are antecedent to the Vote taken upon the reduction moved by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). It would, therefore, be out of Order to move that reduction.

MR. RITCHIE said, his remarks related to Battersea Park.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would be out of Order to propose a reduction of the Vote upon an item included in it for Battersea Park.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that, under those circumstances, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £7,161 for the expenditure in connection with Victoria Park. This was one of the Parks of London which was kept up at the expense of the whole country. As by the ruling of the Chair the amount voted for other Parks might not be touched, there was a still stronger reason than there had been before why they should not vote the sum now asked for for this Park. He wished to point out that this was a sum of money thrown upon the country for the expense of Parks in London, exclusive of Hyde Park, St. James's Park, and the Green Park, which might be regarded as National Parks. He believed the country had already spent upon Battersea Park, in the formation of the Park and the River Embankment, something like £21,000, and there would also be an item, he imagined, for a new bridge, to give access to the enclosed land recently opened to the public in Regent's Park. Now, the Metropolis was a very wealthy place, and ought to pay for its own Parks. No doubt, he would be told by the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works that these Parks belonged to the country, and ought to be paid for by the country rather than by the Metropolis, because they were in a different position from any of the country Parks. In the country the inhabitants formed their own Parks, and supplied the money necessary to maintain them; and why should not the Londoners, who were better able to afford the outlay, do the same? The constituency he represented (Northampton) had decided upon having a Park; but no proposal was made that the public should pay for it. If such a proposal were made, he was satisfied that not a voice would be raised in that House in favour of it. He ventured to ask, then, why the country should be called upon to pay for the Parks in London?

MR. COURTNEY: They are all in the London Government Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he was not quite certain that that Bill would pass this Session. He thought it was likely to meet with such an amount of obstruction that its passing was very questionable. The present bird in the hand was worth very many London Bills in the bush; and he objected to any proposal for making a present of £7,000 to the City of London, on the chance that they might be able to pass the Municipal Bill this year. It would be far better to approach the consideration of that Bill with a solemn declaration on the part of the House that, whether the Bill passed or not, London should be called upon to pay for its own Parks.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £7,161 for the Victoria Park be omitted from the proposed Vote."—
(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he ventured to hope that the hon. Member would not consider it necessary to divide the Committee upon his Amendment. The question was dealt with in the London Government Bill, and it was proposed to hand over this Park to the New Government of London. It would be practically impossible to give up these Parks on the part of the Government without an Act of Parliament, and even an Act of Parliament would be necessary to enable them to be handed over to the New Government of London. He could hardly suppose that the hon. Member wished to see these Parks thrown into a state of neglect and disorder. All the three Parks which had been mentioned would be provided for in the London Government Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought that the Metropolitan Board of Works ought to take over these Parks by Act of Parliament in the same way as Leicester Square.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the London Government Bill would enable them to be handed over to the New Local Government of London. There was already a Bill for that purpose on the Table of the House, and the passing of that Bill in the present year was only a question of time. Under these circumstances, it would simply be a waste of time to discuss the matter.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he was glad that a question had been put by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) which had elicited from the right hon. Gentleman that one of the penalties which London would have to pay for the London Government Bill was £26,000 a-year for the keeping up of these Parks. That, he believed, was not the only penalty which the City of London would have to pay if that Bill passed. He therefore thought they were indebted to the hon. Gentleman for having brought the question forward at this time. Probably he might bring forward further questions which would tend to show the amount of benefit the Metropolis would receive from that Bill, and would show, in point of fact, a debtor as well as a creditor account. He thought the people of London would be surprised to hear that £26,000 a-year would be the first thing they would be called upon to pay, in accordance with the views Her Majesty's Government had just expressed upon the subject. He was quite sure that the inhabitants of London would protest against being burdened with the responsibility of keeping up Parks which were not for the benefit of themselves only, but for the advantage of other persons who frequented them. It was, as he had stated, one of the penalties which London would have to pay, and the neighbourhoods in which the Parks were situated would have no reason to be grateful for the Bill.

MR. RITCHIE said, he understood that the Parks which were now enjoyed by the poorer classes of the community were to be taken out of the Estimates; while Hyde Park, St. James's Park, and the Green Park, which were enjoyed by the richer part of the community, would be kept in. He could not conceive anything more invidious than a proposal of that kind; and he was satisfied that many people in the East End of London would look with a considerable amount of dissatisfaction on any proposal to take the Parks out of the Imperial taxation for the purpose of throwing them upon the ratepayers of London. Whatever might be proposed by the London Government Bill would be dealt with when that Bill came on properly for discussion. He understood it was proposed that Victoria Park and other Parks were to be kept up by the Metropolis; while Hyde Park, St. James's Park, and the Green Park were to be maintained out of the Imperial Exchequer. [MR. COURTNEY: They are Royal Parks.] He did not understand the distinction, and he thought it would be regarded as an invidious one. As far as the East End of London was concerned, the people would look with a considerable amount of dissatisfaction and jealousy on the enormous amounts of money that were expended in the West End of London, in the neighbourhood of Kensington, while the East End found no similar favour. Even when they asked for such a paltry expenditure as was involved in the present Vote, they were told that in future it would have to be borne by the people of London themselves. If this course was to be followed, of throwing upon the ratepayers of London the cost of maintaining the Parks of the poor, while those of the rich were kept up by the Imperial Exchequer, it would be regarded with extreme jealousy and dissatisfaction.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he had put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, which had not been answered, in reference to an item of £100 per annum to experts for naming cryptogams.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was sorry he could not give the explanation which the hon. Member asked for.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought the time had now arrived when Progress ought to be reported. He would, therefore, make a Motion to that effect.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked when the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take the Report?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: On Thursday.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Not to-morrow?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL.

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Trevelyan.)

[BILL 165.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COURTNEY expressed a hope that the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill, the object of which was to consolidate and simplify certain Acts of Parliament relating to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland. The provisions of the Bill contained no novelties, and were not likely to raise any discussion of a controversial character. There was nothing involved in the Bill which ought to give rise to any discussion at all; and he proposed, after the Bill was read a second time, to move that it be referred to a Select Committee, such Committee to be composed in a manner which would be satisfactory to the Irish Members. Of course, due Notice would be given of the appointment of the Committee. He begged to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Courtney.)

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, the Bill contained very long and multifarious provisions, and it had only been placed in the hands of hon. Members that morning. The House ought, at any rate, to be allowed 24 hours for considering it. He would, therefore, ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, to postpone the Bill until another day.

MR. MOLLOY would join with the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) in asking the Government to postpone the further consideration of the Bill. The Irish Members knew nothing about it; and although the hon. Gentleman said he proposed to refer it to a Select Committee, to be composed in such a manner as would be satisfactory to the Irish Members, the hon. Member's idea of composing a Committee to the satisfaction of Irish Members was one thing, whereas the actual composition of the Committee might be another. Her Majesty's Government and the Irish Members did not always agree upon that point; and he thought at that hour of the night it would be rather hard to ask the Irish Members to consent to the second reading of a Bill of which they knew absolutely nothing.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would move the adjournment of the debate, on the ground that the Bill, which contained 67 clauses and 83 pages of print, had been laid upon the Table so recently that hon. Members had had no opportunity of making themselves acquainted with the nature of its provisions. It was perfectly impossible for hon. Members to know anything about it, and especially to know whether it was proposed to make any alteration in the composition of the Board of Works. The Board of Works, as at present constituted, was a most unsatisfactory Body. He thought the best way would be to withdraw the Bill, and introduce one which would afford a guarantee for the substantial amendment of the Board of Works. A measure which simply reaffirmed the constitution of a Board which was at present considered most objectionable would only involve a waste of the public time. It was absurd to introduce a Bill which allowed the existing law to remain practically without amendment. He begged to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. COURTNEY said, it was with great reluctance that he assented to the proposal of the hon. Member. He was very sorry that the second reading of the Bill had not been agreed to. The Bill was a Bill of mere machinery, simply relating to the means by which the Board of Works acted, and had nothing whatever to do with the law under which the Board acted. If it were not read a second time now, it was impossible to say when it could be taken again. At the same time, he felt that he was unable to resist the appeal which had been made.

COLONEL NOLAN wished to point out the extraordinary manner in which the Irish Business was managed in that House. The Irish Members were not like Members who represented English constituencies, who got to know something of Bills before they were put down upon the Paper. The Irish Members were not in the confidence of Her Majesty's Government, and they were not afforded an opportunity of making themselves acquainted with the provisions of a measure of this kind in advance. The present Bill was only issued that morning; it was a very long Bill; and it had now been proposed that night to read it a second time without any speech in explanation of its provisions. What the House ought to have had was a short speech from the Secretary to the Treasury, explaining the provisions of the Bill. His own impression was that the hon. Gentleman was unable to do that in consequence of not having read the Bill himself. As to the assertion that the Bill was simply one of machinery, he disputed it altogether. The Bill was a very important one, and in its present shape it was likely to create dissatisfaction in Ireland. What the Irish people wanted was a measure to remodel altogether the machinery by which the Board of Works was at present worked. He hoped this slipshod method of dealing with legislation for Ireland would not be continued in future.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, it was only fair to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to say that this Bill was in every word the same as a Bill brought forward on the same subject last year. He was able to make that statement, as he had been personally concerned in the matter. About three weeks ago he had had a Motion on the subject asking that the whole matter should be referred to a Select Committee, and he still believed that that would be the best plan of dealing with it. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury asked him to forego that Motion, and promised that a Bill should be introduced at once and referred to a Select Committee. As the hon. Gentleman had stated, the Bill did not contain any controversial matter. The next Bill on the Paper, which related to land improvement and arterial drainage in Ireland, was a much more important measure. With regard to the present Bill, nothing satisfactory could be arrived at simply by a discussion in that House. It must go through the ordeal of a Select Committee; and there was an understanding that when a Select Committee was appointed there should be power to call witnesses, and the hon. Members for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), for Galway (Colonel Nolan), for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman), or for King's County (Mr. Molloy) would be able to bring forward any evidence they thought fit. To adjourn the debate now would only be to prejudice the chance of another investigation taking place in the course of the present Session. His hon. Friend must know that at this moment the subject of arterial drainage was absolutely at a standstill in Ireland; and it would be at a standstill until something was done in regard to these Bills. He hoped the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would allow the Bill to be read a second time.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, that if his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst) had been able to read the Bill and make himself master of its provisions, he had been much quicker than he (Colonel King-Harman) had been. He presumed that the hon. and gallant Gentleman received the Bill only that morning, at the same time as he (Colonel King-Harman) and other hon. Members; but it would seem from the knowledge the hon. and gallant Member possessed of its provisions that he must have had the Bill placed in his hands some days before Parliament adjourned for the holidays. As other hon. Members had not enjoyed a similar privilege, they were anxious that the debate should be adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

INTESTATES ESTATES BILL [Lords].(Mr. Courtney.)

[BILL 168.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COURTNEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the measure was one of great simplicity. Its primary object was to amend the law respecting the administration of the personal estate, and the escheat of the real estate, of deceased persons. It was considered desirable to afford to the Crown some protection against claims made against it with regard to the property of persons who died intestate. The Bill provided that where the administration of the personal estate of a deceased person was granted by a nominee of Her Majesty, any action or other proceedings against such nominee for the recovery of the personal estate should be of the same character and subjected to the same rules of law and equity, including the Statute of Limitations, in all respects as if the administration had been granted to the nominee as one of the next of kin. By this provision the Statute of Limitations would be held to apply in favour of the Crown Solicitor where the Crown Solicitor wished the administration of the estate by reason of the intestacy of a deceased person. It further provided that where a person died without an heir and intestate in respect of real estate, the Law of Escheat should apply in the same manner as if the estate were a legal estate in land held directly from Her Majesty. The object was to prevent claims being raised up that were of a fictitious character, or attempts to recover from the Crown, notwithstanding the Statute of Limitations. If any objection was likely to be raised against the Bill it would be an objection of detail rather than anything else, and would be best considered in Committee. Power would be given to the Court to sell the interest of the Crown in any real estate, and there would also be power to waive the right of the Crown in certain cases. He did not think any difference of opinion as to the principle of the Bill existed, and any Amendments which hon. Members placed upon the Paper would be fully considered in Committee. Under the circumstances, he trusted the House would allow the second reading to be taken,

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. SALT said, he had no wish to interfere with the progress of the Bill. He had, however, a strong objection to the second reading of the Bill on that occasion, inasmuch as it contained much technicality of detail, and had, moreover, only been delivered that morning. It had become too much the practice to slip Bills of this character through the House at a late hour, when it was absolutely impossible for them to receive that full consideration which their importance demanded. It might be said that the Bill had the advantage of coming from "another place;" but even with that undoubted advantage he did not think it a convenient course that it should be put into the hands of hon. Members in the morning, and be taken for second reading on the evening of the same day.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he had expected the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) would move the adjournment of the debate; but as he had not done so, he rose for the purpose of moving the adjournment, on the ground that the Bill had only been delivered that morning, and that it was impossible to discuss it properly at that hour (1.15). The Bill contained clauses of a technical character, which hon. Members had not had time to consider. He thought it should be established as a principle in that House that no Bill delivered in the morning should be proposed for second reading on the same day.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Major General Alexander.)

COLONEL NOLAN said, he should certainly like further time for considering the Bill. There was a case in his own county (Galway) involving the sum of £150,000, the claimants of which would be debarred by the Bill, if it became law, from establishing their claim. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was probably acquainted with the case to which he referred. Although, of course, it seemed very absurd that all the members of the family in question should think they would get the money, there was no doubt in his mind that one of them was entitled to it. The Bill would clearly place them in a bad position; and he, for one, felt it his duty to vote for the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (Major General Alexander).

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, the Bill, no doubt, at first sight appeared of some technicality; but further examination would, he thought, show that, although of considerable importance, the clauses were not so technical as they appeared. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury had pointed out the substance of the Bill, which might be described under three heads.

MR. SPEAKER: I would point out that the hon. and learned Member should confine himself strictly to reasons against the adjournment, or otherwise, of the debate.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, his reason against the adjournment of the debate was that the principle of the Bill was a matter of great difficulty; and that, although a measure of importance, it would receive in Committee the large amount of attention which it demanded. He thought the House might very well agree to the Motion for the second reading; and he ventured to suggest to his hon. Friend in charge of the Bill, that he should agree not to put it down for the Committee stage until a week had elapsed, in order that if any hon. Member, on looking further into it, should think it required further discussion, such discussion might be taken on the Motion for going into Committee.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he hoped there would be no attempt to force the Bill through the House at that Sitting. There were upon the Paper 35 Orders of the Day, and it was simply impossible that hon. Members could have read the Bill in the short time during which it had been in their hands. He, for one, although of course it was the duty of Members to do so, had not had an opportunity of reading it. He protested against the unbusiness-like way suggested of reading the Bill a second time, and leaving its principle open for discussion on the Motion for going into Committee; and he trusted the House would agree to the adjournment of the debate.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, if this were a Bill merely dealing with a few technicalities, which could be discussed in Committee, he should be disposed to vote against the Motion for the adjournment of the debate. But it was a Bill which extended the principle of the Law of Escheat, and that, too, in a very unfair way. The Secretary to the Treasury said that where a Trustee found himself discharged from his trust the Crown had no claim on the property; but he would point out that by this Bill the Crown would acquire an entirely new right. That certainly was an important question of principle, on which the sense of the House ought to be taken at a time when full consideration could be given to the question.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he understood that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury proposed to make certain alterations in the Bill when in Committee which would meet the objections which were felt with regard to it on that side of the House. The principal objection felt in the House and throughout the country with reference to the proceedings of the Government in the matter of intestate estates was the want of publicity, the result of which would be that large sums of money—the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) had instanced a case in which £150,000 were involved—would be dealt with in almost absolute secrecy. It must, he thought, be in the mind of everyone that it was desirable that the utmost amount of publicity should be given in matters of this sort. If the hon. Gentleman were prepared to give the House an assurance that he would in Committee insert a clause directing that details should be given with complete fullness and clearness in the annual account published, he thought the chief objection of hon. Members would be met, and that they would be inclined to defer discussion until the Committee stage of the Bill. ["No, no!"]

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he hoped the House would agree to the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend, because he liked to stick to the Rules of the House; and he thought that as the Bill had not yet been seen by anyone the House ought to have an opportunity of considering its provisions before it was proceeded with. The Bill had only been delivered that morning, and there had been no opportunity of considering the principles upon which it was based, and which were principles which the Secretary to the Treasury had admitted might involve serious consequences to individuals. He, therefore, sincerely hoped the consideration of the Bill would be postponed; otherwise its second reading must be prevented.

Mr. WARTON mentioned that the Secretary to the Treasury had said he would not take the Bill if there was serious opposition to it.

Mr. ELTON said, it was obvious that this was not a little measure. It introduced a new principle with regard to equitable escheat, and interfered with the rights of private lords, and he must support the Motion for Adjournment.

Mr. COURTNEY said, he was, of course, not going to resist this proposal; but he thought the only serious argument against going on with the Bill was that of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Bartelott). On that ground he would assent to the adjournment; but he hoped advantage would not be taken of the adjournment to block the Bill, and prevent its being fairly discussed on the next occasion when it came on.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, in moving that the Bill he now read a second time, said, he thought the House would be more considerate with respect to this Bill than with regard to the last, because when he introduced it he explained its object.

[BILL 175.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. George Russell.)

Sir Walter B. Bartelott

Mr. WARTON rose to a point of Order. The Motion before the House was that the Bill be now read a second time; but he had given Notice that on that Motion he should move that the Bill be adjourned till to-morrow. It was a question arising from peculiar circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER: That will not be in Order. There is no Question before the House.

Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL said, he had moved the second reading.

Mr. WARTON said, his point of Order was this. At the moment before the adjournment of the House was moved, on the last Sitting before the Vacation, it was understood that the second reading of this Bill would be taken to-day. That was of some importance in regard to what took place last year. Without any such arrangement last year the Bill was put down for the first day after the Easter Vacation; and his point was that there had not been a single day on which Amendments could be put down in opposition to this Bill. By the courtesy of the House a Bill was always read a first time; but if such a Bill was put down for second reading on the first day after a Recess, there was no time for putting down Amendments. When he had a Motion on this subject on the 1st of April last, and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) wanted to have a debate on the Reform Bill, he only asked that one day should be given upon which Amendments in opposition might be put down; and as, if this plan was not adopted, any Bill might be forced through a second reading, he should now move that the second reading be adjourned till to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is only competent to the hon. and learned Member to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Warton.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this Bill was first brought before the House of Lords; but if there was any feeling that further opportunity for considering it should be given, he would not raise any objection to that; but he would appeal to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport to consider its provisions, and not block it simply because it was a Bill on the Paper.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

REAL ASSETS ADMINISTRATION BILL.

(Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Warton.)

[BILL 98.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, in moving that the Bill be now read a third time, said, he wished to state, in reference to the opposition of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), that in deference to that hon. Member, and to the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley), he had postponed the third reading from the last Sitting of the House before the Recess until to-day, because they objected to taking the third reading without the Bill having been reprinted. He was anxious to meet their wishes in that respect, and also to consult the authorities of the House, from whom he learnt that it was unusual to have a small Bill like this reprinted after Amendments in Committee, and that it would be altogether unprecedented for him to move to have it reprinted. The Bill itself was a very small measure, and the alterations in it were quite consequential. There was nothing debateable in any of the new clauses; and he thought they generally met the opinions of the most authoritative Members on the subject. He believed they had the approval of the Solicitor General and other learned Members who were interested in the matter; and, under those circumstances, he appealed to the hon. Member for Preston not to oppose the third reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

MR. TOMLINSON said, of course it was competent to the hon. Member to press the third reading upon him, and he was not so familiar with the practice of the House as to say whether or not it was absolutely a matter of right to have the Bill read a third time; but when the hon. Member spoke of the unusual course of having the Bill reprinted, he must say it was unusual for such a Bill to appear for the third reading with Amendments three or four times as long as it was on the second reading. But, under all the circumstances, he should not press the matter any further.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 27.]

(Mr. Kenny, Mr. Leamy, Mr. Dawson, Mr. Barry, Mr. Corbet.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

COLONEL NOLAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that it was only a short Bill, and simply enabled Trustees to transfer Coast Fisheries to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel Nolan.)

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had hoped that the Chief Secretary would have expressed some opinion upon this Bill. He wished it had been as fair and as good a Bill as was brought in last year, which, however, had not got to a second reading. That Bill, in doing away with the present officers, who administered these Trusts, provided in some undefined way that they should receive some compensation for the abolition of their office; but this Bill provided no such compensation whatever. They would, therefore, be thrown out of employment without any compensation; and he should, therefore, move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Colonel King-Harman.)

MR. TREVELYAN said, he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would withdraw his Amendment after he had stated the view of the Government. The Bill was similar in its essential lines to the Bill which he had himself introduced last year; it was a Bill in which he took considerable interest, and he was satisfied that the right course had been taken. The Bill of last year fell through owing to the Government and the several Trustees being unable to come to an understanding, and he then stated that, so far as that Bill was concerned, it was impossible for him to proceed last Session; but he limited that declaration distinctly to last year, and this Bill was one which he should heartily support in principle. He could not, however, agree to the second reading on the part of the Government, unless the hon. Member, who was standing godfather to the Bill, and who he hoped had the authority of the Gentlemen whose names appeared on the Bill, and was quite sure that he understood their feelings, would agree to put off any further stage of the Bill for a week, within which time he should be prepared to name the conditions of compensation upon which the Government would only consent to support the Bill. He could assure the hon. Member that those conditions would be such as would meet with his acceptance.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, on those condition he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

IRISH LAND COURT OFFICERS (EXCLUSION FROM PARLIAMENT) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel King-Harman.)

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was afraid he could not consent to the Motion at that time of night; and from what he knew of the Bill, if it was in the same shape as when originally introduced he could not assent to it at any time. He had the strongest objection to the Bill in the form in which he first saw it, because it inflicted retrospective penalties on gentlemen who accepted their positions at a time when this burdensome condition was not made; and on that ground he objected to the Bill on principle. If the hon. and gallant Member pressed the Bill he should be prepared to give it a decided negative; but at present he should content himself with moving the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

MOTION.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Resolution reported on Wednesday the 2nd of April from the Committee on Royal Irish Constabulary (Additional Officers, Salaries, &c.) read.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that in accordance with the announcement he made before the holidays, he now proposed to ask leave to bring in this Bill. Hon. Members who had watched the proceedings of the House might be surprised at the Government taking a step backwards in regard to this Bill; because, as a matter of fact, they had been already ordered by the House to produce the Bill. But that step had been taken under a misconception. He felt bound, in accordance with the promise he had made to hon. Members opposite, to move the Bill at a time when he could make a short statement with regard to it; and he had accordingly obtained an Order that the previous Order of the House should be cancelled, in order that he might have an opportunity of introducing the Bill as it now arose. The Bill was very short and very simple. It was very much shorter and simpler than the Bill of last year, which was now in the hands of Members. The history of the Bill was shortly this. The Irish Police Force, which now numbered some 12,000 men, had reached something like 14,000 men two years ago; and it was discovered that that Force could not be properly managed from centralized head-quarters. For this and other reasons, in the year 1882 the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who was then Chief Secretary, appointed six gentlemen, to whom he gave the name of Special Resident Magistrates. Those officials had districts assigned to them within which they had very great but somewhat undefined power over the police. The measure was in some respects—in many respects—in accordance with right principles of administration; but there were some great defects in the system. Those defects were inherent in the necessities of the moment, because the time was exceptional. A measure of great administrative importance had to be taken, and Parliament, in fact, had no leisure for the consideration of the details of this Bill. The principle was a right one; but there were some defects. In the first place there was some confusion between the several functions of the several magistrates. Some of them exercised judicial and administrative functions, and the administrative functions were of a nature which he thought ought to be specially divorced from the judicial functions, because they related to the detection of crime. Another defect was this—as a temporary measure it was all very well to allow gentleman in the position of Resident Magistrates to have control over the police; but, in the long run, it was an inconvenient plan, and somewhat perilous to a great Police Force, which had a regular hierarchy of officials, to place it under the command of gentlemen who did not belong to it, and who never had belonged to the Force. Another defect in the scheme, as a permanent scheme, was that those officials were too numerous. There were six of them at a time when six were required; but six were too many in ordinary times for centralizing and carrying on the police in Ireland; and that was one of the principal matters which the Government now wished to effect. And the final objection to the scheme was that it was too expensive. Temporary expenses were always excessive; but these were specially so. The Resident Magistrates received in pay and in allowances something like £1,500 a-year each. The Government wished to take what was good and what they thought might be permanent in this system, and leave out what was temporary and likely, in the long run, to be inexpedient; and, consequently, they proposed to ask the House to allow the Lord Lieutenant to name five persons to be Divisional Commissioners of the Royal Irish Constabulary. These five officials would exercise a decentralized power, and would have control of the police for the purposes of discipline and the detection of crime, and, in fact, for every purpose, just in the same way as a County Inspector had on a small scale, and as the Inspector General had for all purposes. These gentlemen would be police officers to all intents and purposes; and the Government, after considerable hesitation, had arrived at the conclusion to ask the House to insert a clause in the Bill stating that the persons appointed, from time to time, to fill vacancies should henceforth be taken from the officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary. The measure was one which would promote economy; for whereas each of the present Magistrates received £1,500 a-year, the new officials would receive £1,000 and their absolute travelling expenses, which would be the same as those of other officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary. The new officials would not have the private secretaries and clerks which were now attached to the Special Resident Magistrates. He thought it would not be too much to say that the system of Special Resident Magistrates, as compared with the system the Government proposed, was, at the very least, twice as expensive. Of course, there were gentlemen who would object to the system of decentralization in the police for the purposes of detection of crime; and to those gentlemen he would only say that the Government considered this quite a vital point, and that they had shown how vital they considered it by setting up the system of Special Resident Magistrates, which had opened up their action to great criticism. They had now greatly improved the system, administratively and economically; and in bringing forward this Bill they endorsed very strongly the doctrine that judicial functions in Ireland, as elsewhere, should be absolutely and entirely separated from administrative and police functions. The Special Resident Magistrates would be Justices of the Peace, not for the purpose of setting in Court, but simply for the purpose of dealing with riots, just as, he believed, the Inspector General and superior officers of police now were. One other provision was inserted in the Bill, and it was the only one on which he need say a single word. One of the Assistant Inspectors General, of whom there were three, was at this moment the Divisional Magistrate, Mr. Reve; and if the Bill passed he would be continued as Divisional Commissioner, and his place as Assistant Inspector General would not be filled up; and if any Assistant Inspector General in the future was appointed an Assistant Divisional Commissioner, the Lord Lieutenant would have it in his power not to fill the post vacated. As a matter of fact, he had no doubt the Lord Lieutenant would endeavour not to fill up such vacancy. The Bill was so economical, as compared with the previous method of carrying out the principle, that the Government earnestly trusted the House would eventually adopt it. His only duty now was to ask hon. Gentlemen to allow the measure to be placed in their hands.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to improve the administration of the Royal Irish Constabulary in certain particulars."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that, at that hour of the night (2.5 a.m.), and at that stage of the Bill, he did not intend to offer any prolonged opposition to the measure. Of course, he only spoke for himself; but, having made that observation, he thought he was entitled to remark that the right hon. Gentleman had hardly acted fairly towards the Irish Members. This was the day for slipping Business through the House, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for County Galway (Colonel Nolan) had said earlier on, because large numbers of Members, naturally enough, prolonged their vacation, and did not appear in their places on the first day after the holidays. He was sure Irish Members would have been in their places in much larger numbers if they had been aware that the right hon. Gentleman intended to put this Bill down for its first stage that night. The right hon. Gentleman must know that the measure was not one on which Irish Members could look with any favour. If there were one class of Government officials who, during the past three or four years in Ireland, had left more odious recollections behind them than another, it was the class of individuals who were to be made permanent by this Bill. There was not a place in Ireland where these Special Resident Magistrates had been appointed where the people did not remember them with the strongest feelings of animosity. He had been glad to hear some admissions the right hon. Gentleman had made in the course of his speech. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman was convinced that the system of Special Resident Magistrates was one of the most expensive luxuries the Government permitted themselves to indulge in, even in Ireland; and, in the next place, it was laid down as a principle that the Government were anxious to separate judicial from administrative and police functions. That was a most excellent principle; and he would invite the right hon. Gentleman to consider the desirability of extending the system still higher, and requiring the Irish Judges to abandon the career and position of active and pugnacious politicians, which, in other countries, they were supposed to have left behind when they stepped from the Bar to the Bench. In a previous Session the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues had laid great stress on the fact that judicial and police functions were to be separated; and that, in future, cases would be tried, not by magistrates who were concerned in bringing charges against prisoners, but by magistrates who had nothing to do with the previous stages of cases. Some had thought that what the right hon. Gentleman promised was to be a reality, and not a sham. The right hon. Gentleman had set up a number of Stipendiary Magistrates, who were the tools or instruments of the Government, employed mainly for the purpose of convicting prisoners, whether or not there were a fair case against them. He hoped the promise of the right hon. Gentleman had given on the present occasion would not be of the same character. At that period of the night he did not intend to offer any further observations. At a later stage of the Bill he would take the opportunity, with some of his hon. Friends, of offering other and stronger objection to it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. TREVELYAN and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND. [Bill 176.]

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—(No. 59.)

(The Earl of Morley.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF MORLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he regretted that it had come up so late. Amendments had been made in Clauses 4 and 7 relating to imprisonment, fraudulent enlistment, and desertion; but they were neither numerous nor of great importance.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Morley.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD wished to call attention to a matter upon which he had more than once spoken ineffectually—namely, the necessity for improved arrangements for the distribution of Army booty on the system in force for Navy Prize. In the Navy there were many prizes and few disputes. In the Army there were few prizes and many disputes; the Admiralty Court having imperative jurisdiction in one case, but only permissive jurisdiction in the other. The notorious Banda and Kirwee case might have been disposed of by one decision in one Court 15 years ago; whereas it had been the subject of frequent mention in Parliament, several suits in different Courts, including a Petition of Right heard in the House of Lords, and the claimants were not now satisfied that the decision against them had been on merit. A slight alteration of the Act to give the Admiralty Court the same jurisdiction in both cases appeared to be the remedy.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Earl appeared to be misinformed upon this subject. With respect to Maritime Prize, it had been the practice for the Crown, at the commencement of any war, to make a general grant of all prizes which might be captured at sea during that war to the captors, and to establish Special Prize Courts, having a jurisdiction distinct from the general jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, for the determination of all questions arising out of any such captures; and Acts of Parliament had been passed to regulate the jurisdiction and the proceedings of those Prize Courts. Those Courts decided, not only questions as to the rights of participation in prize, but also questions as to the validity of the title acquired by capture, as against the former owners of the ships or cargoes taken. The Court of Admiralty, as such, had no jurisdiction in those cases; though Admiralty Judges had usually been made Judges in the Prize Courts. The case was altogether different as to booty of war resulting from military operations by land. The nature of such booty was different from that of Naval Prize. It vested in the Crown, without condemnation or sentence of any Court. It had never been the practice to make any general prospective grants of booty to the Army Forces which might be employed in the course of a war. Every case was dealt with as it arose, after booty had been actually taken, according to the sole discretion of the Crown; the troops had no right to anything more than the Crown, in each particular case, might please to grant to them; and no Courts were established with any jurisdiction as to such booty, though the Crown might, if it thought fit, refer questions relating to it to the Court of Admiralty.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, the Government, after full consideration, did not think any advantage would be gained by making imperative the option given to the Admiralty Court to deal with such cases. This question, however, had nothing whatever to do with the Bill before the House.

VISCOUNT BURY said, it was, in his view, inconvenient that a Bill of this importance should be introduced at so short a notice. It only left the House of Commons yesterday, and appeared on the Paper in their Lordships' House as the first Order of the Day to-day.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION (IRELAND).

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

LORD WAVENEY, who had given Notice of his intention to move a Resolution to the effect that all boroughs of not more than 1,000 registered voters at the time of passing any Bill for redistribution of seats in Parliament in Ireland shall be incorporated into the representation of the counties wherein they are situate by the addition of so many Members to the county representation as these boroughs shall have aforesaid returned to Parliament, to be elected then and thenceforward on the county franchise, said, that in the absence of the Lord President of the Council he should postpone his Motion until the 6th of May.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he must object to the Motion of the noble Lord being proposed in any way, in that it was entirely uncalled for. There was, at the present moment, before the House of Commons a Bill dealing with the question of the franchise; and as it would be wholly irregular to move such a Resolution as the noble Lord had placed on the Paper, he hoped he would not, in the circumstances, attempt to proceed with it.

LORD WAVENEY said, he would remind the noble Earl that a Resolution on a similar subject had been moved by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Limerick). He (Lord Waveney) did not admit that the present Resolution was either irregular or unconstitutional. He should certainly persevere with it, if only as a protest against the supineness attributed to their Lordships' House in originating important matters of legislation.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that whatever irregularity there was in the course which the noble Lord proposed to take seemed to consist in this—that it looked like an effort to anticipate the decision which their Lordships would have come to in regard to a Bill at present before the other House. Did the noble Lord consider how far that course would be a convenient one? To his mind it did not seem very convenient for this House to proceed by way of Resolution, when the more obvious and convenient course was to wait until the Bill came before them. His object in rising, however, was for the purpose of protesting against the too great breadth of the demurrer which had been raised by the noble Earl at the Table (the Earl of Redesdale). He doubted whether the position the noble Earl had taken could be supported by precedents. Their Lordships knew that it was quite competent for a Bill to be introduced in the House of Lords dealing with a matter which was also the subject of a Bill in the other House; and he never knew that there was anything to prevent their passing a Resolution in regard to a matter which was the subject of a Bill elsewhere. In fact, he remembered an occasion, and the noble Earl (Earl Granville) would probably be able to corroborate him, on which Lord Grey moved a Resolution for the appointment of a Committee on the subject of Reform at the very time that the Reform Bill was under the consideration of the other House. It would also be in the recollection of their Lordships that quite recently in the other House of Parliament a Motion was brought forward which, if carried, would have had the effect of removing a very valuable portion of their Lordships' House, and would therefore have materially interfered with its constitution.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he was of opinion that anything which affected the constitution of the other House of Parliament ought not in their Lordships' House to be dealt with by means of Resolution, but should form matter of a Bill. As to the action of the other House, to which the noble Marquess had referred, he believed that nothing could have been more disorderly or contrary to Order than the Resolution recently moved; and he hoped their Lordships would not follow the precedent set by the other House.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it appeared to him that this was nothing more than a mere technical irregularity, even if that; for he was not aware there was any Redistribution Bill before the other House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Yes; there is Sir John Hay's.

EARL GRANVILLE said, however that might be, the course proposed to be adopted by the noble Lord (Lord Waveney) would certainly not be convenient. It would be perfectly impossible for Members of the Government to discuss the provisions of a Bill which was not before them, although they were pledged to discuss it on a future day.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
GENERAL GORDON.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to inquire, Whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will give this House information as to the present critical position of General Gordon; and whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to take any steps for his relief? said: My Lords, before the commencement of the Easter holidays, when Parliament was separating, Questions were asked in this House as to whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared to give any information with regard to the position of General Gordon in the Soudan, and the measures which they proposed to take with regard to it. To those Questions no very direct or explicit answers were given; but we were assured by the noble Earl opposite, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, if I gathered correctly the general purport of his remarks, that Her Majesty's Government were fully alive to their responsibilities, and that they entertained no fears at that time as to the safety of General Gordon. I am not about to quote any speech made in "another place;" but, at the same time, I shall not be exceeding the precedents allowed in this House if I say that we gathered, from sources of information which we know to be perfectly correct, that the Prime Minister, speaking in the same tone, went somewhat beyond the remarks of the noble Earl, and stated that General Gordon was perfectly able to withdraw from Khartoum if he thought fit, that he was at perfect liberty to withdraw, and that there was no more fear for his safety there than if he were in Cairo. Now, three weeks have passed since those two statements were made, and if the prospect was dark then, it has darkened very much since that time. It was but yesterday that we saw an announcement in the Press of a fresh massacre—300 fugitives were butchered to a man. We are told that Shendy is surrounded, we further learn that Berber is in much the same condition, and in another quarter it is stated that Kassala is also environed by rebels. In the same sources of information to which I have referred, I see some remarkable and very subtle distinctions set up between "surrounding" a place and "hemming" it in. I cannot myself follow those dialectical subtleties with sufficient skill to do justice to them. I am not prepared to say that General Gordon, at this very moment that I am speaking, is in imminent danger of death; that, of course, is all a question of time; but I may say, so far as information which is publicly open to us goes, there is every reason to believe that, given a certain time, General Gordon's life is not worth very much. And more than that, matters have changed for the worse in this respect—that General Gordon's mission is now pretty nearly an admitted failure. I doubt if anybody will stand up and say that he is either carrying out, or likely to carry out, the objects of his mission. General Gordon must himself see that whether "hemmed" in or "surrounded" he is practically a prisoner in Khartoum; and such seems to be the disturbance of feeling in all that country that, as we read in to-day's paper, Cairo has been practically placed in a state of siege. Now, what is, so far as we know, General Gordon's position? He is certainly beleaguered. He may have provisions enough for the present. But there is nothing certain as to whether his ammunition is running low. He praises the loyalty of the people; but we know that he has also been exposed to the treachery of officers, and he has but two Englishmen with him. I can perceive nothing more serious than that telegram from General Gordon to Sir Samuel Baker, which appeared in yesterday's papers, and which I understand the Government admit to be, if not textually, at all events substantially accurate. What, I say, is his position? I would not like to use the word—I do not like to give it that name—which is applied to it by many persons; and yet I hardly know what other term to use except that to which I refer—I mean "desertion." Her Majesty's Government, so far as I understand what they have said, deny that they are abandoning General Gordon. In the last despatch that has been published on this subject, and in the very last paragraph of it, I read these words of Sir Evelyn Baring to General Gordon. After recapitulating the instructions he says—

"In undertaking the difficult task which now lies before you, you may feel assured that no effort will be wanting on the part of the Cairo authorities, whether English or Egyptian, to afford you all the co-operation and support in their power."—[Egypt, No. 6 (1884), p. 3.]

If that is not to be construed into a pledge of help, I am totally at a loss to understand what is the meaning of the English language. No help has been given, and from the very meagre explanations which have been vouchsafed, no relief is at present intended. General Gordon even applied for the assistance of a certain Turkish Pasha, Zebehr. Her Majesty's Government refused that application, and I am not prepared to say that they were wrong there. But they have not granted the application; and if the story be true of the unciphered open telegram from Sir Evelyn Baring at Cairo to General Gordon at Khartoum, I am at a loss to understand how any Government can persuade itself that it was giving support to a man in Gordon's position. But, again, Her Majesty's Government seem to say, if I rightly understand what is reported in "another place," that General Gordon needs no help; that he is practically safe. I think the expression is "that he is as safe in Khartoum as he would be in Cairo." Well, that is an official statement on one side. I have to set against that, on the other, telegram after telegram which have appeared in the public prints, some of them purporting to have come from the only, or almost the only, other Englishman in Khartoum with General Gordon, and others from General Gordon himself, and your Lordships know very well that these two statements are absolutely irreconcilable. There is a telegram quoted in one of this morning's papers, which is so remarkable that I am loth almost to give credence to it; but, still, it is so remarkable that I think I may venture to read it to your Lordships. This telegram is as remarkable for its explicitness as its strength of language—

"General Gordon has telegraphed to Sir Evelyn Baring expressing the utmost indignation at the manner in which he has been abandoned by the English Government, and has Resolution, & thenceforth to cut himself convenient counsel from those who have deserted him, on whom will rest the blood-guiltiness for all lives hereafter lost in the Soudan."

I do not affirm that to be accurate. I should like to hear from Her Majesty's Government their version of the matter; but, at the same time, in substance, perhaps, it is correct. Well, then, I can only say, from all those private sources of information open to any one of your Lordships, and of which many of you have taken advantage, there is but one opinion among English communities, and that is that General Gordon is a doomed man. But then the Government have urged the great difficulty of relief or facilities of relief. Had relief, my Lords, been attempted earlier, the difficulty would have been proportionately less. We know very well what English troops have done before on those burning sands even later in the year than at present. We know what they have done recently. If there is to be no relieving force sent, it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to have thought of this some time ago. General Gordon was invited—he was urged—to undertake this perilous duty; and with a chivalry and unselfishness which does not find a corresponding echo in Downing Street, with a chivalry and unselfishness beyond all praise, he accepted the duty; and, more than that, he accepted it at a time when Her Majesty's Government needed his assistance sorely for their own political position here in England. They owe him a very great debt of political gratitude. For a time his ascendancy of character, and the influence he seems to exercise upon these tribes, prevailed; but it is perfectly clear that that influence is now waning, and there is very great reason to believe that a catastrophe at any moment of the gravest nature may fall upon him, or the people of Khartoum as well, because he declares practically in one of his telegrams that nothing will induce him to leave them to their fate. I ask if Her Majesty's Government have in contemplation any measures on this subject? [Cries of "None!"] My noble Friends behind me say "None!" but I do not quite believe it. I think Her Majesty's Government all through these memorable transactions in Egypt have had some measures in view, the misfortune has been that they have adopted them too late; and it is for that reason that I press now so urgently to know whether there are any measures in contemplation. Before the House separated we had frequent complaints "elsewhere" of the discussions that had taken place on this subject. No doubt it is very inconvenient for Her Majesty's Government to be interrogated on it; but let me point out that the remedy is in their own hands—if they will only declare openly and unreservedly what their intention is they will cease. At all events, we have time enough in this House to discuss these matters, and to press for information; and I hope no considerations will induce us to forget that which it is alike our right and our duty to repeat—namely, that for the information of the country it is expedient that we should know what is the position of General Gordon, and what steps the Government were prepared to take for his relief.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it was with great surprise that I read this morning that a few moments after I left the House last night, when there was absolutely nothing left on the Paper, and I was anxious to return to my Office, that the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) passed a very severe censure on me, and expressed his surprise, as he chose to call it, that I did not condescend to make a statement on the Egyptian policy of the Government in this House. I can quite understand the noble Earl's anxiety to make a statement of his own, and to add to some of the able and eloquent speeches which have been made during the Recess on this subject, which he has a perfect right to do, and which I do not in the slightest degree complain of. But I am perfectly unaware of the reasons why he expected one from me, or made a severe complaint against me for not having made a statement on this particular occasion. We all know that the noble Earl is a severe critic of foreign policy; we know how he criticized the foreign policy of Lord Beaconsfield; but it is quite new to me that one of the grounds of objection to Lord Beaconsfield's policy was that he did not weekly, or fortnightly, or monthly, volunteer a detailed statement of his foreign policy. The noble Earl has put a Question to me; he has also criticized somewhat severely a verbal distinction drawn in "another place." He says there is no difference between being surrounded and being hemmed in. But if a town is hemmed in it would not be possible for provisions largely to be brought into the town from outside. He went on to complain of what we had done; and he stated that General Gordon had been urged—he apparently insinuated it was somewhat against his will—to undertake this mission. What happened was this—we had for sometime in view the possibility of making use of General Gordon's great reputation and experience as regards affairs in Egypt, and at last General Gordon was consulted as to whether he had any advice to give us on this subject; and the advice given us in that perfectly simple-minded, chivalrous, energetic character to which the noble Earl has paid a just tribute was this—

"I advise you to send myself out, and I am confident that I shall be able, entirely concurring in your policy, both of evacuation and of not employing military force, to achieve great results in that manner."

The noble Earl says that, in not sending out a military expedition to his succour, we are acting contrary to the last phrase of the despatch he wrote. It is quite true he was promised co-operation; but we had not the slightest hint—we had not the slightest idea—that he required it, and it would be entirely contrary to the spirit of his mission that he should be backed up by a military expedition from this country. The noble Earl says we must admit General Gordon's mission has been an entire failure. I do not admit it. I think General Gordon, whether he succeeds or not, has done well. I quite agree with the noble Earl inasmuch as I am not sanguine as to the success of General Gordon in being able to withdraw all the garrisons from the different parts of the Soudan; but I say that he has done immense good by his arrival in putting an entire stop to the onward movement of the Mahdi's troops towards Egypt, so confidently predicted by noble Lords opposite. The noble Earl says General Gordon is in a critical position. I do not pretend that his position has not been one of danger. Ever since he left Cairo on his way to Khartoum dangers of all sorts have assailed him. The days on which he was in the greatest danger were during that almost romantic ride he undertook across the desert in order to reach Berber. But at this moment I repeat what has been stated "elsewhere," that I have no fear as to the personal safety of General Gordon in Khartoum now. There are provisions there for five months, and he himself said he was as safe as if he was in Cairo. It is well known that the Arabs shrink from any attempts at attacking a fortified town. I do not, therefore, admit that General Gordon—however much his chance of effecting his grand object may be affected—is in danger at this moment, or that Khartoum is in danger, or will be for some time to come. As to the telegram in this morning's papers, I should say it was sent, not to the Government, but to Sir Samuel Baker. And I am sorry for the feeling which, on the impulse of the moment, General Gordon showed. But I think it is most naturally explained. Unfortunately, of all telegrams and instructions sent to General Gordon only one short one has reached him, in consequence of the difficulty of communication; and, under the circumstances, I certainly am not surprised that General Gordon should have thought himself entirely abandoned by Her Majesty's Government. In answer to the noble Earl's Question, I say I do not consider that General Gordon's position at this time is critical; and I repeat what has already been stated twice in the other House, that Her Majesty's Government feel themselves under obligations with regard to the personal safety of General Gordon, but that they utterly decline to say more than that at this time. The noble Earl complains that an unciphered despatch had been sent to Berber. I have not the slightest idea whether it was sent unciphered. But, supposing it was, it was certainly a mistake, and it is exactly the mistake the Government have been exposed to, and liable to commit, by the constant pressure on the part of this House, and still more of the other House, calling upon us to say what we will do, and what we will not do. It is exactly the same kind of mischief. I have no more to add at this moment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the noble Earl complained with some severity of the censure of my noble Friend, because last night the noble Earl did not volunteer information on the subject of General Gordon. He does not appear to realize the deep anxiety felt out-of-doors by the whole of this country as to the fate of this gallant man. He appears to think it quite enough that we should wait quietly and see him beleaguered by men seeking his death, trusting to his five months' provisions, and the possibility of an expedition in the autumn. I do not think such stoicism will be shared by the people of this country. I think they will insist on some more active demonstration of sympathy on the part of Her Majesty's Government. I confess that I do not understand the nature of the defence urged by the noble Earl. It appears to be maintained that General Gordon's perilous mission was undertaken upon a sort of limited liability. Her Majesty's Government were willing to send General Gordon into danger, but on the distinct understanding that he was not to expect any help from them if that danger became serious. If that was the understanding it is a very remarkable one, and I do not suppose any Government has ever sent out a Representative of the Queen under such circumstances before—it is an absolutely new precedent in the history of English government. If that was the understanding with General Gordon, at least we must suppose that it was recorded in some definite form, and that he was aware of the strange and desperate character of the task with which he was intrusted by the Government. But what do we see in the telegram of which the Government themselves admit the substantial correctness? General Gordon expresses the utmost indignation at the manner in which he has been abandoned by Her Majesty's Government. That cannot be explained by saying that General Gordon had received no telegrams since he started. That is not the question. The question is, What was the understanding under which he went out? That is not affected by what has passed. It is clear from his statement that he, at least, did not suppose that he was to be exposed to certain death at the hands of the Arabs round Khartoum, and that the Government was to be free from any obligation to make the slightest attempt to relieve him. My Lords, I know that your feeling and the feeling of the country is one of deep personal sympathy with General Gordon; but there is more than deep personal sympathy to be considered—there is the honour of the British nation. No deeper, no more vital disgrace could befall this country than that General Gordon should be allowed to perish in his undertaking without assistance from the English Government. Already there is sufficient of Egyptian blood to be laid at the door of Her Majesty's Government; already we have made sacrifices enough of those whose Kingdom we have taken over, whose responsibility we have undertaken, and to whose safety we are practically and substantially pledged. We have had now five massacres of Egyptian troops, massacres caused by the neglect of Her Majesty's Government—Hicks, Baker, Sinkat, Moncrieff, and Shendy. I do not suppose so bloody an account—an account in which blood so mingled with disgrace was ever brought home to an English Government before. If they are resolved to make no effort to save this gallant man they will not only be covering the English name with dishonour, but they will be destroying that belief in English prowess which is the only hope they have of being able successfully to discharge their responsibilities in Egypt. They cannot scuttle out of the country, having destroyed every form of government, and leave things just as they are. The responsibility, let the Government shrink from it and shirk it as they will, must rest with them; and it is on the reputation of England that they must depend for their power to carry it out. By their neglect, and by the disgrace which, time after time, they pile upon the name of England, they are paralyzing the power of this country. I hope they may even yet be induced to make some announcement that will alter the state of things in Egypt. But we at least cannot undertake the complicity of silence; we believe that the silence observed by Her Majesty's Government is perilous to General Gordon, is ruinous to the hope of England's supremacy in Egypt. We believe that if even now the announcement of some effective steps were made, whatever the physical difficulties in the way, it would act with magical effect on the banks of the Nile; but if this ruinous silence is persisted in a catastrophe will come which will cover England with disgrace, and the responsibility of which we will not share.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, that the noble Marquess, profiting by the Recess, had taken the advice of a young and active Leader in his Party not to shrink from responsibility. He had recommended an immediate military expedition to Khartoum, and that this country should assume the responsibility of the government of the Soudan.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I said nothing about assuming responsibility for the government of the Soudan; but that, whether you were right or wrong in being there, the government of Egypt must be with you, and that responsibility you cannot shirk.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: Do I understand that the noble Marquess does not recommend that the government of the Soudan should be assumed?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: That is quite another matter.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he had certainly understood the noble Marquess to have made that recommendation a few minutes ago. If he had no such intention he would, of course, accept the disclaimer; but he regarded it as an instance of the ambiguity and vagueness of the language used by the noble Marquess, for he certainly had understood him in that sense. The noble Marquess, however, had recommended an immediate military expedition to Khartoum. Had he considered the season of the year—the difficulties of the operation—the loss of life to the English troops by approaching the Equator in the middle of an African summer? While recommending this expedition, the noble Marquess, almost in the same breath, had accused the Government of blood-guiltiness. That was the characteristic consistency of the noble Marquess, who further had entirely misrepresented what fell from his noble Colleague (Earl Granville). The noble Earl explained, what everybody must have known thoroughly well—namely, that when General Gordon accepted his mission to Khartoum it was on the distinct understanding that it was to be a pacific mission, and not to be supported by any military expedition. Because the noble Earl had repeated, with perfect accuracy, a circumstance notorious to all, the noble Marquess immediately endeavoured to fix on him the responsibility of saying that under all circumstances General Gordon would be abandoned by the Government. Nothing of the kind had ever been said. On the contrary, the Government had always admitted their responsibility for the safety of General Gordon. But the House must be aware that in matters of this kind it was impossible for the Government to give explanations as to what course they might think it their duty to take; and in answer to these desultory Questions no other reply could properly be given by those responsible for the management of these most difficult affairs than the reply which had been made by his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that the noble Earl had entirely misrepresented what had been said by his noble Friend. Whenever that question had been raised in that House those on that side of the House, at least, had been careful not to say what the Government ought to do, but to leave the responsibility with them, and with them the responsibility must remain. What the noble Marquess had said was what he believed was felt by every man on that side of the House, that no sign of activity was being shown by Her Majesty's Government, and that the practical outcome of the policy that they had chosen to adopt was that "too late" must be written on every one of their operations; that nothing they could now do would serve to free General Gordon from the despair in which he found himself. Some astonishment had been expressed that General Gordon had been drawn into using some expressions which he was construed to have used in haste. But for months General Gordon had remained in Khartoum looking over the desert for the help that should have come to him. They knew that not only did the people of England regard the position of that gallant man with the deepest sympathy, but that they would hold those responsible who should leave him to a bloody fate. They had had five massacres, as the noble Marquess had said, every one of which might have been prevented by some timely steps on the part of Her Majesty's Government; another massacre would too surely follow. What they on that side of the House wished to say was that they would have no share in the responsibility of that massacre by not warning the Government of the consequences of the policy that they were now pursuing. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had alluded with some contempt to the fact that prophecies had been made that that insurrection of the Mahdi was likely to spread from the Soudan into Egypt. But, as a matter of fact, the telegrams showed even now that it was spreading; and recent information had reached them that the tribes were gradually rising between Khartoum and Assouan and to the Second Cataract, from which the insurrection was sure to extend into Egypt Proper. What preparations had the Government now made to stop that advance of the rebels which would surely take place, and which would involve the whole of Egypt? If the insurrection extended beyond the limits of Egypt, did noble Lords opposite not believe that it would extend to the whole of the Mahomedan populations which were subject to the sway of Her Majesty? Was there no danger for India in the policy of laissez aller now being allowed to continue? The noble Earl who spoke last said Her Majesty's Government was under a pledge only to give moral support to General Gordon. But if this was so, that unciphered telegram about which they had heard, and which the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs passed by so lightly, was a most important example of want of moral support to General Gordon. Even although the Government might refuse to send him material support, which they on the Opposition Benches thought he had a right to demand, still the sending of an open, unsealed letter was a failure of moral support. The noble Earl said the sending of this unciphered telegram was a mere mistake. But was it really so? Within half-an-hour of the despatch of that telegram the whole of those concerned knew perfectly well that General Gordon had nothing further to hope for from this country in the way of material support. From that moment General Gordon, as they knew by his own despatches and telegrams, gave the matter up for lost. He said that he would not take any further orders from Her Majesty's Government, but that he would pursue his own course, and what that course was they all knew. He had written to his friend, Sir Samuel Baker, asking whether, among the capitalists of this country and of America, £200,000 could not be raised to send him that military aid which certainly ought to have been sent to him by this country. Would it not be a disgrace if they should go cap in hand from one capitalist to another to ask them to subscribe a fund for the purpose of rescuing an eminent General from death? In some quarters the raising of such a fund had been contemplated upon the receipt of the telegram. But it would be impossible to carry out such an object without the consent of Her Majesty's Government. He asked, therefore, whether they would not sanction the raising of that fund to despatch such an expedition as could be organized by Sir Samuel Baker with the £200,000? Without the assent of the Government it would be useless, impracticable, and almost impossible to raise such a fund. But when they looked around and saw that General Gordon was to be abandoned, at any rate until the autumn, then they had to see whether in any quarter aid could be given. The Government, at least, ought to tell their Lordships whether they would sanction such an expedition, or whether they would themselves send forth any expedition, organized in their own way, to the relief of General Gordon. If they would not themselves send out an expedition, would they sanction the stepping of other persons into the breach, and the taking upon themselves the duty which the Government shrunk from undertaking? The outlook before that gallant man at Khartoum was certainly a dismal one. They had seen it stated in some of the speeches that were delivered during the Recess that at the time General Gordon was sent out the Conservative Party were a consenting party to his despatch, because they did not object. It was true that the Conservative Party did not object. It would have been impossible at any time for the Conservative Party to object with effect to any mode which the Government chose to adopt, and upon their own responsibility to declare advisable, for a change of the position of affairs in the Soudan. But having once sent General Gordon out, and his self-devotion having placed him in a position of danger, it was manifest that all England would demand that he should be there supported, and the half-hearted denials of responsibility by Her Majesty's Government would not be echoed throughout the country. Some means must be found by which General Gordon should be rescued from the position in which he was placed, or great would be the responsibility of the Government in the matter.

LORD WAVENEY said, he believed these means to be now at hand. It was impossible to believe that the nation would rest content with seeing General Gordon sacrificed to his spirit of devotion. They had heard a great deal respecting the duty of maintaining General Gordon at Khartoum, and about guiding him safely through that policy which he had inaugurated so well. Their Lordships would recollect the Abyssinian Expedition conducted by the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Napier), whom he did not see present. He had taken pains to verify the districts which interposed between the last scene of his great triumph — Magdala — and Khartoum, upon which the eyes of the world were at present fixed. After enumerating the various places on the route between those two cities, he pointed out that an Abyssinian Army had been, on a former occasion, stationed within six marches of Galahat, the most advanced Egyptian camp, and that a force of 25,000 men, which was at present available, should be utilized to march across the Frontier to the relief of Khartoum. This force would be strong enough to cope with all the difficulties, and if made in May or June it would be perfectly capable of opening the gates of that beleaguered city, and of relieving a district which was at present threatened with anarchy.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, they had heard two things that night. The first was that Her Majesty's Government did not intend to assist General Gordon at this time, and the second was that it was impossible to do so. But if it was impossible, that should be shown and clearly proved. If it were impossible, he did not think they should have had Lord Napier of Magdala a short time ago entering into details showing how an expedition could be undertaken and General Gordon relieved. If there was a possibility of doing so it ought to be tried, and any doubt there might be it should be in favour of General Gordon. He saw a letter a day or two ago in The Times from a distinguished officer, stating that if we had sent Indian troops a month ago to Suakin, those troops would have had a good chance of marching to Khartoum.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Lord Napier suggested that Indian troops should not be employed, but English troops.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, the Government did not seem to be aware of the tremendous feeling with which General Gordon was regarded in the country; but they could not now plead ignorance; and they might rest assured that if anything fatal happened to General Gordon, they would not long after remain in Office. In the whole course of his life—a great part of which had been a political one—he had never known the feeling of the country to be so strongly and so universally displayed as it had been upon the question of the position of General Gordon.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY observed, that the noble and gallant Lord on the Cross Benches (Lord Napier of Magdala) told them a few days ago that there would be no difficulty in sending troops across the desert to relieve Khartoum. His object in rising was to ask a Question with reference to one point in the speech of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville). The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had declined to give any information as regards what was to be done in the future; but he prefaced his observations by stating that Her Majesty's Government had still a thorough belief that General Gordon was perfectly safe, and that he was still in a position to carry out what the noble Earl had described as the grand object for which he went to Khartoum.

EARL GRANVILLE: I said nothing of the kind.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY: Does the noble Earl tell me that he has not said in this House that, in the belief of Her Majesty's Government, General Gordon was able to carry out the grand object for which he went to Khartoum?

EARL GRANVILLE: No.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, in that case, he must confess that his whole question was at an end. He understood from the noble Earl that the Government still believed that General Gordon could carry out his grand object. He was surprised at such a statement, and he rose simply to ask the noble Earl what the "grand object" of General Gordon was? He had never had a distinct statement from the Government as to the exact mission General Gordon was sent to accomplish. He heard, incidentally as it were, that he was to relieve the Egyptian garrisons in the Soudan. It was too late now to say a word on that subject; but he hoped the noble Earl would excuse him if he ventured to ask what the grand object was for which General Gordon was sent out to Khartoum?

EARL GRANVILLE: I am sorry the noble Earl misunderstood what I said. There is no doubt whatever as to the object of General Gordon's mission. It was twofold. Primarily, it was to assist the garrisons in coming away from the Soudan; and, secondarily, to arrange, if possible, some settled Government for the Soudan. I did not state that I was confident of the success of these objects which General Gordon has undertaken. On the contrary, I admitted that his chances of success were very greatly diminished. I said that I considered that he had served a most useful purpose by arriving at Khartoum and stopping the onward movement of the Mahdi, on which so much stress was laid by the Opposition.

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT—CONFERENCE OF EUROPEAN POWERS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS gave Notice that he would ask, Whether the Government, having proposed to the Powers a Conference on the affairs of Egypt generally, the German Government had declined that proposal; and, whether, in consequence of that refusal, the Government had decided that the proposed Conference should be confined to the financial affairs of Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: It may be irregular in me, but I may save the hon. Gentleman trouble by saying that there is no truth whatever in the statements referred to in his Notice.

HARBOURS (IRELAND)—KINGSTOWN HARBOUR.

MR. ION HAMILTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether favourable consideration will be given to the Memorial of the Township Commissioners of Kingstown, praying that a portion of the Harbour, now but little used, should be converted into a graving dock, to meet the growing requirements of the port of Dublin?

MR. COURTNEY: The Memorial of the Kingstown Commissioners has been duly considered, and will be answered immediately. There appears to be nothing in the circumstances of the case to justify the suggested expenditure of public money on what would be a commercial speculation.

FOREIGN LAND LAWS—SWISS FEDERAL CODE OF OBLIGATIONS.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will call upon Mr. Carew, Her Majesty's Consul at Berne, to report upon the working of the 25 Articles of the Swiss Federal Code of Obligations which relate to the leases of farms, and which came into operation on the 1st of January 1883; and, if he will lay such Report upon the Table of the House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Berne has already been called upon to furnish the Report which the hon. and gallant Member requires for presentation to Parliament.

IRELAND—CITY OF DUBLIN—SANITARY INQUIRIES.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that three inquiries connected with sanitary matters were held at the City Hall, Dublin, on the 20th March, at none of which the executive sanitary officer of the city was present, but engaged in other professional work elsewhere; and, whether the Local Government Board will arrange that a corporate officer should give his whole time to the duties of his office?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that two inquiries were held in Dublin on the day named by the Engineer and an Inspector of the Local Government Board; and that Dr. Cameron was not present at either of them—the question at issue not being such as required his attendance or evidence. There is no rule of the Local Government Board requiring an executive sanitary officer to give the whole of his time to the duties of his office; and the Board consider that the question whether he should do so is one for the sanitary authority.

POST OFFICE—THE TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

DR. CAMERON asked the Postmaster General, When the account for the last financial year of the receipts and expenditure of the Post Office Telegraph Service, prepared on commercial principles, will be published; whether, in the meantime, he could give the House any estimate of the amount which it will probably show under the head of "Balance of Profit;" and, whether he can state the increase in the number of messages sent last year as compared with the year previous?

MR. FAWOETT: The question of introducing some modifications into the form in which the telegraph account, made up on commercial principles, has hitherto been presented to Parliament, is now being considered by the Treasury; and this may cause some delay in the presentation of the account. By the end of next month it will be possible to give an estimate of the balance of profit for the past financial year. In reply to the latter part of my hon. Friend's Question, I may state that the number of messages sent last year was 32,732,000, being an increase of 640,000 over the previous year. The increase in that year over the preceding year was 746,000.

DR. CAMERON asked the Postmaster General, How much of the money voted by Parliament for expenditure during last financial year on postal telegraph works, necessitated by the contemplated introduction of sixpenny telegrams, was actually expended; how many "learners" were added to the telegraph staff in anticipation of the increased work; and, whether they have been retained on the staff, or dismissed?

Mr. FAWCETT: About £180,000 was expended in the last financial year on works necessitated by the contemplated introduction of a reduced rate for telegrams, and the works will be available when the new tariff is brought into operation. The staff was not increased anywhere in anticipation of the reduced tariff; but a few learners were taken on in various offices to be trained, and there is no intention of dismissing them.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—DEATHS IN WATERFORD GAOL—CASE OF JAMES COMMINS.

Mr. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Who are the Visiting Justices of Waterford Gaol; how often did they visit the late James Commins while he was under restraint; were they present at the sworn inquiry by the Local Government Board into the circumstances of his death, or did they receive notice of same; were any of the relatives of the deceased informed of it, or allowed to be present at it; were all the doctors who had been examined at the coroner's inquest also examined at the inquiry; will the report of the inquiry be laid upon the Table; and, whether, within the last few years, a death occurred in Waterford Gaol under circumstances similar to those attending the death of Commins?

Mr. TREVELYAN: The Visiting Justices for the Waterford Gaol are the Hon. D. F. Fortescue and Messrs. R. T. Carew, Armstrong, A. Congreve, Congreve Rogers, F. G. Bloomfield, David Kent, Henry Galway, and Lawrence A. Ryan. Two of these gentlemen saw James Commins on the 21st of March, while he was under restraint. He was not visited by them on any other occasion. They were not present at the sworn inquiry held by the Inspector of the Prisons Board; and I am informed that as such a course is not usual they did not receive notice of it. None of the relatives of the deceased were present at the inquiry, nor did they receive notice of it. The death was notified to them as required by statute. The medical officer of the prison was the only medical man examined at the inquiry, inasmuch as the inquiry was for the purpose of ascertaining whether any neglect could be attributed to the officers of the prison, and not into matters which it was the duty of the Coroner to inquire into. Reports of this character are confidential, and for the information of the Government, and it is not usual to lay them on the Table of the House. I am informed that no previous death occurred in Waterford Prison under precisely similar circumstances; but the hon. Member probably refers to the case of a man who, about four years ago, was put under restraint, in consequence of his having made preparations to commit suicide, and was afterwards found dead in his cell.

Mr. LEAMY: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that it is not a fact that within the last four years two men, who had been strapped down in their beds, were not found dead; whether, this having occurred now a second time, no proper inquiry has been made into it? Does the right hon. Gentleman think it a fair and proper thing that the only doctor who was examined at the inquiry was the one who saw this man kept under this restraint? The man was killed; and it is a mean thing and a burning shame not to give us an inquiry into it. ["Oh!" and "Order!"]

Mr. TREVELYAN said, that the Government were not to blame, as any witnesses might have been called upon that had material evidence to give.

Mr. HEALY: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman if the doctor of the prison is not the gentleman whose conduct is impugned in this Question; if he is not indirectly charged with causing the death of this man by ordering him to be strapped down; and, also, if the person thus incriminated was the only one who gave evidence at the Government inquiry?

Mr. TREVELYAN: The only medical man—not the only person.

Mr. HEALY: Yes; was the only medical man; then, why not summon another one as a witness?

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPEAL FROM DECISION OF SUB-COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, in a case of George M'Cord, tenant, Sir Richard Wallace, landlord, brought into the court of the Antrim Sub-Commission by an originating notice served by the tenant to have a fair rent fixed, the Sub-Commission confirmed the old rent, and, on appeal by the tenant to the Chief Commission, that tribunal confirmed the decision of the inferior Court, thus leaving the old rent unaltered; whether the evidence for the tenant before both Courts founded his claim to a reduction of rent upon improvements in the holding made in recent years, and purchased by him about five years ago; whether, in the interval between the decision of the Sub-Commission and Court of Appeal, the tenant was served by the Irish Land Commission with a printed document called the Official Valuer's Report, setting forth that the official valuer had valued his holding at £23, and that this valuation, "made for the purpose of the re-hearing," was "exclusive of buildings," and "making no allowance for alleged tenant's improvements;" whether it was proved at the hearing by competent witnesses, and admitted by the landlord, that the improvements had been made by the tenant; and, whether, nevertheless, the rent, as fixed by the Sub-Commission, and confirmed by the Commission, is £23 14s., being 14s. a-year over the official valuation, which included all the improvements except the buildings?

MR. TREVELYAN: I brought this Question under the notice of the Land Commissioners, and have received from them the following observations with regard to it:—

"It is true that in the case referred to the Sub-Commission left the former rent unaltered, and that the Commissioners on re-hearing affirmed the decision of the Sub-Commission. It is also true that the valuer for the Commissioners valued the holding at 14s. a-year below the judicial rent. The Commissioners, having decided the case before them, according to what they deemed just, declined to enter into the evidence or discuss the merits."

I must say for myself that I have received a statement from another quarter to the effect that the hon. Member who put this Question on the Paper was misinformed on some particulars. His statement of the case is one-sided and incorrect, and there is a presumption that such is the case, considering that the Commissioners had all the facts before them when they decided; and there is a certain inconvenience, not to say an unfairness possibly, in stating a legal case in a Question on the Paper in a way giving an impression it did not give before the Court.

MR. HARRINGTON: Is not the other impression of the case that from the landlord's point of view?

MR. TREVELYAN: I said there was another impression of the case which commended itself to the Court.

MR. HARRINGTON: The right hon. Gentleman says he received information from another quarter. Was that from the landlord?

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not think it right to say.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—ELECTORAL DIVISION OF TAUGHBOY, ATHLONE UNION.

MR. HARRINGTON (for Mr. SEXTON) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, with reference to the recent election of a Poor Law Guardian for the Electoral Division of Taughboy, in the Union of Athlone, the attention of the Irish Local Government Board has been drawn to the fact that Article 9 of the Board's Election Order, requiring that the returning officer should issue a "Notice of Election," in the prescribed form, and have copies of the same posted on or near all places of worship, courthouses, and police stations, not later than the 25th of February in each year, had not been observed in the case of this election, inasmuch as the "Notice of Election" prescribed by Article 9 was not posted anywhere in the Taughboy Division until the 10th of March, being six days later than the date fixed by law for the nomination of persons to be guardians; whether, before the first session of the new board, a qualified ratepayer of the division in question warned the returning officer of the invalidity of the election; whether, in consequence of the omission before stated, the whole proceedings relating to the election for the division were not, in fact, invalid; and, whether a new election has been ordered?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that it is the case that the usual notice was not posted in proper time in the Electoral Division mentioned, and also that a ratepayer named Matthew Naughton intimated to the Returning Officer that on that ground he should not return any person as elected. It appears, however, that, notwithstanding the late posting of the notice, the time for making nominations was well known. Nominations were made in time, and the election was contested. The ratepayer mentioned as objecting to a return himself took an active part in the proceedings, and did not raise his objection until the result of the election was known. Under these circumstances, the Local Government Board are advised that the accidental delay in posting the notices did not invalidate the election.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—OUTPORT OFFICERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Is it true there are six acting examining officers at the outports of Her Majesty's Customs who have been doing the duties of examining officers efficiently for a period ranging from ten to fourteen years, and whose characters are unimpeachable; how is it that the assurances given by him, as appeared in The Freeman's Journal of 28th February, viz. that the case of these officers would be considered when the first vacancies arose, and would he explain the reason why those men have not yet been promoted to the rank of examining officer; if the aforesaid officers are not competent, on what grounds are they continued in the performance of those duties for so lengthened a period; has it not been a recognized rule of the Board that one-half of these promotions is filled by competition, the other half by selection; and, if such be the case, would not the grievances of these officers have been removed long since?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, there are six officers in the position described. No promise has been given to promote them to the first vacancies open for selection; but their cases have been and will, as I said before, be considered as vacancies arise. Since February 28 there have been four promotions, and the explanation of the fact that no one of the six has been selected is that while they are competent for their duties, there were better men in the Service.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

Mr. Trevelyan

Whether Her Majesty's Government have yet submitted any, and, if so, what proposals to the other Powers for the settlement of the financial difficulties of Egypt?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I must refer the hon. Member to the statement on this subject made yesterday by the Prime Minister, to which I have nothing to add.

MR. M'COAN: That statement of the Prime Minister did not give any information whatever.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have no other information to give.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT—FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE— TRANSIT OF INFECTED CATTLE.

MR. HICKS asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he has received information that 101 bullocks were sent on Monday, 14th April, from Liverpool to North Road Station, on London and North Western Railway, in the county of Cambridge, and then driven along the public roads to Wimpole; that fifty of these bullocks were then sent on by road to Cambridge, and that thirteen of the remaining fifty-one were on Friday 18th reported as having the foot and mouth disease, and, when inspected the same day, were found to be suffering from that disease in an advanced stage; and, whether it is a fact, as reported, that the above bullocks were part of a cargo recently arrived from Canada?

MR. DODSON: The only information which we have on the subject referred to in this Question is obtained from the Inspector of the Local Authority. It is to the effect that 15 head of cattle out of 51 were found, after their arrival at Wimpole, to be affected with foot-and-mouth disease. The Inspector remarks that these animals came by train from Liverpool on Tuesday morning on the London and North Western line, and that they came from America. They could not have come from the United States, because all animals arriving from there are slaughtered at the port of landing. The last cargo of animals which arrived at Liverpool from Canada were landed on April 12th, and were found quite sound on landing.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Is the right hon. Gentleman in a position to say where the diseased cattle did come from?

MR. DODSON: I have given the House all the information I have.

MR. J. LOWTHER: But will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries as to where the cattle did come from?

MR. DODSON: The cattle, we are told, came from Liverpool, and the Inspector said they came from America. I have shown that that could not be so, and I have given the date of the arrival of the last cargo from Canada. If I receive any further information, I shall be very glad to give it to the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER: What I asked was, whether the Government would undertake to make inquiries—not take hearsay evidence?

MR. HENEAGE: It is very easy to find out where they came from.

MR. HICKS: At any rate, will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries as to what became of the rest of this cargo of 101 bullocks?

MR. DODSON: I will put the House in possession of all the information I can obtain.

MR. CHAPLIN: I beg to ask whether we are to understand that the Government have not already begun to make inquiries; and whether the right hon. Gentleman is not in a position to give information as to prevalence of the foot-and-mouth disease in the United States and in Canada?

MR. DODSON: As far as our information goes, there is no foot-and-mouth disease whatever in Canada. I believe it is not known in Canada, which has been a free country for years. As regards the United States, we have no information that there is at present any foot-and-mouth disease.

MR. JAMES HOWARD: Will the Government make a thorough investigation into the subject, and inform the House of the result on Thursday next?

MR. DODSON: I have already stated that I will procure all the information I can.

MR. STORER: A great outbreak of the disease has also taken place in the Midland Counties, in Northamptonshire and Leicestershire, owing, in a great measure, to animals coming from Ireland. Cannot some inquiry be made about that?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Is it not a fact that there is no disease in Ireland at all?

MR. DODSON: The last Report we had from the Irish Government, a week or 10 days ago, was that Ireland was entirely free; but I am sorry to say there have been reports within the last two or three days of animals having come to Bristol from Ireland which were found some days afterwards infected with disease. The Inspector of Bristol has been asked to report on the subject.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: Then the question arises, have these ships been properly cleaned? I would like to ask whether any real precautions have been taken in this matter?

MR. DODSON: The Privy Council require that ships as well as trucks should be thoroughly disinfected every time they are used. Not long since the Irish Government, after communication with the Privy Council, issued instructions for an extraordinary process of disinfection in the case of ships employed between Great Britain and Ireland; and, according to the information received on the subject, shipowners have willingly complied with those recommendations.

NAVY—ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF (for Lord HENRY LENNOX) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether there would be any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Greenwich Hospital Committee, composed of Admiral Luard, Sir Francis Festing, R.M.A. and Colonel Needham, R.M.A. appointed to inquire into the best method of filling the then existing vacancies in the Royal Marine Artillery?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It would be unusual to publish the whole Report of the Committee referred to, as the subject has not yet been finally dealt with by the Department; but as that objection does not attach to the first part of the Report, which relates merely to the mode of filling existing vacancies in the Royal Marine Artillery, and as this is, I imagine, the point in which the noble Lord the Member for Chichester is interested, I shall be glad to lay this portion of the Papers on the Table.

WESTERN PACIFIC—DEPORTATION OF FRENCH CONVICTS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the French Government have informed Her Majesty's Ministers, with regard to the transportation of French convicts to the Pacific, that the transport of criminals to New Caledonia, or any other French Colony, is a matter of internal policy with which no Foreign Power has any concern, and to which International Law cannot apply in any way; and, what steps Her Majesty's Ministers propose to take to carry out the wishes of the Australian Colonies with regard to New Guinea?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: As I informed the hon. Member yesterday, no such communication has been received from the French Government. With regard to his second Question, I must refer him to my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES (IRELAND)— CONSTITUTION OF THE COMMISSION.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is intended to place any member of the Catholic hierarchy or any Irish Member of Parliament on the Commission to inquire into the Queen's Colleges; and, can he give the names of the proposed Commissioners, and the date they are likely to begin to sit?

MR. TREVELYAN: There has been delay in the appointment of the Commission to inquire into the circumstances connected with the Queen's Colleges, in consequence of the absence of a gentleman who it was hoped would serve. As soon as the Commission is appointed the names of the Members will be communicated to the House. We are taking pains to secure a Commission which can work strenuously and promptly. Our desire is likewise to secure a Commission which will reasonably command confidence on all sides. With that double view we have considered the Question of the hon. Member.

MR. HEALY: Would the right hon. Gentleman now state the terms of the Reference under which the Commission will be appointed?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am sorry I have not the terms here. I did bring them down last evening, as I expected the question would be raised. I would not like to state them from memory; but they were four principal points. I may say they include every point which has been raised in the House of Commons with respect to the Queen's Colleges, including especially the important point raised by the hon. Member.

MR. HEALY: Another point on which I would like to put a Question, and one with regard to which it would give considerable satisfaction if it were now answered—it is with regard to the visitation to the Cork Queen's College. Would the right hon. Gentleman state when the visitation to Cork Queen's College will take place, and also the names of the Visitors who will attend?

MR. TREVELYAN: With regard to those Visitors who will actually go down I cannot now answer; but I have satisfied myself about the date of the visitation, and it will be a very reasonable date. It will be a week or 10 days hence.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— GENERAL GORDON.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to the statements of a Catholic Missionary, who has just reached Cairo from the Upper Nile, that it is—“Impossible for General Gordon to maintain himself with the present garrison. For defending the Canal alone he requires 6,000 men. Both Niles are now beginning to sink, and with blocks of wood the Arabs will cross from bank to bank. . . . An attempt to escape by way of Berber would be absolutely vain,” and to statements made by the Correspondents of The Daily News and other papers that the Mahdi's propaganda is exciting the Arab tribes from Berber to Assouan, and that Egypt is in “a state of chaos;” and, whether the Government will lay upon the Table the Despatch from General Gordon on which the First Lord of the Treasury grounded his statement that “the position of General Gordon is a position of security?”

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes, Sir. Her Majesty's Government have seen the statements to which the hon. Member refers. I stated yesterday that further Papers were about to be laid on the Table; but I cannot undertake to state from day to day what particular Papers will be included. I wish, in connection with this subject, to make a slight correction in a statement I made yesterday. I said, in regard to the garrison of Shendy, that from the

that we know that General Gordon is in imminent peril. It may be the opinion of the hon. Gentleman and of other hon. Gentlemen opposite that General Gordon is in imminent danger. In our view that is an entirely erroneous opinion, and it is entirely and absolutely contradicted by the language of General Gordon himself. Upon that subject the hon. Member will have the means of judging when the Papers are laid upon the Table.

MR. BOURKE: I am very unwilling to delay the Business of the House; but I wish to make a suggestion to Her Majesty's Government—and I put it in the form of a Question that I may be in Order—namely, Whether in view of the fact that the inhabitants of Berber and Khartoum, under the impression that no relief was to be sent to them, may, in despair, submit themselves to the Mahdi, it is not advisable to announce that a relief expedition will be sent as soon as the military authorities think it feasible?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is a Question of which Notice had better be given.

MR. BOURKE: If the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to answer that Question now, I will put it down for Thursday.

MR. J. LOWTHER: In connection with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman as to the position of the Consul General at Khartoum, I wish to ask whether it is not the fact that General Gordon in one despatch referred the Government to a letter in The Times by the British Consular Agent as affording more detailed information than he had himself time to communicate?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; I believe there was a reference of that kind, but I have not the means of judging how far it was intended to go, and whether it was intended to refer to some particular letter or to embrace all that might be written.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I would ask whether it would not be convenient for the Government to let the House know the exact position of the Consular Agent who is acting in Khartoum, by laying on the Table the despatch containing the instructions given him at the time of his appointment?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If I am not mistaken, I think the hon. Member will find what he asks for—two telegrams or despatches—already presented; but if the hon. Gentleman will put a Question on the Paper I will inquire into the matter.

MR. J. LOWTHER: The right hon. Gentleman stated more than once that the Government had no reason to believe that General Gordon had ever made a demand for British troops to be sent to his assistance. Am I to understand that the Prime Minister means that he has positive knowledge that General Gordon has never made such a request?

MR. GLADSTONE: What I have stated is, and not as a matter of impression or surmise, but as a matter of fact, that no request of General Gordon for the sending of British troops to Khartoum has ever been made, or, if made, has ever reached Her Majesty's Government. I limit myself to Khartoum, because that is the vital question, and undoubtedly it was a suggestion of General Gordon that a small force of British Cavalry should be sent to Berber. If I remember right it was 200; but I will ask the right hon. Gentleman not to take that number as a precise and positive statement. Particulars will be given in the Papers.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: I would ask whether it is true that there are no more than three Englishmen in Khartoum; whether it is not probable that they would be in communication with each other; and whether the Consular Agent, being in communication with General Gordon, would not be a most unlikely person to send any message without the knowledge and approval of General Gordon?

MR. HENEAGE: I would ask whether it is not in the knowledge of the Government that on the very day that the Consular Agent sent the letter of the 11th of March to The Times, there were letters sent by General Gordon stating exactly the contrary in every particular?

MR. GLADSTONE: I believe—I cannot state myself with absolute knowledge, but my full belief is—that the telegraphic communications of Mr. Power to the journal with which he is connected in this country, or by anyone else, are under no restraint or control whatever from General Gordon.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Will the promised Papers include the Proclamation by General Gordon in the course of which he said—"I have sent for British troops, which are now on the way?"

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: It is important that these Papers should be presented as soon as possible, and I should like to ask when they are likely to be laid upon the Table?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I cannot fix any exact date.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Then I appeal to the Prime Minister. [Cheers.] Time is of so much importance in this matter that there ought to be no delay.

MR GLADSTONE: I meant to answer that appeal by cheering. I entirely agree that no time should be lost in this matter; but, of course, we are anxious to bring down the Papers to as late a date as possible.

PARLIAMENT—POOLE ELECTION.

Notice being taken by Mr. William James Harris, returned as Member for Poole, in the room of Mr. Charles Schreiber, deceased, that he was, by a clerical error, described in the Return as Walter James Harris instead of William James Harris:—

Ordered, That the Deputy Clerk of the Crown do attend this House forthwith, with the last Return for Poole, and amend the same by erasing the name "Walter" and inserting the name "William,"—(Mr. Bourke),—instead thereof:—

And the Deputy Clerk of the Crown attended, and amended the Return accordingly.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

BILL [Lords].—[BILL 120.]

(Mr. Dodson.)

COMMITTEE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th March], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill [Lords]).

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. BIGGAR, said, he would like to make a few remarks on that Bill before going into Committee. There were two or three points to which he would wish to call attention. One very important matter, and the cause of great complaint to Irish cattle dealers and owners, was the contradictory arrangements for the restriction of the disease made by the local authorities in England, Ireland, and Scotland. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on the 7th of April had stated that no restriction would be placed on the exportation of cattle from Ireland; but he found that up to the 12th of April such restrictions still continued in Gloucestershire. Restrictions might be placed on certain districts, but that, for the reason that disease existed in some remote place, the whole country should be placed under a ban was preposterous. A Scotch gentleman, representing the Scotch local authorities, went over to Belfast, and he appeared to have power to manage the exportation of Irish cattle in any way he liked, and not certainly for the benefit of the Irish cattle trade. Now, he thought there should be one general law administered by the Privy Council dealing with the three countries, and that they should not be in the hands of local authorities, who made contradictory arrangements. He contended that if the Lords' Amendment were not allowed to continue in the Bill the whole thing might as well be thrown up altogether, and he hoped that the Bill would not be passed in such a form as would render it so much waste paper, but would be made a useful and thorough measure.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Privy Council to prohibit landing of foreign animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease).

MR. JAMES HOWARD moved to leave out from page 1, line 10, the word "may," in order to insert the word "shall." He said this was one of several Amendments which he had placed upon the Paper, all of which were intended to effect one object. The object of the first Amendment of which he had given Notice would not in itself be very obvious to the Committee; but if the Committee would favour him with its attention for a few minutes he would endeavour to show that that Amendment, taken in connection with those which followed, would have the effect of greatly simplifying the Bill. The first part of the clause as it stood in the Bill was, he maintained, mere surplusage; it was, in fact, simply a repetition of Clause 35 in the Act of 1878. If hon. Members would refer to the Act of 1878, and compare Clause 35 with the phraseology of the greater portion of Clause 1 in the present Bill, they would perceive that the two were almost identical. For his part he failed to see the use of re-enacting the permissive power of the Act to which he had referred. If he were framing a code of rules for the management of a manufactory he should consider it injudicious to introduce rules of a merely permissive character. But it might be argued that this portion of the Act of 1878 was necessary to enable the Privy Council to prevent the introduction of this particular malady, foot-and-mouth disease. That this was not so was shown by the fact that the Privy Council had exercised that power under the provisions of the Act of 1878. If his Amendments were adopted by the Committee, as he hoped they would be, the clause would then read as follows:—

"1. For the purpose of preventing the introduction into the United Kingdom of the infection of foot-and-mouth disease, the Privy Council shall from time to time by general or special order prohibit the landing of animals from any foreign country or countries, or any specified part thereof, and they shall prohibit such landing whenever they are not satisfied with respect to any foreign country that the laws thereof relating to the importation and exportation of animals, and to the prevention of the introduction or spreading of disease, and the general sanitary condition of animals therein, are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease."

These Amendments did not affect the question whether the negative "not" should stand where it did as the Bill had come down from the House of Lords, or be transposed to the end of the clause where it had stood in the Bill as originally sent up to that House. For his own part he was of opinion that, whatever lawyers might say upon this question of the transposition of the negative, it would in reality make very little difference in the minds of practical men. At all events, he hoped Her Majesty's Government would either accept his Amendment, or explain to the satisfaction of the Committee the necessity of re-enacting the merely permissive power of the Act of 1878. Without further taking up the time of the Committee, he now begged to move the first Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, leave out "may," and insert "shall."—(Mr. J. Howard.)

Question proposed, "That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. DODSON said, he quite agreed with his hon. Friend who had moved the Amendment, that it and the other Amendments of which he had given Notice necessarily hung together, and that they had no bearing upon the question as to the transposition of the word "not." But his hon. Friend was not quite accurate in asserting that the first part of Clause 1 in this Bill was a mere repetition of Clause 35 of the Act of 1878. The clause in the Bill provided that—

"The Privy Council may from time to time, by general or special order, prohibit, whenever they deem it expedient so to do, the landing of animals from any foreign country or countries, or any specified part thereof."

The effect of the Act was that they could not make an Order prohibiting the importation of animals from abroad without naming the country or the countries from which the importation was prohibited. This clause, as it now stood in the Bill, would give the Privy Council a general power of prohibition; and he thought it would be a matter of convenience that they should have such power, more especially if prohibition were to be more widely exercised. Under these circumstances, he hoped the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. J. Howard) would not press his Amendment to a Division.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Dodson) had assumed a position which Her Majesty's Government and the Liberal Party generally had assumed throughout when dealing with this question—namely, that they were the Representatives of the foreign producers of meat, and against the home producers. This, he asserted, was the general position assumed by the Liberal Party; they appeared as the Representatives of the interests of foreign agriculturists, as distinguished from the interests of agriculturists at home. The Liberal Party had now occupied that position for some years, and this rendered it incumbent on those who were not ashamed of English agriculture or of English stock, and who believed that, with regard to our meat supply, the quantity produced at home was very nearly adequate to the demand, to controvert the view of these advocates of foreign agriculture. What, he asked, was really the question at issue in regard to this matter? It was the question of the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government to Parliament. The hon. Member for Bedfordshire had proposed an Amendment the object of which was to provide that, when Her Majesty's Government prohibited the importation of live animals, they should designate the country from which those animals were to be prohibited, otherwise the Government could not be effectively held responsible for the introduction of disease into this country. He (Mr. Newdegate) was a very old-fashioned Member of that House, and did not admire the system of free imports; but he was prepared to say that the people of this country were entitled to the benefit of securing their supply of meat from all countries in which no disease prevailed, so long as the course of legislation which had been adhered to for many years was preserved. He did not know whether hon. Members on the other side of the House were prepared to divide upon this question; but, for the sake of rendering Her Majesty's Government responsible for the exercise of the discretion intrusted to them as to the exclusion of animals from infected countries, he was prepared to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, if the hon. Gentleman should determine on pressing that Amendment to a Division.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the hon. Member for Bedfordshire had given no reason for the Amendment he had proposed, except that he thought it desirable to introduce variety into the wording of this proposal. He had, however, said that the provision, as it stood in the Bill, was already the law; but this had always been the contention of hon. Members who thought with him (Mr. Arthur Arnold), and who held that there was no real reason for further legislation on this subject. However, the only ground on which the hon. Member for Bedfordshire had proposed his Amendment was that he thought it undesirable that the same words should stand in this Bill as were enacted in another measure. He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had only that very day presented a Petition, signed by 1,200 of the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. J. Howard's) constituency in Bedfordshire, praying that House not to enact any further restrictions on the importation of foreign cattle. Now, what was the real object of the hon. Member's Amendment? The hon. Gentleman proposed to convert the word "may" into "shall." He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Dodson) in thinking that the Amendment was unimportant; while, on the other hand, he thought it certainly would, to some extent, restrict the powers of the Privy Council by diminishing the discretion they now exercised, and which he thought it highly desirable to preserve. He therefore hoped that, if the hon. Member for Bedfordshire pressed his Amendment to a Division, it would be rejected by the Committee.

MR. KENNY said, he hoped that the Committee would adopt the Amendment. He thought the Amendment in reality a very important one. As the 1st clause of the Bill at present stood, there was not the slightest difference between it and the Act of 1878; and he thought the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) was wrong in saying that the Bill would make no difference in the law as it now existed. In the Act of 1878 it was set forth in the 5th Schedule that—

"In relation to foreign animals other than those brought from the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, if and so long as from time to time the Privy Council are satisfied with respect to any foreign country that the laws thereof relating to the importation and exportation of animals, and to the prevention of the introduction or spreading of disease and the general sanitary condition of animals therein, are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of diseased animals; then, from time to time, the Privy Council, by general or special order, shall allow animals or any specified kind of animals brought from that country to be landed, without being subject under the provisions of this schedule to slaughter or to quarantine, and may for that purpose alter or add to those provisions as the case may require."

tionary power, the contention of those who supported the Amendment was that they ought to be compelled to exercise that power. It was urged against the action of the Privy Council that they had not used the power the Act of 1878 had conferred upon them, and what was now wanted was simply that they should be forced to exercise it. All that was required was, that when it was found that the Privy Council was indifferent to the interests of the United Kingdom, they should be compelled to act in accordance with what the people of the United Kingdom deemed to be their interests. He thought the hon. Member for Bedfordshire had done a public service in endeavouring so to amend the Bill as to make it a reality, and he trusted the Committee would adopt the Amendment.

MR. DODSON said, he felt it necessary to trouble the Committee with a few further observations after what had just been stated. He was afraid he had not made himself understood by the Committee in the point he had urged against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire. The clause they were now discussing was divided into two parts. The first portion of it gave the Privy Council a power—a discretionary power—to prohibit, either by a General or a Special Order applicable only to a specified country, the importation of cattle in such cases as they might deem expedient for the purpose of preventing the introduction foot-and-mouth disease. The question of the obligation on the Privy Council to prohibit importation in certain cases arose on the second part of the clause, to which the attention of the Committee would be directed hereafter. The effect of the Amendments of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire—for there were three Amendments, which practically formed one, and could not be separated—was strictly this. They would add nothing to the obligations imposed by the Bill upon the Privy Council, and take nothing from its discretion to prohibit, but they would prevent the Privy Council from having the choice of using a general or a special form of prohibition. Such would really be the effect of the several Amendments if they should be adopted by the Committee. He hoped the Committee would allow this portion of the clause to remain as it was. It did not affect in any way the question of the obligation under which the Privy Council was to be placed; that arose entirely on the second part of the clause.

MR. PUGH said, the simple effect of the first part of the clause was to give the Privy Council a discretionary power to prohibit the landing of animals from any foreign country, and the other part of the clause made it compulsory upon them so to do under certain circumstances. He looked upon the clause as having been drawn with the intention of restating the powers of the Privy Council as they now stood, and then of making it imperative on them to give effect to those powers in the cases pointed to by the Resolution of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin). He trusted that, under the circumstances, the hon. Member for Bedfordshire would not press his Amendment to a Division.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he merely wished to state that the reason why he supported the proposal of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire's proposal to amend the clause was that it would render it incumbent on the Privy Council to exercise all possible assiduity in ascertaining where foot-and-mouth disease might exist abroad, as it was only where the disease was discovered that they would be able to use their power of prohibition, by ordering the exclusion of cattle from the infected country. He did not wish to give the Government or the Privy Council a general discretionary power of exclusion, because general discretionary powers might be exercised in a very latitudinarian sense, and such discretion he had no desire to see intrusted to any Government.

MR. DODSON said, in answer to what had just been stated, he must repeat that upon the first part of the clause they were discussing the question of the obligation of the Privy Council did not arise. That portion of the clause added nothing to the obligation and nothing to the discretion of the Privy Council. All it did was to give the Privy Council power to prohibit, by a General Order, the importation of animals from any foreign country or countries; whereas under the existing law they could only prohibit importation from specified countries. It was only a question of the form to be adopted, and as far as the clause did anything, it gave greater facilities to the Privy Council.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he hoped the hon. Member for Bedfordshire would not press his Amendment, the effect of which would really be to convert a double clause into a single one. He was of opinion that his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Howard) did not realize the true effect of his proposal, which certainly would not attain the object at which he was aiming. If carried, it would convert the double power proposed to be given to the Privy Council into a single one.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, his object was precisely what had just been stated by his hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay)—namely, to convert the clause from a double into a single one—to render it a clause of one paragraph instead of two. He had made this proposal on the ground that the powers sought for in the first portion of the clause were already conferred by the Act of 1878, and had been acted upon. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had given one reason only for his opposition to the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman had maintained that if the first part of the clause were allowed to stand it would enable the Privy Council to prohibit importation from the whole of the Continent; but there was nothing in his (Mr. J. Howard's) reading of the clause which warranted that assumption. What it stated was that the Privy Council might prohibit "the landing of animals from any foreign country or countries, or any specified part thereof."

MR. DODSON: It says they may prohibit the landing of animals from any foreign country "by general or special order."

MR. JAMES HOWARD: In the 35th clause of the Act of 1878 are the words "foreign animals," which will extend to animals from all countries.

MR. DODSON: "Specified" countries.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, he saw no reason for re-enacting powers which the Privy Council already possessed; otherwise the Committee would seem to be asked to give the Privy Council a double permission to neglect their duty. His object was to make the power obligatory on the Privy Council from beginning to end. He hoped the Committee would accept his Amendment.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the only ground for the argument of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire appeared to be that he believed the power asked for was already provided in a former Act—namely, the Act of 1878. The Committee had formerly heard from Her Majesty's Government that the Lord Chancellor took a different view of that; but in order to make the matter clear the Government had brought in the present Bill. Surely there could not be any real objection to the proposal the Government had made. He hoped that in the interests of the farmers whom the hon. Member for Bedfordshire professed to represent he would consent to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he would call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the 35th clause of the Act of 1878 appeared in exactly the same words in the Act of 1868, and, this being so, it would appear to afford evidence that the Tory Government of 1878 conceived that they had not the power they were now alleged to have possessed.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, as he understood the question, the words proposed in the Bill that had been sent to that House from the House of Lords were merely intended to extend the area of prohibition; but the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Bedfordshire would seem to be intended to narrow it. As he was anxious to keep the area of prohibition as wide as it could be made, and as he wished to send the Bill back to the House of Lords as nearly as possible in the same shape as that in which it had come down from that Assembly, he was unable to give his support to the Amendment; and if it were pressed to a Division he should vote against it.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, he would not, under the circumstances, press his Amendment further. With the permission of the Committee he would, therefore, withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JAMES HOWARD: As the other Amendments I have placed on the Paper form part of the one now withdrawn, I will ask permission to withdraw them also.

Amendments, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DODSON said, he had now to move, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 13, the omission of the word "not," with a view of reinserting that word in line 17. He desired, in the first place, to state that this was an Amendment to which Her Majesty's Government attached the very greatest importance. He was perfectly well aware that many hon. Gentlemen considered the difference between the expression in the Bill as it was introduced by the Government and the Bill in the shape in which it had come down from the House of Lords to be one of no material consequence. In fact, one hon. Gentleman had stated to him that the difference raised upon this question was merely the difference between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. He knew that this opinion was held by many hon. Gentlemen of great experience in agricultural matters, and he believed, moreover, that the same view was entertained by some hon. Members who were learned in the law. He respected the opinion of those hon. Gentlemen, but at the same time it was not one in which Her Majesty's Government could concur. Her Majesty's Government, on the contrary, considered that the alteration made in the Bill during its progress through the House of Lords was, in reality, a very material one, and, as he had just stated, they attached the greatest importance to the Amendment he had now the honour of submitting to the Committee. They thought that the change made by the House of Lords went far beyond the necessities of the case, and that, under the circumstances, it was not justifiable. The view entertained by Her Majesty's Government was that for a very slight—if, indeed, for any—perceptible addition to the security of the home producer it would render the restrictions on the importation of cattle so stringent as seriously to hamper trade, and in all probability appreciably to affect the price of meat to the consumer. [Mr. CHAPLIN: Why?] By diminishing the supply. The restrictions, in fact, were so great that they would risk defeating the very object which those who supported the Amendment of the Lords aimed at, because, in the view of the Government, it would impose upon the Privy Council so stringent an obligation to prohibit, even under circumstances which scarcely, if at all, warranted prohibition, that there would be a constant temptation upon them to strain the interpretation of the 4th part of the 5th Schedule of the Act of 1878, and lean to the side of free admission. The Lords' Amendments went so far beyond the necessity of the case, as it appeared to the Government, that they laid those who supported them open to the suspicion and the charge that they were intended not merely for defence against disease, but for protection against competition. The former was a most legitimate object for agriculturists to keep in view. Defence they had a perfect right to demand that the Government should give them to a reasonable extent; but the changes that had been made in the Bill went so far that they amounted, whether so intended or not, to protection against competition. The clause, as amended by the House of Lords, appeared to the Government to require them to prohibit, not only when they were affirmatively satisfied that certain securities against the introduction of disease were wanting, but also to prohibit whenever they were unable to ascertain or were in doubt whether they existed or not—perhaps without trying to ascertain or to remove the doubt. This would be the case, if they conceived the case which some hon. Members had suggested as possible—of an ignorant or negligent Agricultural Department. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire cheered that. The hon. Member, apparently, was prepared to approve of the action of an indolent or negligent Agricultural Department who would not take the trouble to ascertain whether security existed in the case of any foreign country, but would, without putting itself to any trouble, at once prohibit. [Mr. CHAPLIN: No, no!] Now, the Government were to prohibit under the clause as it stood, not because certain safeguards were found to be wanting, but because they did not know whether they were wanting or not, and possibly, as he had put it, without having taken the trouble to inquire. If they reversed the clause in the manner in which the Government proposed the Privy Council could not proceed in such a negligent manner as that suggested. They might be in ignorance of securities because they were too indolent to take the trouble to inquire whether they existed; but they could not be cognizant of the existence of securities without having taken the trouble to inquire and having ascertained that they did exist. The effect of the clause, as the Government proposed to amend it, would be this. It would put the Privy Council under the statutory obligation of prohibiting in all cases in which they were satisfied, with respect to any foreign country, that having regard to the sanitary condition of animals therein or imported therefrom, to the laws made by such country for the regulation of the importation and exportation of animals, and for the prevention of the introduction or spreading of disease, and to the administration of such laws, the circumstances were such as not to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease. That appeared to the Government to be a reasonable form in which to require the prohibition to be made. It required the Privy Council—it made it the duty of the Privy Council—to ascertain whether or not securities existed, and if they were satisfied that there were not as comprehensive securities against the importation of disease as were required, then that they must prohibit. He would just like to take this opportunity, while moving this Amendment, of saying one word as to the charge brought against the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council, of too freely permitting the landing of animals from diseased countries. He would like to remind the Committee that the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council began its action early in May last, and that since the 9th of May, 1883, with the exception of the solitary case of the Ontario—which was quite a recent and a very peculiar case—there had not been landed upon the shores of this country for slaughter one single head of cattle affected with foot-and-mouth disease. [Mr. DUCKHAM: Nor sheep, nor pigs?] He should come to that later on. He had mentioned the special case of the Ontario, and as to sheep and swine he would ask the attention of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire to this, that since the 1st June, 1883, there had been landed for slaughter upon our shores only 12 sheep and 21 swine affected with foot-and-mouth disease. He thought that under the circumstances it was hardly open to hon. Members to accuse the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council of having seriously neglected their duty, and allowed at random the landing of diseased animals on our shores. [Mr. CHAPLIN: Since May?] That was what he was claiming. He was speaking now of the Agricultural Department, and was stating what had happened since that Body had come into operation. With regard to Ireland, what he had stated the other day, and what he would now repeat, was this. Every local authority in Great Britain had power to prohibit the introduction of animals, other than animals in transit, into its district from the district of any other local authority in the United Kingdom. It might prohibit from a great number of districts—it might prohibit from one district, or it might prohibit from all the rest of the United Kingdom; but no exceptional powers were given against Irish cattle. He should like to say one word further in regard to this matter, and it was this—the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council had actually at the present moment under consideration the issue of an Order which would limit the powers of local authorities to prohibiting the introduction of animals from those parts of the United Kingdom which were actually ascertained to be free from foot-and-mouth disease; this he hoped and trusted was the case with Ireland amongst other parts of the United Kingdom. He was sorry to say, as he had stated in answer to a Question to-day, that there had been an alarm about the introduction of foot-and-mouth diseased animals from Ireland into Bristol. That subject they were now engaged in investigating; and, at all events, until the result of their inquiries were known, it would be premature for the Department to take any action in the matter. He was sorry to have been obliged to have detained the Committee so long upon this question; but he would now move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Mr. HENEAGE said, he had listened attentively to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and he was sure with every wish possible to see him justify the Amendment which he had brought before them. He was, however, bound to say that the Amendment was as objectionable to him now as it was when he first saw it upon the Paper. He regretted very much that the right hon. Gentleman should have brought in the word "protection," and should have talked about the incapacity of Ministers. Whether rightly or wrongly, the House supposed that Ministers were chosen because they were capable, and therefore he thought the question was altogether beyond the mark. If the right hon. Gentleman wished them to draw comparisons, the observation was unfortunate, because, if he remembered aright, after the right hon. Gentleman had been down to Brighton and had made a very strong speech asking the country not to look upon this question as an agricultural question, but one in which the whole country was concerned, his Colleague in the administration of the Privy Council had gone down to Manchester and had abused everyone who was asking for legislation, and had repudiated everything that the right hon. Gentleman had said. The noble Lord who had gone down to Manchester was at the head of the Department, and the real question for them was this—and they ought not to lose sight of it—whether the House of Commons was to lay down the way in which the Act was to be worked, and whether its working was to be left to the Lord President of the Council, who had said in his Manchester speech that the Bill was not required, and who in moving it in the House of Lords might have been supposed by his manner to be opposing instead of supporting it—at least it might have been sent to eternity if "damning it by faint praise" could be said to be opposing it. Since then the Lord President had received two deputations upon the subject, one of which he received with open arms, and the other of which, if he (Mr. Heneage) might be allowed the expression, the right hon. Gentleman had snubbed.

MR. DODSON: What deputation does the hon. Gentleman refer to?

MR. HENEAGE said, he did not mean that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) had done this; he was referring to the Lord President of the Council.

MR. DODSON: He is not "the right hon. Gentleman."

MR. HENEAGE said, he was referring to the noble Lord, and not to the right hon. Gentleman. With regard to this question there were three distinct classes interested. First, the agricultural class, consisting of producers, consumers, and ratepayers, who had suffered immensely; secondly, there were the people who had profited by what had been going on—namely, the foreign cattle dealers, who did not wish to see any restrictions imposed in order that their trade might continue; and, thirdly, there were the general community, who were consumers and ratepayers, and in whom all hon. Members were more or less interested. As to the interest of the agriculturists in this question it was admitted by everyone. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had said that they deserved some attention for the manner in which they had carried out the restrictions imposed upon them. With regard to the second class he did not think there would be much sympathy with them. For his own part he only wished to speak with reference to the consumers and the ratepayers. He represented a constituency of about 40,000, 30,000 of whom belonged to the wage-earning classes, and it was as to the manner in which the Bill would affect them that he wished to speak. He would briefly say that if the present Amendment were carried, so far as these people were concerned, he would prefer not to have the Bill at all—rather than have only a sham prohibition, he would prefer to have no restrictions at all. He entirely agreed with the remark that had fallen earlier in the evening from the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) that they should either do one thing or the other—either keep the disease out of the country, or allow it to have its full swing and take its chance. He (Mr. Heneage) preferred for his part to be in the hands of Providence rather than in the hands of the Lord President of the Council. Now, the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken said that he and the Government took a very strong view upon this question. Well, he (Mr. Heneage) might be entirely wrong; but he took a very strong view of this question too. He did not wish to affront the right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench below him; but, at the same time, he must say that the Amendment before the Committee appeared to him to be nothing less than a delusion and a snare. He would not be a party to deluding those unfortunate persons, whether they were producers, or ratepayers, or consumers, who had suffered much during the last three years, in asking them to spend their money in stocking their land in any way under a Bill which he thought would not do them the slightest good. What was required was that power should be given to prevent cattle being imported from countries which were affected with foot-and-mouth disease immediately it was known that they were so affected, and not that diseased animals should be allowed to come in before measures of restriction were adopted. What was required was something to restore confidence to the home meat trade, because if that were not done consumers would not have made up to them by production the amount of meat which the country required. That was required in order that the country farmers might be stimulated in the trade to produce more meat, and to produce milk which, as the Prime Minister had said, was so much required. They required to get rid of these harassing and costly restrictions which had taken money alike out of the pockets of producer and consumers, and had only benefited the cattle dealers. He was happy to say that the butchers of his own constituency had signed a Petition in favour of the Bill as it had come from the House of Lords; and they wanted the measure as it had so come to them, in order that it might decrease the price of meat eventually by increasing the production at home, and by improving the animals imported from abroad; and lastly, though by no means least, they wanted the Bill in order that they might get rid of those rates which had been such a heavy tax upon the poorest members of the population. But that was not all that they required. They wanted, further, that the powers should be by Statute, in order that a moral effect might be produced in foreign countries—in order that foreign countries that wished to trade with England might know that we had this law, and might be constrained to use more vigilance to control or stamp out disease, and improve their sanitary regulations and laws. It was no use having such powers that foreign countries could snap their fingers and say—"Oh, they are no use, they will never be put in force; only let us wait for the Recess, when Parliament is not sitting and Her Majesty's Ministers have gone on their holidays, when some minor officials will be at the head of affairs, and when we can do what we like with the people in charge of the Privy Council Office." Foreign countries who wished to trade with us should be given to understand that they could not do so unless they made proper sanitary regulations. Unless they produced a moral effect the Bill would be of no use at all. The Bill as it came from the House of Lords would have that moral effect; but with the proposed Amendment it would have no such result, especially after the speeches of the Lord President of the Council. He should have thought, when the right hon. Gentlemen representing Her Majesty's Government was speaking just now, that he would have considered it worth while—seeing there were a great number of hon. Members who had really not studied this question—to have told them exactly what was the result of the law as it now stood, and what it would be under the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had not done so; but he (Mr. Heneage) would tell the Committee what it was. He had written down the law as it was and as it would be, and if the right hon. Gentleman thought he was misrepresenting the state of the case he should be glad to hand what he had noted down to him later on so that he could comment upon it. The law as it now stood was that animals from any or every country from which importation was not prohibited under Section 35 of the Act of 1878 could be admitted for slaughter at the port of landing; and animals must be admitted when the Privy Council were satisfied, under Section 5 of the Act, that there was reasonable security against importation of disease. By the Bill, the Privy Council were directed to prohibit the landing of animals from any country, or part of a country, as to which they were not satisfied that there was reasonable security against the importation of disease. This would throw the onus of proof on foreign countries that they were eradicating or controlling disease. But if they took the law as it would stand under the proposed Amendment of the Government, what were the Department to do? Why, they were to prohibit only when they were satisfied that such reasonable security did not exist. That was to say, whilst they were in communication with the authorities of America, Germany, and elsewhere—whilst they were making inquiries which might go on for weeks—cargoes of cattle might be freely landed on our shores, and disease might be disseminated from one end of the country to the other—for they knew how easily it spread after it once came to our shores. Then they were told that the adoption of the Bill as it came from the House of Lords would entail great loss upon the community by decreasing the supply of meat. Well, what amount of loss could it incur? Why, it could only incur the loss of the animals which could have been landed, diseased or not diseased, between the time at which the Consular Agent, or other person who gave them notice of the disease prevailing in the foreign country, gave them the notice and the time at which they found out whether they ought to prohibit or not. If they found out ultimately that there were grounds for prohibiting, then they would have been right in prohibiting from the first, and there would be no loss at all; but if they found out that the alarm was groundless, then all they had got to do was to say at once that cattle could be again imported from that foreign country. All the amount of cattle that would be prohibited from coming into the country would be just that amount which, supposing there were a false alarm, might have been imported between the time the notice was given and the time they set the foreign country free to import again. He regretted that he had detained the House so long; but he felt very strongly on this question, and he had not hitherto said a word to the House on the subject. As he did not represent an agricultural constituency, he wished to state the grounds on which he based his support to the Bill as it came down from the House of Lords. He had never changed his opinion on the subject. When he first saw the measure he told the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) what his opinion was. He believed that if the Bill became law as it was, farmers of the country would have confidence, and that the dead meat trade would materially develop; and he should like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) to this fact. The right hon. Gentleman had given some figures the other day with regard to the importation of dead meat, and had put the quantity into pounds weight, as in that way the amount looked larger than in money. He (Mr. Heneage) would like to remind the right hon. Gentleman that 60,000,000 lbs. of foreign dead meat was now sold at Smithfield Market alone in each year, according to the Markets Committee's statistics; that the frozen carcasses of sheep imported now averaged 20,000 per month. From Australia the supply for the first three months of 1884 was eight times as much as in 1882, showing how much the dead meat trade was developing, and showing that should the importations continue at the same rate they would be equivalent alone to all the meat which had been sent from Germany, Belgium, and America. This bogey of dear meat under the present Bill would be entirely illusory, and was merely a cry raised by interested foreign meat jobbers or salesmen to try and delude the British public, whilst they continued to make money out of diseases and restrictions in England. If the Bill passed as it now stood, he was certain that it would be a benefit, not only to the agricultural classes, but to the whole community. He should like to remind the Committee of a fact of which, perhaps, they were not aware—namely, of the amount of rates paid under the existing state of things. He would take, for example, the division of the county in which he lived. In Lindsey—four-sevenths of Lincolnshire—they amounted in 1883 to 30 per cent of the whole county rate, while the last six months alone gave them a half-penny in the pound, or equal to a penny on the Income Tax, in consequence of restrictions for putting down foot-and-mouth disease. That sum was levied on the poorest class of artisan labourers and small shopkeepers. He regretted that this charge was not made on the taxpayers instead of the ratepayers of the country, because, if it were, they would soon have the Chancellor of the Exchequer—who was not now in his place—on their side. They would have him and a great many right hon. Gentlemen on their side. He always noticed that right hon. Gentlemen, as a rule, left it to private Members to take care of the rates, unless, indeed, they were right hon. Gentlemen in Opposition. As this was not a taxpayers' question, therefore, he did not expect much help from right hon. Gentlemen. They were told this was not an artizans' or labourers' question; but he ventured to say that no classes had suffered so much as the artizans and labourers from the restrictions necessitated by foot-and-mouth disease. The artizans were more liable than anyone else in the large towns to the evil results of the use of diseased milk and diseased meat. The doctors could tell hon. Members of many instances in which the children of artizans and labourers had been affected by the use of impure milk and diseased meat. No class suffered more severely than the cow cottagers, who were really the most deserving class of agricultural labourers. No one had lost more than they had through foot-and-mouth disease, for they very often found that their solitary cow became diseased, and that the milk it yielded infected their children and their pigs. The cow then dried up, and they were often compelled to sell it at half the price they had given for it. In addition to that these poor people had to pay the heavy rate to which he had alluded. When, therefore, hon. Members talked about this not being a people's question, he maintained that it was eminently a people's question—it was not merely a farmers' or landlords' question, but a people's question; and, therefore, they had a right to demand from the Government a real measure, and not a sham one.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was able to completely endorse, and endorse with great pleasure, much that had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and he asked leave of the Committee to rise at once in order to put before them some information bearing, as it seemed to him, directly on this Amendment, and of which he thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) must have been in entire ignorance, to judge from the answer he had given to a Question which he (Mr. Chaplin) had put to him that afternoon as to the prevalence of foot-and-mouth disease in the United States. Before, however, he did that, he should like to make one or two comments upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. With reference to his observation as to the trifling difference between the Amendment now on the Paper and the Bill as it came down from the House of Lords, and which had been described by one of his Friends as nothing more than the difference between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee, he (Mr. Chaplin) desired to express his opinion that if the Privy Council could be relied upon to do its duty whatever Government might be in power, and upon all occasions, he had not the slightest doubt in the world that the same objects might be and would be accomplished, either under the Bill as it came down from the House of Lords, or as it would stand if amended as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman; but, unfortunately, they knew from past experience that the Privy Council could not be depended upon; and that was the reason why, in the words of the hon. Member opposite, they desired to have a measure that should not be a sham, and why opposition was offered to legislation of a permissive character, against which they used to hear so much in scorn from hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite when they used to sit on the Opposition side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) had proceeded to make a whole series of assumptions in support of his Amendment, for which he had not offered a shadow of a reason. He had declared that the Amendments inserted in the Bill by the House of Lords were unjustifiable, and went a great deal beyond the grounds of necessity, and that the Bill as it at present stood would hamper trade, and seriously raise the price of meat. He (Mr. Chaplin) had ventured, he was afraid in a somewhat irregular manner, to interject across the House "Why?" But that was a question which the right hon. Gentleman had carefully abstained from answering during the whole course of his speech. What single reason did the right hon. Gentleman give for these statements? Did he explain to the Committee why the Bill went beyond the ground of necessity? Did he tell them why the Bill was not justifiable? Did he tell them why it would raise the price of meat? He (Mr. Chaplin) had had the honour, not very long ago, of speaking on behalf of a large deputation that attended upon the right hon. Gentleman at the Privy Council, and submitting the reasons that appeared to them to be conclusive against the fears and assumptions which had been expressed to-day. He had taken the opportunity of explaining to the right hon. Gentleman at that time the past history of this question, and had stated instances of the price of meat in the Metropolis, showing that, notwithstanding the extraordinary increase of population during the past 20 years, the number of live animals imported into London was less now than it was then, and that, concurrently with that state of things, the people had been generally supplied with meat at reasonable rates; and he must say he thought that after this the right hon. Gentleman was bound to give them some reason in support of his series of assumptions, which no one yet on the Government side of the House had ever attempted fairly to prove. The right hon. Gentleman had taken exception to a cheer which he (Mr. Chaplin) had given during the course of the right hon. Gentleman's observations, when he referred to a possible "indolent Agricultural Administration." What he had cheered at was the inference he had drawn from the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, strengthened by the knowledge he had of certain circumstances in the past as well as in the present, which showed that it was not only quite possible, but extremely probable, that they might have such things as indolent Agricultural Administrations in the future. The right hon. Gentleman took great credit to the Government because, as he said, they had been so energetic, so little asleep, that since May, 1883, not one single cargo of diseased animals had been admitted into this country, save the cargo of the Ontario, which was peculiarly circumstanced. But what had the right hon. Gentleman to say about the period precedent to that? Unless his (Mr. Chaplin's) memory deceived him, this energetic Agricultural Administration had admitted cargoes of diseased animals into this country by hundreds. And in saying "by hundreds" he believed he was literally within the mark, and that the right hon. Gentleman would not dispute the accuracy of his statement. The Government had given no reasons whatever against the adoption of this Bill as it had come down from the House of Lords; but he and his Friends, on the other hand, had offered reasons and arguments in support of it, which, at all events, ought to be met or contradicted by Her Majesty's Government.

The Government admitted—and the great bulk of their supporters agreed with them—that whatever was necessary to prevent the introduction of disease in the future ought to be done in this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman, however, declared that the measure went a great way beyond the grounds of necessity. Why? What was the difference between the position of himself and his Friends and that taken up by the Government? He and his Friends said that animals ought not to be admitted alive into the country unless the Privy Council were satisfied that it could be done with perfect safety from disease; and the Government, on the other hand, said—"No; we will admit the animals unless we know that there is danger." The Amendment of the House of Lords presumed that there was danger from a foreign country unless the Government actually knew that that country was safe; whilst the Government presumed that foreign countries were safe unless they had absolutely ascertained that they had the disease. That was a position to which the Committee ought not to submit, and which would not give that security that it was admitted by nearly everybody ought to be given provided it did not go beyond the grounds of necessity. He would give the right hon. Gentleman an instance or two of what he meant in regard to negligence on the part of the Agricultural Administration. They had to-day heard a statement from the right hon. Gentleman, in reply to a Question put by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks), to the effect that in spite of all the carefulness of the Administration there appeared to be no doubt that just at the period when the county of Cambridge, having imposed severe restrictions on itself, had escaped from the disease, it was readmitted into the county by reason of the importation from Liverpool of cattle suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, admitted into that port from abroad.

MR. DODSON: I expressly stated that the animals were landed at Liverpool on the 12th, that they were examined and found to be sound, and that seven days afterwards, in Cambridgeshire, they were found to be diseased.

MR. CHAPLIN begged pardon. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had admitted that the animals were suffering from disease in Liverpool. [Mr. Dodson: No, no.] Then, he was very sorry he had made the observation. He would, however, give the right hon. Gentleman another instance, which he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would also be able to contradict. He had himself asked the right hon. Gentleman this afternoon whether he had any information as to the prevalence of foot-and-mouth disease in Canada and the United States at the present time. He had asked as to Canada because, though he knew the right hon. Gentleman had stated that country had been free for some years, he had gathered from what was said in reply to the hon. Member for Cambridge-shire that the disease might have re-appeared in the Dominion. As to the United States, he had some information which he did not know whether the Government were cognizant of, but which was contained in a paper published in Kansas, and dated March 19th, 1884. He found in that paper that the Legislature of Kansas had been especially summoned, the President, in the course of his Message, saying—

“It was with great reluctance and hesitation that I issued the proclamation convening you in special session. I was apprehensive that your body and the people might not fully appreciate the gravity of the situation and the importance of such action. The proclamation convening you fully explains my reasons for my action. Additional outbreaks of the cattle disease confirm me in the opinion that such call was absolutely imperative.”

The Message went on to say that the President had been notified by Mr. Finney that the peculiar and highly contagious disease known as “foot-and-mouth disease” had attacked the cattle at Neosho Falls. The Legislature of Kansas met, and, according to the paper he (Mr. Chaplin) had in his hand, adopted measures for the suppression of the foot-and-mouth disease. In the face of this information he must confess he had been somewhat surprised and somewhat disconcerted when the right hon. Gentleman, who was responsible for the Agricultural Department in the House, had informed him, in answer to a Question he had put, that so far as the Government were concerned they knew nothing about the prevalence or existence of the foot-and-mouth disease in the United States.

MR. DODSON said, he apprehended the case the hon. Member was referring to was that reported from Neosho Falls, Kansas?

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes.

MR. DODSON: A Question was put about it some three weeks ago, and we have since heard that it is officially reported that the disease is not foot-and-mouth disease at all.

MR. CHAPLIN said, there had been considerable difference of opinion on the subject at Neosho Falls some time ago; but he now understood it was admitted that the disease was foot-and-mouth disease. He wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a paragraph in a little publication entitled Proceedings of the National Convention of Cattle Breeders, holden in Chicago on November 15th and 16th, 1883. In order that the Committee should not place too implicit reliance upon all the statements from that part of the world in regard to the absence of cattle disease, he should like to read a few words which appeared on page 41 of that publication. It was the report of a speech delivered during the Congress by a gentleman named Daniels. Referring to the Motion carried in the House of Commons last Session, the speaker said that it had brought about a very decided change of feeling over there. He had been over to England in the course of the summer, and he had been struck by a very strong remark made by the American Minister when he called upon him officially to assure him that there was no foot-and-mouth disease in that country. It was a day or two after the Motion which he (Mr. Chaplin) had introduced, and which was passed by the House. Mr. Daniels told the American Minister that he was prepared to state that there had been practically no change in that country, whereupon Mr. Lowell answered—

“We have told the British public so many lies about the condition of cattle in our country they will not believe us if we tell them the truth.”

Under those circumstances, and taking into consideration the whole facts of the matter, he (Mr. Chaplin) thought it was not too much for the House of Commons to ask the Government that they should consent to allow this Bill to pass as it had come down amended in this particular form from the House of Lords. The distinction came to this, if the Government did their duty as they ought to do, precisely the same results would follow from the unamended as from the amended Bill. But, on the other hand, instead of leaving it in the discretion of the Privy Council in future to do their duty, or to decline to do their duty, it would place it beyond their power to neglect their duty by making it a matter of Statute Law. He had now nothing further to say on this question. He believed that the Government at this moment had a great opportunity of doing something which would not only afford an immense boon upon the agricultural interests of the country, but which would benefit all classes of the whole community. They might feel sure of this—that much of the bad trade of which they had heard so much of late, and much of the sufferings of the vast number of the people who had been put out of work, had been caused unquestionably by this above all other things—namely, the prolonged and severe depression which had fallen upon the agricultural interest in this country. It might be difficult to propose means for alleviating that depression, or for restoring agriculture to a happier state of things in the future, which would command the general assent and support of Parliament and the country; but he must say that it did seem to him that this was one of the most legitimate means they could employ in doing something to help that interest, in order to place it in a more fortunate and in a more happy position in the future. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had alluded to the working classes of the country. He had said it was a question of their interest which was entitled to as much consideration from Parliament as that of any other class. He (Mr. Chaplin) agreed with every word the hon. Member said, and he would only say, in conclusion, that he had of late received numerous communications from conferences of working men, presided over by leaders of the working men themselves, and held in various parts of the country, who were beginning now to appreciate and understand the merits of the question. The communications which he had received from all sides satisfied him that it was for their interests, as well as for all other interests, that this Bill should be passed into law as it had come down amended from the House of Lords.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that if the Bill now before the Committee was entitled in any way to be called a sham Bill, then the Act of 1878, which was passed by the Party opposite, was certainly a sham Act. In endeavouring to interpret for himself the difference between the words proposed by the House of Lords and those proposed by Her Majesty's Government, he took the declaration of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), who had taken so prominent and worthy a part in this matter, that the question which the Committee had to decide was, whether the Privy Council had any discretion in the matter whatever? What the Committee had to decide was, whether there should be any discretion at all left to the Privy Council in the matter, or whether there should be none whatever? Would the Committee be prepared to say that the Privy Council should have no discretion whatever? It was because exceptional cases might arise that it was desirable that the Privy Council—whatever might be the character of the Council, because at all times it would be governed by the opinion of Parliament—should exercise some form of discretion in regard to the question. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had again alluded to the fact—or had, rather, brought forward again the argument with which he entertained the House on a former occasion—that when the supply of live animals fell in London the price also fell. Now, that was a very curious doctrine, which he thought it would be altogether impossible to prove. He would, however, ask hon. Members to deal with the facts of the case; and here was one fact in the last reported year. There were 866,000 live animals imported for the food of the people of the Metropolis from countries in regard to which the policy of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln would operate as an absolute prohibition. As a matter of fact, during last year 220,000 animals were introduced into the county of Lancaster from countries in regard to which the hon. Member would enact an absolute prohibition. Now, was the hon. Member, or any other Member of the House, prepared to get up and say that the sudden prohibition of more than 1,000,000 of live animals into this country would make no difference in the price of food to the people? Yet that appeared to be the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite and their supporters. When the Amendment which had been inserted in the Bill in the House of Lords was carried, there was a statement in The Standard newspaper—an organ representing the views of hon. Members opposite—that great apprehensions were entertained that the policy pursued by the House of Lords would bring about a considerable increase in the price of meat; and hon. Members were cautioned that it would be necessary to take steps to prevent consequences which might be strongly prejudicial to the public interest. The hon. Member for Mid Lincoln had mentioned a case of reported outbreak of disease in Canada. He was sorry that the hon. Member had not made himself more thoroughly acquainted with the facts of the case. The course the hon. Member had taken reminded him (Mr. Arthur Arnold) of what Lord Beaconsfield had said of the country gentlemen. Lord Beaconsfield said that they lived in the open air, they knew but one language, and they never read. If the hon. Member had been acquainted with the real facts of the case, he would be aware that it had since been reported, and fully proved, that there had not been a case of foot-and-mouth disease in Canada. He should like hon. Members to bear in mind that in the United States the mode of breeding and fattening animals was different from that adopted in this country. In the United States there were 10,000,000 acres of land on which cattle-raising was carried on as on one farm. There were millions of acres with no substantial fence between them, and an outbreak of disease occurring under those circumstances was a matter of the greatest importance, and led to the greatest publicity, far more than would be the case in the event of some cattle becoming diseased on a sequestered farm in this country. It might be depended upon that if there should ever be in that large cattle-raising district a serious outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, there was nothing more certain than that this country would receive information of it long before any injury could arise to our own stock. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had accused the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford

(Mr. W. E. Forster) of talking about meat in pounds' weight. Now, he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) thought the meat was always sold in pounds' weight, and not by the ton. He was glad to see that the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had deliberately dropped his original argument in reference to dead meat. The hon. Member appeared to have learned a great deal in a short time, since he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had had the honour of sitting opposite to him.

Mr. CHAPLIN said, he had not expressed any opinion upon the subject.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he was glad that the hon. Member denied having expressed any opinion upon the subject; but on a previous occasion the hon. Member had made important reference to the dead meat which came from the two great countries of the United States of America and Canada. If the dead meat trade was profitable, why should not both of those countries send it? Why did we not receive a single hundredweight of dead meat from the whole of the Dominion of Canada, when we received continuously a large importation of live stock? The fact was that where a country could export live stock it did not care to send dead meat, and that was the reason why we received so small an importation of dead meat from the Dominion of Canada. Now, this question turned very largely upon the position of the United States. From the United States, notwithstanding all the restrictions which had been imposed, the importation of live animals was constantly growing. He had just received the figures for the first three months of the present year; and, comparing the average with that of the first three months of the year 1882, the importation of live cattle from the United States was nearly four times as great, and nearly twice as great as in the first three months of 1883. The total number of cattle imported for the first three months of the year amounted to over 35,000. He had received a letter only the other day from a Norfolk farmer, who, he had no doubt, was very well known to the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), strongly disapproving of restrictive legislation, which hon. Members opposite supported. He was glad to say that he had received many letters from farmers in different parts of the country, and all of them were of a very friendly character. Allusion had been made to the great gravity of the issue now before the Committee; but his right hon. Friend had not stated what he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) hoped he would be prepared to state—that if this important Amendment—the first of a series of Amendments—were not carried, Her Majesty's Government would not proceed further with the Bill. He apprehended that the Division, to which he hoped the Committee would go very quickly, would be taken upon this Amendment as the keystone of the whole; and in the interest of the great body of the people of the country, as well as of those who were connected with agriculture, he sincerely hoped it would be adopted.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he represented a very large constituency who were deeply interested in the question; and he feared he should not be doing his duty if he were to give a silent vote upon this occasion. He regretted very much that he could not agree in the views that were taken by hon. Gentlemen who sat around him. He had listened with considerable interest to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage); and he felt that if the hon. Gentleman had a right to speak in behalf of the 40,000 constituents whom he represented, a very much greater responsibility rested upon him (Baron Henry de Worms), because he represented a constituency of more than five times that number. He would support the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, because he was of opinion that it would afford all the safeguards that were necessary for the prevention of the spread of disease. He did not think that it would be sufficient, were it not accompanied by the security which was afforded at the different cattle markets where the animals were landed. But knowing, as he did, from personal experience, how admirably the Cattle Market at Deptford was conducted, he thought that, taking into consideration the Amendment of the Government, which went upon the assumption that unless there was actual evidence forthcoming of disease no restriction should be placed on the importation of live animals, with the precautionary measures which were adopted at Deptford when animals were imported from foreign countries, no danger was likely to arise from the passing of this Amendment. There was, however, a danger which presented itself to his mind, and which he did not think was sufficiently appreciated on that side of the House. It had often been stated that if the importation of foreign cattle were stopped this would not have a very material effect on the price of food. He could not understand upon what evidence that assumption was based. As a matter of fact, the foreign meat supply was equivalent to two-fifths of the whole amount of meat consumed in the Metropolis; and he must say that it appeared to him unreasonable to assume that if that supply was suddenly cut off the price would not be proportionately increased. He thought that, in approaching the question, those who took the view he did must approach it with an impartial and unbiassed mind, and with a desire only to afford such protection as would effectually put a stop to the spread of disease. If they could satisfy themselves that this Bill afforded those securities which were necessary to prevent the spread of disease, and if they were assured, as he was, that the different markets where these animals were imported would carry out strictly the very stringent rules laid down by the Privy Council, then he did not think they need fear any penal results from the introduction of this measure. It was no part of their duty to consider the interests of the butchers or the farmers at all, but the interests of the country at large; and he thought they would materially injure the interests of the working classes, who had to depend in a great measure for the supply of meat, as well as the price of meat, upon an importation of foreign animals, if they were to put a stop to the importation of those animals, unless they had evidence that in permitting it they were encouraging the spread of disease. In the absence of positive evidence to show that the measures which could now be taken to prevent the spread of disease were ineffective, it would be unjust to the working classes to pass a measure sanctioning the absolute prohibition of the importation of all foreign cattle.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry de Worms), from his point of view, was quite right in voting for this Amendment, seeing that he represented a large Metropolitan constituency; but he (Colonel Nolan) found that the Irish Members were placed in a position altogether different. They had no big slaughter-houses to resort to, and no great market for the immediate sale of dead meat. They had, however, a very large number of stock; and it was of much more importance to them to take care of their cattle than it probably was to the English people. England had coal mines, manufactories, and every other description of industry. Ireland, however, depended mainly upon its agriculture, and the Irish people were very anxious to keep out disease from that country. They had already suffered enormously, not from actual disease, but from the restrictions imposed in order to keep down the disease. It was in every way to their advantage to support the Bill as it stood, and to resist the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, provided that they found that they were treated fairly in the Bill. For example, when they came to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny), which provided that—

“On and after the passing of this Act, no local authority in Great Britain shall prohibit the landing, or stop in transit, healthy cattle brought from Ireland to Great Britain, unless such local authority shall have obtained from the Privy Council an order authorizing them so to do.”

He wished to know if Her Majesty's Government were inclined to support such an Amendment in order to show that they did not wish to strike a blow at Irish cattle? The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, on the present occasion, had certainly dropped a suggestion which he thought was an extremely useful one. The right hon. Gentleman said that he was thinking of limiting the power of local authorities to excluding cattle from diseased districts. He wanted to ask the right hon. Gentleman how he was going to do that? Would he do it by accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ennis, which was the last Amendment on the Paper, or would he do it by some special action on the part of the Privy Council? He should like to get an answer to that question, which was a very important one, and one which had been introduced by the Government themselves, who had raised it; with this—ment. He should certainly expect to get an answer to the question from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster before the Committee went to a Division. The Irish Members were anxious to be perfectly clear upon the point, which was one of very considerable consequence to their constituents. At the present moment some of the local authorities excluded cattle coming from any part of Ireland. For instance, when it appeared that cattle disease existed in Ulster, they excluded cattle from Munster, notwithstanding the fact that it was 100 miles off. No doubt they would be justified in excluding cattle which came from districts in which disease absolutely existed; but they were not justified when particular districts only were affected in excluding animals which came from any part of Ireland. Unfortunately, the interests of the people of Ireland were different and more complicated than those of England; and he thought the Irish Members had a right to know where they really were before they went to a Division. He, therefore, asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to explain the meaning of the remark he had made, and to state how he proposed to restrict the power of the local authorities to exclude cattle from every district.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD wished to correct an error into which he believed he had been led. Speaking of the importation from the United States in the first three months of the present year, the number ought to be 35,000.

MR. DUCKHAM said, he rose to express a very strong opinion against the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Dodson). He thought the experience of the past few years was quite sufficient to show the evil of permissive legislation upon this great question. The Act of 1878, when put in force, freed not only this country, but Ireland and Scotland. Ireland continued free for three years; Scotland, with two very small exceptions just over the English Border, continued free for four years, and England was free for nine months, only to have restrictions imposed again in consequence of the importation of diseased animals from France in September, 1880. The effect of that freedom from disease was to reduce the price of meat very considerably. The price of meat in 1879 was, for beef, 5½d. and for mutton 4½d. per 8 lbs. less than it had been during the four preceding years. In 1880, when the Act was enforced with considerable vigilance, there were only 15 cargoes of diseased animals landed in the United Kingdom; but in 1881 there were 143 cargoes. In 1882 there were 66, and in the first six months of 1883 93 were landed containing animals infected with disease. He regarded with great satisfaction the manner in which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had carried out the Act since he came into the position of being, he (Mr. Duckham) regretted he could not say the Minister of Agriculture, but the Agricultural Minister of the Privy Council. If the Act of 1878 had been carried out as it was now being carried out, there would have been no necessity to come there and ask for fresh legislation. But that was not so, and it was manifest from the enormous number of diseased cargoes landed indiscriminately upon our shores during the years 1881 and 1882, and the early part of 1883, that the interest of the English agriculturists were altogether neglected by those whose duty it was to guard the Kingdom, as far as possible, against the introduction and spread of disease. It had been said by some that this was only an attempt to return to the old principles of Protection. Now, if that were the case, he would certainly not be found standing in his place there to say a word in favour of it. But he did feel this—that so long as the farmers of England had to compete with all the world with regard to their produce, they had a right to ask the Legislature of this great country to guard, as far as possible by wise legislation, their flocks and herds from so insidious and contagious a disease. It had been said that the disease had become acclimatized, and that it was indigenous to the soil of the country; but the experience of Ireland from 1879 up to January last year afforded a strong argument against that assertion, as also did the experience of Scotland and various parts of England. It was said also that this was purely a producer's question, and that the farmers were asking for legislation not because they desired to be protected from the effects of disease, but because they wished to enjoy a monopoly. Now, he maintained that it was a consumer's question quite as much as a producer's question; and he would ask the House to allow him very briefly to revert to the position of the country after the cattle plague was stamped out and all disease got rid of. In 1867 the price of meat went down ½d. per lb.; it went down more in 1868, although there were £2,000,000 sterling less animal food imported in 1867 and £3,250,000 less in 1868 than in the average of the three previous years. In 1871, when the disease was rife throughout the Kingdom, the price of beef went up 10½d. per 8 lbs., and of mutton 1s. per 8 lbs. in the Metropolitan Market beyond that of 1868, and £5,000,000 sterling of live and dead meat were imported that year more than in 1868. In 1879, when the country was comparatively free from disease, the price went down 5½d. per 8 lbs. of beef, and 4½d. per 8 lbs. of mutton below the average of the four preceding years; and last year, when the disease was rife again, and about 600,000 animals in Great Britain and Ireland suffered from it, £5,000,000 more of animal food was imported than the average of the four preceding years. Nevertheless, as everyone knew, the price of meat, instead of being lowered owing to the enormous increase of importation, was absolutely higher than it had been previously. It had been said that the poorer classes would lose the offal which they were now able to obtain at a low price; but surely the offal of diseased animals could scarcely be regarded as wholesome food. As regarded the interest of the consumers in the offal, it could not be at all compared with that of general reduction in prices when the health of the flocks and herds was maintained as shown in the prices he had quoted. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), in noticing the speech of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), said that last year we imported 700,000,000 lbs. of dead meat, or nearly three times the quantity the right hon. Gentleman gave as the estimated quantity the Bill would deprive the inhabitants of London of. They were talking of meat to supply the food of the people, and whether fresh meat or salt it must be taken into consideration. When writing of our meat supply only last week he had been taken to task in The Daily Telegraph by a gentleman who attempted to show that the calculations he had made in the public Press were inaccurate. He had stated that the Bill, if passed, would only interfere with 6 per cent of the consumption of the food of the people, whereas it was alleged that it amounted to 20 per cent; but when the writer in The Daily Telegraph attempted to prove his case he simply took the cattle and sheep in Great Britain, and gave them as representing the meat supply for the consumption of the country. Nothing was said about Ireland or about the imported dead meat, and nothing was said about the pigs. Those items were not taken into consideration at all by the writer, and such gross misrepresentations he felt could not be too strongly or too loudly condemned. He would not detain the Committee any longer, but he would give a cordial support to the Bill as amended by the House of Lords, and he did so with the firm conviction that it would benefit not only the producers but the consumers of meat throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. A. ELLIOT said, he was of opinion that the view of the farmers upon this very important question had not yet been fully laid before the Committee; and, as the Representative of an agricultural community, he desired to say a few words. The Committee had been told that the farmers were actuated by feelings in favour of Protection in the course they were now taking in supporting the Amendment introduced into this Bill by the House of Lords. If that were really so, he would be one of the last Members of the House to endorse that view; but he knew that among the farmers there were many who strongly entertained the opinion that it was desirable by every means in their power to improve the character of the store cattle. He wished to point out what the feelings of the farmers really were. It might be said that Free Trade was desirable internally as well as externally, or that they might close the country entirely against the importation of foreign cattle; or, in the third place, if they were to have local restrictions, it would be the bounden duty of the Legislature to see that full security was given by the enforcement of those local restrictions against the spread of disease. What the farmers said—and he thought it was the general view—was that they would much restrictions at all, but that they should be allowed to take their own risk of foot-and-mouth disease than be hampered in the way they were. He wished to point out that the agricultural interest, as compared with the consuming interest, was not given to vigorous or active agitation; but, nevertheless, although they were not given to agitation as much as urban communities, they did feel very strongly upon this point. When he came to listen to the argument put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, he must say, for his own part, he could not help feeling that those arguments depended upon the assumption that the Agricultural Department would not be able to do its work. He was of opinion that that assumption was altogether fallacious. The Agricultural Department would continue to do its work as it had done it during the last two years. What did the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster amount to? If he had taken down the words and figures of the right hon. Gentleman accurately, they came to this—that since the month of May, 1883, no single head of diseased cattle had been landed in this country from foreign parts, except on the 1st of June, when 11 diseased sheep and one swine were introduced. Now, what was the effect of that statement? Surely, the effect of that statement was this—that if proper precautions were taken, a state of things did exist under which cattle could be landed in this country from foreign parts with reasonable safety; and therefore he wished to press upon the Committee the statement which had been made over and over again that it was only necessary to give the Agricultural Department full power to deal with all these cases, and to exclude cattle that were found to be infected with disease. There was no reason to suppose that the exclusion would be very large, or, at any rate, that it would be so large that the price of meat would be enormously raised to the consumer. That argument altogether fell to the country, because the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had himself proved that diseased animals during the last two years had not been landed at our ports from foreign countries; and it was, therefore, an entire mistake to suppose that the prohibition of the landing of diseased animals would raise the price of meat. It was the general opinion of the farmers of the country that, local restrictions having been obtained, it was their duty to endeavour to get protection at the ports of landing; and, unless some such power as that proposed in the amended Bill were intrusted to the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council, the interests of the consumer would suffer very much indeed. He had thought it right to make these few remarks on a point upon which the farmers certainly did feel very strongly; but if he thought for a moment that their case depended in any considerable degree upon the Protectionist argument, he should be one of the first Members in that House to oppose it. He did not, however, believe that their case depended upon that argument; and, therefore, he should be obliged to vote against the Government upon this Amendment.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought that the debate had been useful in having removed from the minds of hon. Members the impression that there was very little difference in the Bill as it had been brought in by the Government and as it was brought down to the House of Lords, with the Amendments which had been inserted in it by the House of Lords. It certainly showed that hon. Members fully appreciated the nature of the difference. His hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Heneage), in the effective speech he had made, asserted that the difference was so great that the Bill, as originally introduced, was only a sham Bill, and it had been converted into a real Bill by the Amendments introduced into it. He could not agree with one passage of the speech of his hon. Friend, although he only desired to refer to it in a kindly spirit. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend that there was not an intention on the part of the agricultural Members to restore Protection in this matter. He was quite sure that that was not their intention. But while he gave credit for honourable motives to one set of persons, he did not think, at the same time, that dishonourable motives ought to be imputed to others. He had, therefore, been surprised and sorry to hear the remarks his hon. Friend had made in connection with a large class of people—the foreign traders. He understood his hon. Friend to say that it was their object to keep up the disease. Now, that was a very strong statement to make.

Mr. HENEAGE said, he had not stated that it was the object of foreign traders to keep up disease, but that it was to their interest to do so.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought his hon. Friend had given the idea that foreign traders were actuated by that motive; and he was glad to hear his hon. Friend state now that he did not think so. As far as he (Mr. W. E. Forster) was able to see, a charge of that nature was absolutely without foundation. The hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) showed clearly that there was a considerable difference between the proposal of the Government and that contained in the Bill as amended by the House of Lords. The hon. Member pointed out that in one case a discretion was given to the Government, whereas in the other it was not. He thought the Committee were able to see from the debate which had taken place what the difference had been. He imagined that hon. Members who were in favour of the Bill as it had been amended would be prepared to exclude the importation of any live animals from any foreign country in which foot-and-mouth disease might be said to exist. He understood that that was what hon. Members who supported the Lords' Amendments were aiming at. [Mr. CHAPLIN: A part only.] He (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought that such a safeguard should not be given if satisfactory arrangements were made against the spread of disease. He understood that the expectation was that no animals would be allowed to come from any country in which there was foot-and-mouth disease; but the words of the clause as amended would allow the matter to go a good deal further. They really said that from no country throughout the length and breadth of which a case of foot-and-mouth disease might be discovered after the most minute search should any animal be allowed to be imported into this country. In fact, a sort of search and report would have to be made by the Government in every country as to the existence of the disease before any live animals were allowed to be imported from any of them into this country. Upon a mere rumour that disease prevailed the importation of animals would be excluded, although it might be almost immediately discovered that the rumour was altogether without foundation. The effect of that would be, as the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) had frankly admitted in his speech last year and also now, that it would exclude the importation of all live animals from what were called the scheduled countries. It would, therefore, exclude a large and important part of the food at present provided for the consumption of the people. The hon. Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot), who had just sat down, had made use of an argument which he (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought was in favour of the course taken by the Government. The hon. Member admitted that the precautions taken by the Government had been successful in grappling with the disease; and he had congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what he had done. Nevertheless, his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had not adopted the principle of stopping the importation of animals from every country where it could be shown that a case of disease existed. His right hon. Friend had gone upon the principle of excluding the importation from all countries in which there was reasonable ground for the belief that the disease might be imported. That was the principle on which the Committee desired to work. They admitted that there was a change of opinion in regard to foot-and-mouth disease, and that they would be quite justified in stopping the importation of live animals where there was any real danger of spreading the disease; but, at the same time, they thought the Government ought to have a discretionary power to judge whether the regulations at the port of embarkation were not such as to afford a reasonable prospect of preventing the spread of disease. He was quite sure that if the Bill were passed as the Lords had sent it down, the Government would not be able to do that; and he was also quite sure that what the Lords intended was that the Government should be able to use a fair discretion. The matter was a very serious one. There had been a good deal of talk about figures, and some hon. Members had attempted to prove that the price of meat went down according to the number of animals imported into the country. They were all of them sufficiently men of business to know that if they diminished the supply of an article the price, as a general rule, would rise. There was no doubt whatever that, taking 4,000,000 of people in London, the stoppage of the importation of live animals from the scheduled countries would stop the importation of about 23 per cent of all the meat now consumed in London. The dead meat trade was not equal to 50 per cent of the live importation; and if they were to depend upon the dead meat alone it would take a very long time, indeed, before they filled up the gap. The increase in the dead meat trade from the Australian markets was, no doubt, most satisfactory; but it was still the merest bagatelle possible in comparison with the consumption of the country. He failed to see upon what ground they ought to abandon all the importation of live meat. It could not be on account of the disease, because, although it was a serious disease, it had not yet been so considered by the agriculturists themselves, and it was regarded as of so little importance at the time he passed his Bill on the subject that he had some difficulty in getting the mention of the disease inserted in the Bill, and yet the ravages of that disease had been greater before that time than they had been since. In 1878 no one thought of slaughtering animals at the port of debarkation. It was admitted that the experiment should be tried for two or three years. His full belief, however, was that no regulations they could make in regard to importation would banish disease from the country, and the statement which had been made by his right hon. Friend fully bore him out in that assertion. He was quite willing that there should be restrictions when necessary; but he was convinced that to lay down a rule that no animals should be imported from any country in which by chance disease might be found to exist was altogether unnecessary, and would be a most wanton interference with the food supply of the country.

Mr. KENNY said, that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), in addressing the Committee a short time ago, had made reference to a previous statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, that the Government would be prepared to limit the power of the local authorities in regard to the exclusion of animals. His hon. and gallant Friend had asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps were proposed to be taken by the Privy Council; whether they proposed to act on their own authority, or to accept the Amendment which he (Mr. Kenny) had placed lower down upon the Paper? He should be very glad, before the Division took place, to receive an answer to that question from the right hon. Gentleman. It was only fair to his hon. and gallant Friend that that reply should be given.

MR. DODSON said, he could answer that question at once. The Government were prepared to accept the Amendment of which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Kenny) had given Notice; but he might also state that they had it in contemplation to issue an Order in Council limiting the power of the local authorities to prohibit the introduction of animals into their districts from parts of the United Kingdom which were ascertained to be free from disease.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he had no doubt as to the direction in which the interests of the people he represented ought to induce him to vote. He thought that a most extensive and significant demonstration had already been made against the modification which the House of Lords had introduced into the Government Bill. In the course of the debate some allusion had been made to Protection. They had to thank the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) for charging the Liberal Party and Her Majesty's Government with caring for nobody but the foreign producer. Seeing that the charge had been made, it was only natural that some answer should be given to it.

MR. NEWDEGATE hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Thorold Rogers) would excuse him. He had not used the expression attributed to him. What he had said was that the Liberal Party had been the representatives of foreign interests in thwarting the agricultural interests of the country.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he could not help thinking that there was very little difference between the two positions. He found that the supply of dead meat brought into this country averaged over £3,000,000 sterling a-year; and he was bound to say that it appeared to him to be almost an insult to the intelligence of the people to imagine that a very long time, indeed, must not elapse before the £3,000,000 now representing the importation of dead meat were made to counter-balance the £12,000,000 sterling expended in the importation of live meat, and if a scarcity arose there must necessarily be a rise of prices in geometrical proportion to the restriction of the supply. There would not only be a decline in the importation, but a corresponding increase in price; and they were bound to take into consideration the effect which those two operations would produce upon the condition of the people when the decline of the supply took place. The working classes of London fully appreciated the result of any limitation of the supply, and knew very well that it would have a material effect in increasing the price, and thereby diminishing the comfort and injuring the health of the general mass of the population. He could assure the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) that the repentance among the working classes on the subject of Free Trade was very small indeed. Allusion had been made to the Petitions which had been presented to the House. He was well aware of the way in which those Petitions were got up. They were got up in the back rooms of the public-houses of London, with only 10 or a dozen people present, who had no title, or claim, or pretension to represent the feeling of the general public. In no way did they represent the feelings of the working classes, which, if it were necessary, he could show were entirely in favour of the course taken by the Government in regard to the Bill. The result of adopting the Amendment introduced into the Bill in the House of Lords would, he believed, be that a very considerable reduction in the amount of live stock imported into England would be effected. Everyone knew that at the present moment the greatest possible precautions were taken to prevent the spread of disease in the country, at Deptford, and at the other cattle markets. He should like to know what precautions were taken to prevent the spread of the disease in the country itself? Only last year he happened to be at Croydon, and he passed by an inclosed field containing

50 steers and calves, which were suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, in the immediate neighbourhood of the high road. Surely, if the working classes were to be deprived of a foreign supply, some restrictions should be placed on the dissemination of disease at home. If such things as these were allowed he could well understand how a cargo of cattle perfectly free from disease might be landed at Liverpool, and seven days afterwards be found suffering from disease in Cambridgeshire. The disease would have been acquired simply by passing through an infected district. He did not believe that the administration of the regulations for the prevention of disease had been neglected by the Government, who had always had at heart the good of the community. Her Majesty's Government were fully aware that until the agricultural interests were prosperous and properly developed, the general prosperity of the country would be retarded; but he did not think they would be assisting in developing the prosperity of agriculture by imposing restrictions on the importation of food, which would be invidious in the eyes of the people generally.

MR. DODSON said, he wished to correct a misapprehension which he was afraid might arise from the answer he had just given to the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny). He had not observed that the hon. Member had two Amendments on the Paper; and when he said that he would accept the Amendment of the hon. Member he referred to the first Amendment only. The subject of the second Amendment was one which should be dealt with by Orders in Council.

MR. KENNY said, that his question had been principally directed to the second Amendment, which was the Amendment referred to by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). He wished to know from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what course he proposed to take in regard to that Amendment?

MR. DODSON said, that in regard to that Amendment he had just stated that it was in contemplation to deal with the subject by an Order in Council. He had every reason to believe that the alarm of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) in regard to Ireland would prove to be altogether unfounded.

The Order in Council would, he hoped, be issued shortly, and he believed hon. Members would find that it met the case they desired to raise.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he must protest against the proposed limitation intimated by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster of the power of the local authorities in relation to the importation of cattle from Ireland. There was reason to believe that a good deal of the disease had been introduced into this country by the importation of cattle from Ireland. He would not say that they brought the disease from Ireland; but, as a matter of fact, cattle had been brought into the county of Forfar, which he represented, from Ireland which had introduced the disease into that county, and the farmers of Forfarshire had suffered considerably in consequence. It was to their interest to have Irish cattle; but, considering the necessity of preventing the spread of disease, they had had to deny themselves the advantages which might be derived from the introduction of Irish cattle. On that ground he took objection to the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, that it was the intention of the Government to limit the powers of the local authorities in relation to the importation of cattle from Ireland. A considerable majority of his constituents, and of the farmers of Scotland, were in favour of the importation of store cattle from abroad. They had had considerable experience of store cattle from Canada, which had, to a considerable extent, supplied the deficiency in this country. They hoped still, by some modification of the present Bill, to be able to obtain store cattle from the United States of America, reasonable security being given against the introduction of foot-and-mouth disease. There was one point which had not been raised in the course of the debate, with regard to which he wished to obtain some opinion from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. He was anxious that the Government should indicate what course they intended to pursue in regard to the disposal of animals at the port of debarkation. At the present moment there were three methods adopted in reference to foreign cattle. In the first place, the importation might be prohibited altogether; in the second place, they might be slaughtered at the port of debarkation; and, in the third, there was free admission into the country. He wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman what position the Government would take, when the present Bill passed into law, with respect to the slaughter of cattle at the port of debarkation? That was a very important point. If the Bill remained as it stood now, and such circumstances arose as the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) had referred to, he understood that it would be the duty of the Government, on first hearing of a rumour of disease, to prohibit the importation of all animals from America, for instance, or from any other foreign country, because they could not be altogether satisfied that there was no truth in the rumour. Then, after a little time, it might be found out that though a disease of some peculiar kind might affect certain classes of cattle, it was not at all contagious. If, however, they were to carry out the proposals of hon. Members opposite, they would entirely prohibit the importation of live foreign cattle into this country. By the active administration of the present system of administration the Government authorities in Scotland had prevented a spread of the disease to any extent in that country, although it had been frequently introduced into various counties in Scotland. The county which he had the honour to represent had had the disease introduced into it eight times by distinct outbreaks; but by the exercise of vigour on the part of the local authorities in putting the provisions of the Act into force, they had succeeded in preventing the disease from spreading. The question, therefore, at once rose, why was it that in certain counties in England the disease was allowed to spread to such a great extent when it had been effectually dealt with in other districts? He invited the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) to explain what natural causes existed in the county of Lincolnshire that caused the spread of disease to such an extent as had actually been the case in that county, whereas in other districts equally exposed to infection the disease had been satisfactorily dealt with. It appeared to him that if the local authorities dealt energetically with disease when it was first introduced into a district they would be able to prevent it from spreading. He placed more confidence in such action than in attempting, by any measure of legislation of this kind, to prevent the introduction of disease, even if the importation of cattle were altogether prohibited.

Mr. JAMES HOWARD said, he desired to trespass upon the attention of the Committee for only two or three minutes, mainly for the purpose of explaining the vote he was about to record. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, a few moments ago, stated that very few animals had been landed in this country which were suffering from foot-and-mouth disease during the last twelve months. That was a matter for great satisfaction; but it was rather an argument against the importation of diseased animals altogether, because it must be admitted that a single spark might set on fire a whole city. The present outbreak, which had occasioned so serious a loss to the country, was entirely due to the importation of a very few diseased animals from France. He had at first been under the impression that the simple transposition of the negative, from the end of the clause to the beginning, would not practically make a very wide difference; but after the very strong views expressed on that subject by the Chancellor of the Duchy, as he was in favour of the most vigorous measure that could be adopted for stamping out the disease, he felt compelled to vote for the Bill as it had been sent down from the House of Lords. He did so because, as he had stated, he was in favour of the most effectual measure for stamping out the disease in the country. He would not go over the arguments which had been used inside and outside the House as to the effect and spread of the disease. He contended that it was quite as great an evil to the consumer as to the producer. None of them could experience satisfaction from anything that tended to raise the price of meat and check the supply of the dairy produce of the country, which, by the introduction and spread of foot-and-mouth disease, was the case. His hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had alluded to the fact that he had presented a Petition from his (Mr. J. Howard's) constituents against the Lords' Amendments in the Bill. He had discussed the matter with many of his constituents who were not concerned in agricultural operations, and he had found that their objections to this legislation were founded entirely upon ignorance. He also believed that the general opposition which was given to the Bill among the artizan class of the country was also founded upon ignorance; and he was of opinion that no class had more interest in keeping the cattle of the country free from the ravages of disease than the working men, for if the people were to be more cheaply fed our own flocks and herds must be maintained in health.

Mr. HASTINGS said, he only desired to say a very few words in order to explain why, as representing a large constituency, which was not only a large agricultural constituency, but one also containing a large urban and semi-urban population, he considered it his duty to support the Bill against the Amendments proposed by Her Majesty's Government. It seemed to him that they must do one of two things—either carry out strictly provisions for restricting the importation of cattle from infected countries or not. If it were intended to carry out those restrictions, there surely could be no reason why the Bill as it had come down from the House of Lords should not be passed. If they refused to adopt the Lords' Amendments, it could only be because they had no desire to carry out the restrictions with vigour and in good faith, and that was just what he feared, and exactly what those who represented constituencies that were largely interested in the production of the food supply dreaded. They feared that the restrictions which all persons considered to be necessary were not about to be adequately worked, and that a loophole was to be left by the amendment of the Bill which would practically allow them to be disregarded. Under those circumstances, they felt it incumbent upon them, in the interest of their constituencies, and in discharge of their duty to the large class of consumers throughout the country, to vote against the Amendment of Her Majesty's Government, and in favour of the Bill as it had come down from the House of Lords.

Mr. DODSON said, he would not trouble the Committee with many further observations; but it was desirable that he should say a word or two upon the debate which had taken place. In the first place, his hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had made a very severe attack upon the Privy Council for its action before that period in May, 1883, to which he had referred in his speech. Now, in what he (Mr. Dodson) had said he had not the slightest wish to lead the Committee to suppose that his noble Friend the President of the Council had in any way neglected his duty before that period. Lord Spencer, in the first instance, carried out faithfully and loyally the Act of 1878, in the spirit in which it was intended by those who framed and passed that Act; and his noble Friend (Lord Carlingford) had carried on the administration of the Act in the same spirit of fidelity. It had been alleged that if the Bill were amended in the manner he proposed, it would be so weak as to be almost a sham. Well, however weak it might be in the eyes of some hon. Gentlemen, at all events it would be stronger than the Act of 1878, which was the Act introduced by the late Government, and the Act under which they had hitherto proceeded. Moreover, the Act had never been so stringently administered by the late as by the present Government, more especially since the period in last year to which he had referred. And yet the demand for stringency had been louder than ever. They had found, as he had stated in moving the second reading of the Bill, that there was a very strong feeling in the country on the subject. The apprehension of foot-and-mouth disease had had a discouraging effect in the agricultural districts, and they were anxious to give a reasonable security in order to allay that apprehension. They, therefore, thought it right to exercise the powers of the Act of 1878 more stringently than they had ever been exercised before, and he ventured to say more stringently than the authors of that Act contemplated their being exercised. The hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) had asserted that he (Mr. Dodson) had given no reason for apprehension which he said existed in the mind of the Government as to the effect of the Bill as it had been sent down by the House of Lords in hampering and restricting trade. The Government considered that if the clause were retained in the form in which it came down from the other House, they would be running a serious risk, not only of hampering trade, but of raising the price of meat to the consumer, without any adequate addition to the security of the producer. It was suggested by the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) that there would be a corresponding increase in the trade in dead meat. No doubt the trade in fresh dead meat was a large and increasing trade; but the trade in live meat was a much larger and more important trade; it was also a rapidly increasing trade. He wished also to point out that while, on the one hand, the trade in live animals was steadily increasing, that in dead meat was a fluctuating one. There were some hon. Gentlemen who seemed to think that it was only necessary to prohibit the importation of live animals in order to insure a corresponding increase in the supply of fresh dead meat. But this was not the case, and the experience of past years showed that it was not so. He should like, upon this point, to call the attention of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) to a few hard facts. The Privy Council last year prohibited the importation of live animals from France. And what had been the result? Had France sent a larger quantity of fresh dead meat in lieu of the live animals it had previously exported? Nothing of the kind. On the contrary, we had scarcely received any fresh dead meat from that country. Again, for a considerable number of years live cattle had been admitted to this country from Germany and Belgium; but some years ago the landing of live cattle from those countries was prohibited. What had happened? Did Germany and Belgium send fresh beef instead of live cattle? Not at all. The fact was that Germany and Belgium had sent us more fresh beef during the three years preceding the prohibition of live animals as was recorded in the Returns than in the following years. No doubt the trade in fresh dead meat had increased largely of late, principally from New Zealand; but, for some reason he was unable to state, the trade in dead meat from Holland and other countries in Europe had considerably diminished in 1883. He remembered that when the Act of 1878 was passed some hon. Gentlemen wanted to prohibit the landing of live animals from the United States, and asserted that the fresh dead meat trade would, in consequence, be largely increased. But the fact was that the live meat trade from the United States maintained a great superiority over that in fresh dead meat from the same country. In conclusion, he had only to repeat that Her Majesty's Government did not share the views of those who regarded this Amendment as an unimportant or immaterial one. They considered, on the contrary, that if the clause were retained in the Bill in the shape in which it had come down from the House of Lords it would be at the risk of very seriously hampering trade and raising the price of meat to the consumer, without in any degree making an adequate addition to the security of the home produce against the importation of disease from abroad. Her Majesty's Government looked upon this question as one of the utmost gravity, and as involving consequences of importance.

Question put.

Amendment negatived.

MR. DODSON: After the very serious vote the Committee has just come to the Committee will, I trust, not be surprised at my stating that Her Majesty's Government request time to consider the course they should adopt. I, therefore, move that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Dodson.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is somewhat extraordinary. This is not the first time that an Amendment to the propositions of Her Majesty's Government has been made in this Bill. In "another place" the Bill was amended to the shape in which it now stands. Her Majesty's Government took ample time to consider their position with regard to that Amendment, and after that consideration they decided to go on with the Bill. Have they really been playing with the time of the House of Lords and of the House of Commons, and also with the opinion of the country, on this important subject; and do they come down now, when all that this House has done is to retain the Bill in the shape in which it has stood for the last two months, and ask the Committee to report Progress in order that they may reconsider their position, as if we had made some serious alteration in the measure? Sir, I venture to say that, if this Motion be a preliminary, as it would seem to be, to the decision of Her Majesty's Government to withdraw the measure, it will be accepted by the country as a proof that they have not been sincere in proposing it; but that they have merely brought it forward as a means of catching the votes of their supporters behind them, and of the agricultural interest, and not with any real intention of dealing with this great subject.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I certainly think that the doctrine laid down by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) is one of the most extraordinary I have ever heard. He has charged Her Majesty's Government with playing with this question, because, after the opinion of the House of Lords was obtained, the Government thought it desirable that the opinion of the House of Commons should also be obtained. Does the right hon. Gentleman suppose that with the majority his Party has in the House of Lords the Government are not to give the House of Commons an opportunity of forming a judgment on this question? Then the right hon. Gentleman says that, of course, the Government ought to go on with the Bill, notwithstanding the vote that has been come to. But the Committee will doubtless see that Her Majesty's Government have not merely to consider whether they have obtained the success of a vote or not, but whether that vote is in accordance with what they think to be right. When we know that the Department which will be responsible for the working of the measure has stated, both in this House and out of it, that the Bill, as sent down from the House of Lords, and which, I regret to say, is now supported by this House, would be mischievous, and do harm, and is unnecessary, then I say that to suppose the Government is at once to proceed with the measure after such a statement as that seems to me to imply the most extraordinary forgetfulness on the part of the right hon. Gentleman as to the duty of the Government to consider whether they think the decision come to by this Committee is right or not.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I think we ought to remember that this is not the only case within the present Session, or within a recent period, as to which Her Majesty's Government would appear to have set at naught the feeling of the majority of the House of Commons on questions deeply affecting the agricultural community. My hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), only the other day, carried a Motion of the greatest importance, but with regard to which absolutely no attention has been paid, and, indeed, to which Her Majesty's Government say it would be practically absurd that they should be expected to pay any attention; and now, upon a matter also of the gravest importance, upon a Bill which has not been discussed on Party lines, but on principles upon which Members on both sides of the House have come together, and which everybody in the House agrees to be of the greatest possible importance—when the House has decided by an exceptional and decisive majority a very important point, Her Majesty's Government say they are going to reconsider their position, which would seem to imply that they may drop the Bill. I want to know whether this is the spirit in which questions of this kind, affecting a large and important class of the population, are to be treated?

Mr. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) says that this Bill has not been considered on Party lines. I think, Sir, that when the right hon. Gentleman made that statement he could not have heard what was said by the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) who sits near him. The right hon. Baronet, although we have now been told that this Bill has not been discussed on Party lines, contrived to introduce into a very short speech on a matter simply relating to common usage and procedure, charges as odious and offensive as I have ever heard made from one side of the House to the other. I rather presume that hon. Gentlemen are aware that people may think they have characters even when there are others who think they have not; and consequently the epithets which I have applied to those charges turn upon this—that the right hon. Baronet chose to accuse us, in the event of our taking a particular course in regard to which he does not know whether we shall take it or not, but as to which he anticipated a conclusion which he wishes it to be supposed will be taken—the right hon. Baronet accuses us of taking a course which will be regarded by the country as a proof of our insincerity, and insinuates that we have been making false professions to the country. Well, Sir, that is pretty well for a proceeding on a Bill which has not been discussed on Party lines. I should like to know what would be the language that might be used upon a Bill which is discussed on Party lines, if this be a specimen of the most impartial and most judicial temper in which the right hon. Baronet discusses this question. With regard to the question itself, I think his contention has been effectually disposed of by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). But let us consider what the case really is. It is simple enough in regard to its facts. The right hon. Baronet appears to admit that it is a common and useful practice, when the Government have failed on an important Motion in respect to a Bill in Committee, to take time to consider their course. But he says that that will not hold in the present case, because after the Motion had been carried in the House of Lords the Government acquiesced in it, and did not abandon their Bill. Certainly not; but was there any fraud practised on the House of Lords? Let anyone read the language used by my noble Friend, Lord Carlingford—perhaps, Sir, I have made a slip of the tongue in my reference to him—but language was certainly used on the part of the Government which made it perfectly clear that their intention was to try the judgment of the House of Commons, and, in the event of their obtaining a favourable judgment in this House, they hoped the House of Lords might be disposed to defer to that decision. That being the case, were they right or were they wrong? Was it their duty to abandon the Bill in the House of Lords if they thought the Amendment would be fatal? It might have been convenient to abandon the Bill in the House of Lords, and to say—"We have fulfilled our pledge; and now you may shift for yourselves, and take your own course." But we did not do that; on the contrary, at great inconvenience, we carried forward the Bill, and brought it into this House. We have done all we could, and we rather stretched a point for the purpose of giving time to the House for the consideration of the Bill, in order that we might obtain the judgment of the House upon it. I contend that we are entitled to exercise our own deliberate and conscientious judgment on the effect of the vote of the House of Commons, just as if the Bill had been introduced by us in this House, and just as if the Amendment carried in the other House had been carried in the House of Commons. I hope the House will see that this is not unreasonable. I have stated how far this differs from other cases—they are not perhaps many; but certainly I have cases in my mind in which the Leader of the Party to which the right hon. Baronet belongs, having been defeated in a course which he thought serious, has asked for time, and it has been granted without a word. That is what I should have expected in this case, and that is all we ask to be done on the present occasion. Gentlemen will lose nothing by assenting to that course, and will only be conforming to the usage of the House. Our desire is that we shall take a reasonable, and not a long time to consider whether we can come to terms with the Amendment, which, on the whole, according to the declarations we have made “elsewhere,” bears an aspect most formidable, and possibly fatal to the Bill. Our object is to see whether it is possible for us to so come to terms as to, in fact, fulfil the covenants we have given to the House in the most rigid and ample manner. It is for that purpose that we ask the House to report Progress, and we have some confidence that our proposal will be agreed to.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he felt bound to say that whatever the right hon. Gentleman might think of the observations of his right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), those observations were fully warranted by the circumstances; and he wished to remind the Prime Minister of a fact of which he and his Colleagues seemed to be totally oblivious. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had stated that this Division had been of so grave and serious a character that it was necessary for the Government to take time to consider their position with regard to it. Why, what had been the effect of the Division? Simply to reinsert in this Bill words which carried out literally, and word for word, the Resolution which was carried in this House last Session. He desired also to remind the Prime Minister of what occurred at the commencement of the Session. At that time, in the debate on the Address in answer to the Gracious Speech from the Throne, he gave Notice of an Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman acknowledged would, if carried, have been a Vote of Censure on the Government, and would have insured their retirement from Office. Why was it not proceeded with? Because the Government came down to the House in a hurry and announced—although no mention was made of the matter in the Queen’s Speech—that they intended to deal with this question, and in a manner which everyone understood they intended loyally to carry out the Resolution of last year. The House of Commons had now, for the second time, declared its judgment on the matter; and now the right hon. Gentleman thought it necessary, under the circumstances, to have time to consider the position of the Government. Their duty was clear—it was either to carry out the Resolution twice passed by the House of Commons, or to make room for others who would do so.

MR. HENEAGE said, he strongly objected to the language used by hon. Gentlemen on the other side. They seemed to think that this had been a Party Division; but it was no Party Division whatever. Those on this side who voted against the Government did so because they believed they were doing the best for the country; but they did not so vote in order that they might bring charges, which they believed entirely false, against the Government. He looked on the declaration of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster exactly in the opposite way to hon. Gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Gentleman said he thought it would be a very serious matter indeed if this Amendment was carried; but now he offered to take time to consider the matter, and that, he thought, showed that the Government were sincere in trying to go on with the Bill. If any attempt was made to prevent their Motion being acceded to he should vote with the Government.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, if the Motion to report Progress was to be understood as meaning the resignation of the Government he imagined it would be acceded to unanimously. If, on the other hand, no such fortunate result was to be anticipated from the Motion being agreed to, he would like to explain the vote he should give upon the Motion. He had supported the Government in the last Division, because he had grave doubts as to the manner in which the Amendment of the House of Lords might affect the urban populations. The House of Commons in its collective capacity, being of opinion that those doubts were not well founded, and having expressed the opinion that no danger need necessarily arise from the Amendment being agreed to, he should certainly not imitate the example of the Government by endeavouring to repudiate the decision of the House of Commons. He should be prepared to accept the decision of the House, and in order that a most valuable piece of legislation might not be lost to the country he should vote against the Motion to report Progress; because, undoubtedly, if what had fallen from the Government indicated that they would consider whether they would part with the Bill or not, it was important that the House should give them to understand that they must proceed with the Bill. Under these circumstances, he thought many borough Members who had supported the Government in the last Division must now oppose them.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he was glad that this Motion had been made, for otherwise he should have deemed it his duty to make the Motion himself, because certainly not fewer than 1,000 resolutions had been passed not merely by urban populations, but by populations in counties, praying the Government, if they could not pass this Bill as it was introduced, to abandon it; and that was the expectation of the country generally. He, himself, had to-day presented a Petition from the county of Bedford, urging that that step should be taken; and he was certain that that was not the desire only of the urban populations, but of the counties. Hon. Gentlemen opposite could not forget that with regard to the Bill, as it had come from the House of Lords, it had been stated by the most important organs of their Party that if the Amendment of the House of Lords was adopted so serious would be the condition of things with regard to the probable rise in the price of meat, that it would be the duty of the Government to consider what measures should be adopted to avoid so grave and serious a result. This had been stated by the The Standard, and he was therefore glad that this Motion had been made.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the statement in The

twice been quoted to-day, was made, he did not know how many months ago. The hon. Member having twice quoted the statement, he assumed that the hon. Member seriously believed that the Conservative Party would have to consider what course they would pursue if the Amendment of the House of Lords was adopted. The hon. Member was, however, labouring under a complete delusion. With regard to what the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had said, he had stated that this question had been described on this side of the House as a Party question.

MR. HENEAGE said, that had been stated lately by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he had not heard anybody deny it.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was speaking of the debate on the Amendment proposed by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; and he ventured to assert that never was a debate which partook less of the character of a Party debate than this had, and he understood that the hon. Gentleman himself assented to that view. All, then, that the hon. Gentleman meant was that his right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had shown some warmth in dissenting from the view of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. It was perfectly open to the right hon. Baronet to take that view, which he had expressed in terms not unbecoming his great reputation in that House. If the hon. Member for Great Grimsby differed from that view he was perfectly at liberty to express that difference, and he had done so. With respect to what had fallen from the Prime Minister, he would put the question from this point of view. The right hon. Gentleman had asked whether the Government, when they were defeated in the House of Lords, were to turn round on the House of Lords and the whole agricultural interest, and say—"We will not go further with the Bill, but will leave you to shift for yourselves." Would that have been a proper position for the Government to take on so important a question? Would that have been fair to the agricultural interest? He answered—It would have been infinitely fairer to the agricultural interest than the course which the Government had actually taken, if they intended now to abandon the Bill, and for this reason. He must remind the Prime Minister how it was that the Government had proposed legislation in the House of Lords at all on this question. It was not until the Duke of Richmond introduced a Bill on the subject, and that Bill was passing, that the Government undertook to introduce a measure at all; and if the right hon. Gentleman had acted in the way in which he said he had not acted, and in which he should have acted—namely, said he repudiated all further legislation on the subject, then the Duke of Richmond would have proceeded with his Bill. It would have come down to this House, and this House would have had to decide upon its principles. Therefore the right hon. Gentleman had not stated fully or candidly the real position of the question as it presented itself when the House of Lords passed this Amendment. That being the position, the House of Commons had now expressed the same opinion as the House of Lords, and the Government at this moment stood in this predicament—that they had against them the opinion of the House of Lords; that they had against them the opinion of the House of Commons, as expressed last year on the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin); and that they had against them the opinion of the House of Commons as expressed in a full House, and after a full debate this afternoon; that was the position of the matter, and if the Government required further time to consider what they ought to do in the matter, he for one should not be disposed to interpose any impediment in the way of their doing so.

Mr. RYLANDS said, he was glad that the noble Lord, as representing the Front Bench opposite, had shown a disposition to treat the Government with some little courtesy, which previous speakers on that Bench had not shown. Of course, hon. Members on this side of the House admitted that owing to a combination of votes in the House they had been defeated; but they none the less knew that they represented millions of the population of this country whose interests and industrial advantages were struck at. Knowing that a most serious change had been made in this Bill, they were perfectly ready to support the Government in asking for time to consider the course they might think it necessary to take; and he thought he might say, with perfect confidence, that the Representatives of the manufacturing populations of the country would rightly express their opinion by saying that the Government should not allow this Bill, in its present shape, to pass.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, he thought the Committee was disinclined to proceed unnecessarily to a Division on this question; but he also thought the Prime Minister would effectually avoid any risk of such action being taken, if he were to give some indication of the course the Government intended to take in the future in respect to fixing a day for the further consideration of this Bill, and for making their announcement with regard thereto. He fully agreed with his noble Friend that this had never been treated as a Party question from first to last by anyone sitting in that part of the House; but, at the same time, he fully and heartily concurred—as he believed nearly every Member on that side of the House did—with his right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) when he stigmatized the conduct of the Government in terms which he (Mr. Lowther) heartily endorsed. He did not wish to divide against the Motion to report Progress; but what they had a right to ask was this—three-fourths of the time which the Prime Minister was never weary of telling them was invaluable had been taken from them this afternoon. When the Government proposed to report Progress at a quarter-past 6, they had a right to ask what further facilities the Government intended to give for the discussion of this subject? Did the Government, having deprived them of a portion of the afternoon which was set apart for the consideration of this subject, intend indefinitely to hang this Bill up, and practically withdraw it from the cognizance of Parliament? He had not hesitated to say elsewhere, and he would repeat here, that he had a firm conviction that the Government were trifling with this subject. As he had said not long ago, using the words in a Parliamentary sense, he believed that the Bill had been introduced upon false pretences. That opinion he now repeated in the presence of the Government; and he thought the Committee had a right to insist that an early opportunity should be given of resuming this debate.

Mr. JOSEPH COWEN said, he hoped the Committee would assent to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, and allow Progress to be reported. He had supported the Bill on its merits, and how did the matter now stand? Further procedure with the Bill at this hour was impossible; but apart from that the Government had not said they would abandon the Bill, but that they would consider their position. It was reasonable to allow them the time they asked for, and possibly that might result in their accepting the course which the Committee had decided upon. At all events, it was not fair to assume that they would not do so, because they were defeated in "another place," and they had then considered their position. If they did not do so, then the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) would have a strong case against them for refusing to act on a decision which had been twice recorded. Under these circumstances, he thought it would be a mere act of fairness to the Executive to agree to the Motion, and allow them time for reconsidering their position.

Mr. DODSON said, he proposed to put the Bill down for Friday, and he would then state what course the Government intended to adopt.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, there would not be any chance of taking the Bill on Friday, as there was other Business on the Paper for that day. What he wished to know was, whether the Government would afford any indication as to when they would put the Bill down for practical consideration?

Mr. DODSON replied, that he had answered that question by anticipation. He would put the Bill down for Friday, not with any intention of proceeding with it then, but with a view to stating what further course the Government would pursue.

REVISION OF JURORS AND VOTERS LIST (DUBLIN COUNTY) BILL.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st March], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on the Revision of Jurors and Voters Lists (Dublin County) Bill.

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Mr. J. LOWTHER rose to address the House, when—

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said: I rise to Order. The right hon. Gentleman has already spoken upon this subject.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, he had spoken on the subject, but it was four or five years ago; and he had yet to learn that he could not state his views on the matter now because he spoke on it in 1878 or 1879. He shared the prevailing ignorance in regard to the merits or demerits of this Bill. His recollection was that it was a very small and a very narrow Bill. He objected to it on the ground that it had not been introduced for the purpose of remedying any existing grievance, or placing the law on any reliable and comprehensive basis, but in order to secure a Party advantage in a particular constituency, and it was open to all the objections brought against measures introduced by Irish Members.

Mr. SEXTON: It is a Government Bill.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, the Bill to which he referred as having been opposed by himself several years ago was introduced by private Members, though it now appeared to have passed into official hands, and under these new auspices had never been even explained to the House. The Bill, he observed, proposed to create a new Office, and this Office was to be given to the inevitable barrister of 10 years' standing.

Mr. HEALY: Go on; you have only three minutes to do it.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, he hoped they would have an explanation of the Bill from the Chief Secretary.

MR. ION HAMILTON said, he was surprised that the Chief Secretary did not give the House an explanation of this Bill. If it was intended to be a censure on the Recorder of Dublin the right hon. Gentleman ought to say so.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

IRELAND—CONVENT NATIONAL SCHOOLS (REMUNERATION OF TEACHERS).

RESOLUTION.

MR. BIGGAR, in rising to call the attention of the Government to the scale of remuneration allowed by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland to the teachers of Convent National Schools in that country; and to move—

said, this case was only another illustration of the unfortunate position in which they were placed in Ireland by being governed by those Gentlemen who did not understand, and who in some instances, indeed, did not wish to understand, the peculiar characteristics and requirements of the country. The Gentlemen sent over from England, Lord Lieutenants and Chief Secretaries for Ireland, seemed to think that the system of education which suited England should also suit remarkably well for Ireland, and because they were not satisfied with their condition they were told they were very unreasonable people. The position and ideas of the two peoples were exceedingly different, and some gentlemen seemed to forget that matters which might be of very small weight in England were to Ireland often of very grave importance. The nuns had not up to the present, so far as he was aware, had anyone of influence to endeavour to obtain a removal of the grievances under which they laboured, and it was merely by accident he had learned the state of affairs. Their case was different to that of the National School teachers, who had also grievances to complain of, but which certainly were not greater than those of the nuns. They had ably stated their grievances, and had got the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) to use his influence with the Government on their behalf. The nuns had, however, no one to advocate their claims until the matter came to the knowledge of some of the Irish Members, when the Irish Party thought it desirable that their case should be brought before the attention of the House, in order to see if the Government would not afford them some redress. They did not ask any special favour, but only that the nuns should get fair play. It seemed to him from the short investigation he had made that a plainer case could not be imagined. The nuns got a very much smaller amount of remuneration for the same amount of work than the National teachers. He could not understand why these ladies should not get the same remuneration as that of National teachers. The excuse made by the Government was that these ladies did not get classed as teachers, because they did not pass the examinations. He had no great opinion of competitive examinations, his own experience being that, as regards practical work, those who passed them successfully were often of very little use; but there were excellent reasons why these ladies should not undergo that test. In the first place, the Bishops had passed a Resolution forbidding them to do so; the Rules of their Order in other cases precluded them; and when they did not, the teaching of children formed a small portion only of their duties; so that if a certain number of ladies passed from any convent, they could not devote themselves wholly to teaching, but would have to share it with the remainder of the nuns. The result of their teaching was very successful—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. BIGGAR, resuming, said, the case of these ladies was a hard one. Whilst the nuns were only allowed 4s. for each pupil whom they taught, teachers in other schools were allowed 16s. 8d., or four times as much. This was a glaring, gross, and monstrous injustice. He must also complain of the inadequate capitation grant allowed to the nuns. In the other schools where there were 40 pupils the teacher received £24 10s. per annum in the second class schools, between which and the £8 received by the nuns there was a large difference. The outside teachers were allowed £25 for the annual rent of each school, and £125 for the building of a teacher's residence; but the nuns were granted no part of these advantages. Further, they got no pension whatever, whereas in the other schools the teachers received a substantial pension when disabled by age or illness from their duties. The Reports of the different Inspectors in different parts of the country were exceedingly favourable to the convent schools. Looking at the number of passes, the Reports showed a considerable percentage to the advantage of the convent schools as compared with the others. As regarded monitors, the convent schools were placed at a considerable disadvantage as compared with the National Schools, because while the monitors from the latter were educated at the training school in Dublin for their examination, owing to Catholic rules those from the nuns' schools had to go to it directly from those schools. But in spite of this the Reports showed a superiority on the part of the convent schools even as regarded the monitors. He thought that he had made out so clear a case on behalf of these convent schools that he could not see how the Government could refuse to adopt his Motion. At present the nun's schools were the best schools in Ireland; but, at the same time, they were the worst paid. Whether such a state of matters was to continue for any length of time he could not say; but he knew that if not remedied now it would be discussed again, and he was convinced the result must be, at no distant date, that the nuns would get all they asked. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Mr. HEALY, in seconding the Motion, congratulated the hon. Member for Cavan on his great moderation, and the admirable array of statistics which he had presented to the House. He expressed the hope that the Chief Secretary, who had been obliged to rub against so many corners in the case of Ireland, would now find some means to apply balm to the feelings of the people of Ireland on a matter which deserved so much consideration at the hands of the Government. The great interest felt in this subject was shown by the large attendance of Irish Members; and he could imagine no argument which the Government could oppose to the Motion except the mere argument of non-presentation for examination. After all, that was not so great an obstacle as it might at first sight appear. The main object of examination of the teachers was to insure that the pupils should be properly taught; but if by another piece of machinery it was proved that the pupils were so taught as they had it proved by the exceedingly favourable results which statistics showed the nuns obtained, what, then, was the necessity of insisting upon examination in the case of the convent schools? It had been properly pointed out that the object of the institution of the religious orders was not in the first instance that of teaching; but, owing to the secular system of education which the Government imposed years ago upon the Irish people, it was seen fit in the wisdom of the directors of these religious Bodies to take up the subject of education, and having taken it up and succeeded in the remarkable way that they had done, the Irish people had a fit and proper case to ask this House to grant some better remuneration than hitherto. It was simply absurd that while the schools taught by nuns produced 8 or 10 per cent better results than the ordinary National schools, the nuns were paid only £8 as against £34 10s. to the National teachers. The nuns produced 10 per cent better results, and they got 300 per cent less salary. That was a glaring anomaly, which should at once commend itself for correction to the minds of Her Majesty's Government. He did not desire to decry the National school teaching of Ireland, for everybody must feel gratification at the way in which the National teachers had done their duty, when they considered the small salaries which even these teachers received, and the bad way in which they were housed, and the poor system of education which they received in their training schools; but, at the same time, the House must consider the great fact that the nuns gave something else to the country besides mere secular education. While agrarian crime in Ireland in the last few years had achieved an unfortunate pre-eminence, yet, if they turned to the statistics of morality, and went into America, and even in England, and examined the percentages amongst the Catholics of illegitimacy, or any unfortunate statistics of that nature, they would find there was a bright page in the records of the female Celtic population of Ireland. It had been shown over and over again that as regarded the percentages in which morality was concerned the Irish had a remarkably bright pre-eminence; and he had no doubt it was owing to the teaching received in the convent schools. Fortunately the day had long passed when Motions were made in that House with regard to the inspection of conventual institutions in Ireland; and he was glad to have heard last year from the hon. and much-respected Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that he had laid aside the prejudices, at least so far as their outward expression was concerned, which in former times he had been imbued with in regard to these institutions. He (Mr. Healy) noted that to show the advance of liberality which the House had made; and therefore the Chief Secretary would seek in vain—

MR. NEWDEGATE: You misrepresent me. I never repented of what I had done.

MR. HEALY said, he should be sorry to impute any repentance to the hon. Gentleman. He merely stated that, in deference to feelings expressed on the Irish Benches, the hon. Gentleman had withdrawn the Motions which had previously been annuals in his hands. The Chief Secretary could not now appeal to any prejudice with regard to conventual institutions. They noticed there to-night hon. Gentlemen like the hon. Member for Fermanagh (Mr. Archdale), Protestants, and others, coming to assist in making a house for the nuns of Ireland, also some Scotch Members assisting in that course that showed a desire for fair play and justice. Even in foreign countries—he had known it to be the case in Belgium—the Freethinking fathers of girls sent their daughters to convent schools to receive their education. In some instances in Ireland he had known Protestants so imbued with a consciousness of their superior moral and religious instruction, and knowing that no dogmatic teaching was to be intruded, that they sent their daughters to the Catholic schools. He trusted the Chief Secretary would not attempt to pay the nuns off with antique compliment, but that they should have something solid in his statement. In every way, except that of non-presentation for examinations, the nuns had a complete case, and there were sufficient reasons why the nuns should not present themselves for examination. They should bear in mind the large sums which the nuns had saved with regard to school endowments. All the convent schools of the nuns had been built at the expense of the Catholic parishioners; whereas in 80 cases, or even 90 out of 100, the local National Schools were built at the expense of the State. The State was not charged a penny for the erection of the nuns' schools, or for the training of their monitors or teachers. When they remembered that fact, and also that the nuns turned out 5 to 10 per cent better results than any other schools in Ireland, saving alone the model schools, it would be the merest technicality if the Chief Secretary should rest himself upon the non-presentation for examination. He hoped those religious ladies would be enabled to carry on with still further vigour and efficiency that teaching which had done so much for the moral life of the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. MELDON said, the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was entitled to the thanks of his countrymen for having brought forward one of the greatest unredressed grievances in Ireland. What was the reason given for its not having been redressed long ago? The only answer given was that the teachers in the schools of the religious orders did not present themselves for examination, and were, therefore, deprived of every chance of remuneration in the way of salary. But was there any reason in this argument? The sole object of examining teachers was to secure that they should be thoroughly efficient. Therefore the only question to be discussed was whether the teachers of these schools had proved themselves to be efficient teachers. The last Report of the Commissioners on National Education showed that the convents continued to maintain their high character for usefulness and efficiency. Considering the higher education possessed by the nuns, he thought it was no wonder that Roman Catholics parents preferred those schools to others. There was a great deal of work done in those schools beside the mere communication of the elements of education. There was the moral training which the pupils received. He would like to refer to one or two figures in order to demonstrate that the efficiency of the teachers in the convent schools was beyond all doubt. The last Reports of the Commissioners respecting these schools were most favourable. There were 217 of these schools upon the roll of the National Board at the present time, and the number of scholars amounted to 105,453, while the average attendance was 52,424. The convent schools thus commanded an average attendance per school of 241. The House knew the great difficulty which existed in getting children to attend school, hence the clamour for compulsion; but the convent schools showed an average of 241, while the average attendance in the other schools was about 50. He found, further, that 20 per cent of all the girls in the entire country were educated in these schools, and that 95 per cent of the pupils qualified to be examined presented themselves, of whom 75·8 per cent passed. In the 208 convent schools, of the 46,366 scholars qualified to be presented for examination 100 per cent were actually presented, and 37,929, or nearly 82 per cent of those presented, passed. It was plain, therefore, that these schools were thoroughly efficient, and that the teachers brought about all that the most rigid examination of teachers could accomplish. The State paid, not because a teacher was examined, but for results, and it had been over and over again urged in that House that the State was willing to pay provided they got good value. It might be asked what value, and his reply was—"In the education of the children." If, as had been demonstrated, the highest results were obtained by teachers in these convent schools, why was nothing virtually being paid for the work so satisfactorily done? A similar school, where the attendance averaged 100, was entitled to a sum of £103 10s. for the expenses of the principal teacher, the assistant teacher, and the monitors; but a nuns' school, with better attendance and better results, was only entitled to capitation grants amounting to £47. In fact, while the position of National School teachers had been improving progressively since 1855, the position of convent school teachers had gradually become worse than it was at that date, for privileges which they then possessed had been taken from them.

MR. NEWDEGATE: It appears from the observations made by some hon. Members who have preceded me that they anticipate that I shall pursue a course dictated by prejudice with respect to the Motion now before the House, because it relates to schools connected with convents, and because the House of Commons thought fit to appoint a Committee to inquire into Monastic and Conventual Institutions existing in Great Britain on my Motion during the Session of 1870. That Committee reported in 1871. One of the principal objects I had in view in moving for that Committee was the establishment of a system for the inspection of convents similar to that which exists in most Continental countries. I have always been at a loss to understand why the Irish Roman Catholic Members of this House have always been so much narrower, and so much more exclusive in their views than are the Roman Catholics of the other nations of Europe. Why should hon. Members imagine that I was a party to doing them or their conventual establishments—nay, doing even the monastic establishments, which are illegal in this country—any injustice by having promoted inquiry by a Select Committee of this House in 1870? No legislative enactment ensued upon the Report of that Committee; but I am inclined to believe that it had a very useful operation as a warning. 1870 was a remarkable year at Rome; it was the year of the Papal Council, and the States of Europe from that date appear to have found it necessary to take action for the expulsion of the Jesuits, and for the control of some other monastic and conventual orders. Germany took action in 1872, Italy took action in 1873, Switzerland took action in 1874, Austria took action in 1876, and France took action in 1880. These conventual institutions, like the monastic institutions, are exaggeratedly Papal in their constitution, and it is to be presumed in their teaching. I do not wish to see Ireland more Papal than she is. I remember Mr. O'Connell as a Member of this House. Long since his death I became possessed of a laudatory History of the Jesuits, first published in America, and afterwards republished in Paris by M. Crétineau Joly. In this work it is declared that the late Mr. O'Connell was a pupil of the Jesuits, and that throughout his life he co-operated with the Jesuits in all matters relating to Ireland. I do not consider that Mr. O'Connell was a benefactor to Ireland, either as a promoter of her internal peace, or as an advocate for the unqualified repeal of the Corn Laws. Far be it from me to say anything disrespectful of the ladies who inhabit the Irish convents, and who find a natural and innocent gratification in the education of Irish children. The Committee of which I was a Member was limited in its inquiries to conventual and monastic institutions within Great Britain. I know nothing, therefore, directly with respect to Irish convents; but this I know—that a considerable number of the convents in Great Britain are wealthy. An Act was passed in 1860, with clauses enabling these convents to arrange their property. I therefore presume that some, at all events, of the Irish convents must have property. I remember that in 1874 the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) moved that the position of the Irish National School teachers ought to be improved. Again, in 1878, the hon. Member moved that means ought to be adopted for relieving the poverty of the Irish National School teachers; and I was quite prepared to vote in support of that hon. Member had he found it necessary to take a Division. I have, however, reason to believe that the convent teachers in Ireland suffer under no such poverty as the National School teachers endure. I hope, therefore, that since the convents all refuse even such qualified inspection as the examination of their school teachers might involve, the Irish Government will consider the necessities of the National School teachers, who are exclusively dependent on the Government before they increase the grants to the convent school teachers, who are comparatively well to do.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, that, however others might differ from the views the hon. Member who had just spoken had advanced, no one could doubt the perfect honesty and sincerity of purpose he always displayed. As to the question before the House, he thought the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had done good service in bringing it before the House, and that his criticisms had been characterized by very great moderation. He considered the question one of very great importance; and he (Mr. Russell) thought that the Government might, with good grace, and with every prospect of desirable results, yield to the proposal. The consensus of opinion in Ireland was to the effect that the convent schools did admirable work, and work of a higher degree of excellence than any other class of schools in Ireland. If there was an exception it was the model schools, which had cost the country a great deal of money. The results of the convent schools had, however, far exceeded those of the model schools. He did not know that the question need be argued as a matter of principle, as for a great many years past the State had on principle recognized it as its duty to advance the primary education of the people of Ireland, and had also recognized the claims made upon it to pay for work done in that direction. The simple claim which was made on the part of the religious teachers in these convent schools was that they should be paid for work which they did for the State upon the same terms of remuneration as the like work was paid for in other schools. As to the question of the superiority of the convent schools, Sir Patrick Keenan, the head of the Irish Education Department, had said in his evidence before the Powis Commission that, taking the different results averaging over a number of years, and taking the convent schools in one category and all other schools in the other, the convent schools showed greatly superior results. On the same occasion, that gentleman had pointed out that the convent schools also gave valuable education in industrial training. He (Mr. C. Russell) had received a letter from a Lady Superior of one of the convent schools, in which she stated that she received 14s. for teaching a pupil for four hours each day during 52 weeks in the year. She wondered what other teachers would do if they were only assisted to this extent. Of late years the result fees increased somewhat; but it had been no personal benefit to them. They devoted their school funds to the support of orphans and the relief of the poor visited in their homes. It would be the poor who would reap the benefit; they wished they could receive more orphans. Comparing the state of things as regarded the maximum results under the present Code of the National Board, they found that the nuns were paid less than one-fourth of the rate paid to secular teachers, and that, too, for equal, if not superior, tuition. These were examples, he thought, sufficiently glaring. But what were the reasons given for this state of things? They were that, according to the 57th Rule of the Board of National Education, the teachers who were non-certificated were treated differently in point of payment from those who were certificated; and as certification followed upon examination, and the nuns did not submit to examination, they were not certificated. How was this? Practically speaking, it was enough to say that the Bishops in the Synod held at Maynooth some years ago—for reasons which, no doubt, were sufficient in their judgment—came to the conclusion that the ladies in these convents ought not to submit to allow themselves for examination. In the case of many of those teaching and religious communities the members belonged to orders known as “inclosed orders,” by whose rules they were not supposed to go outside the establishments to which they belonged except for special reasons. Therefore, the Bishops had thought it right that none of these should submit themselves to classification. But when, in 1871, the State recognized a more important and valuable test—namely, the test of results, and payment by results—the fact of non-certification ceased to have any force as a reason for reduced payment to the non-certificated teachers. But, in fact, examination could not determine the existence of some of the most essential qualifications in a teacher. It seemed to him that the most important qualification of the teacher was his or her ability to impart to others the information which he or she possessed. More than that, the exercise of powers of self-control, the power of governing others, and the power of influencing others were properties which could never be accurately tested by an examination. But these might be carefully gauged by results, and in the case of the convent schools the Reports frankly avowed over and over again the marked superiority of the religious teachers. The influence of the convent teachers upon their pupils did not end with their convent pupil life. It followed the pupils through their after life. He thought he had shown some reasons why the injustice in the existing state of things should be remedied, and also that no adequate reason had been adduced to justify its continuance. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would see its way, either by increasing the capitation grant or by increasing the payment by results, to equalize the payment of the convent and secular teachers.

MR. J. E. REDMOND said, the Government was to be congratulated on the fact that the attempt made at an earlier hour of the debate to count the House had failed, because if a count had taken place on this subject, it could not but reflect grave discredit upon the Government, whose duty it was to keep a House for the purpose of discussing a grievance of this character. That debate was a very remarkable one; for every Member who had spoken agreed that the convent schools of Ireland were labouring under a grave disability. There was one exception, an exception that was to be expected by everyone acquainted with the proceedings and the history of the hon. Member (Mr. Newdegate); but even he admitted that his conscience was satisfied. His Committee, of which he was so proud, had quieted his soul; but he said the Committee of Inspection proved that the English convents were wealthy, and from that he drew the extraordinary inference that the convents of Ireland were wealthy also. Well, even admitting that they were wealthy, which they were not, was that any reason why they should not be paid for doing the work for the doing of which others were paid? The hon. Member (Mr. Newdegate) asked how he would support a Committee of Inspection? Was the hon. Member so ignorant or so inattentive to that debate as not to know that these schools were at present inspected by a Government Inspector? In 1831, when the National system was established, teachers were paid £10 per cent on the number of pupils on the roll. In 1855 that was changed, and it was £20 per cent. But what was given by one hand was taken away by another; for it was made £20 per cent on the average attendance instead of on the number on the roll, which was found to be about one-half. He did not see why the convent teachers should be classified, when in 1871 the Government admitted the principle of payment by results. The Government could meet this difficulty in many ways. They could give the full amount of the salaries to the convent teachers whose schools were above a certain standard, and cease to pay it when the schools fell below that standard. He hoped the Chief Secretary, for the first time during his holding of Office, and not, he hoped, for the only time, would remove this crying grievance, which was felt by a large portion of the Irish people. England still owed something to Irish Catholic education, and the time had been when they were taunted with their ignorance, which had been owing to the fact that the means of education had been denied the people. He believed that if the grievance which they were now calling attention to were not removed, the people would regard the treatment of the nuns as a sort of remaining shred of the penal spirit which forbade education to Catholic Ireland. If the Government did not concede the just claims of the convent teachers, it would be impossible to remove from the minds of the great bulk of the Irish people the suspicion that the penal times were not dead yet in that House. If this concession was not granted, the Government would be undoubtedly curtailing the means at the disposal of the great mass of the Irish people of obtaining a sound education for their children. It was the duty of the Government to afford them every possibility of advancing Irish education amongst the lower classes of the Irish people. They often heard the aspirations and hopes expressed by Members of that House that the Irish people would become less violent and more peaceable, and look with greater hope and confidence to that House. Well, if ever the Irish people looked with confidence to an English Administration—he confessed he never would—that day would never come while they met refusals to requests of this kind. He thought it was an insult to these ladies who did the noblest work that could be done by mortal hands or brains in educating the children of the poor of Ireland to ask them to come out of their cloisters to submit to an examination side by side with, perhaps, pupils from their own convent schools, in a public room conducted by examiners chosen haphazard. There were 200 convent schools in Ireland, towards the erection of which the Government had not contributed a farthing, so that from this cause alone they had saved from £300,000 to £400,000 to the State. He thought, therefore, under all these circumstances, they would be met with no plausible refusals, but that the Government would take a just and generous view of the question.

MR. M'COAN said, he thought the advocacy of this cause should not be left entirely to the Catholic Members. As a Protestant, he endorsed all that had fallen from hon. Members as to the services these ladies rendered to education in Ireland. These ladies were of the highest moral character, and had received a much higher scholastic training than the teachers in the National Schools. He held a memorandum in his hand, drawn up, he understood, by Professor Kavanagh, from official sources; and the result left on his mind after perusing it was that the justness of their demand was indisputable. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) had placed before the House the cardinal point—results; and it was too late in the day for the Government to insist on any rigid rule of examinations. It was his (Mr. M'Coan's) conviction that higher moral tone and discipline was given to the pupils attending the convent schools than to those of any other.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he wished to bear testimony to the intense interest taken throughout the county he represented in the claims of the nuns to fair remuneration for their valuable services. The rules with reference to examination stood in the way of an admitted grievance, and there could be no good reason for insisting upon rigidly enforcing them. The nuns were bound to obey the Church to which they belonged, and that Church forbade them to submit themselves to these examinations. At the same time, the feeling in Ireland was unanimous in favour of the concession of their claims. It was admitted that the results shown by their teaching were most satisfactory; and there could be no reason why the opinion of a few Commissioners in Dublin should be permitted to outweigh the unanimous wish of the country. The present proposal was made without opposition from any section of the Irish Members. It was a matter of right, and he could not conceive the Government longer refusing to do the justice demanded.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he did not wish to protract the debate; but he desired to point out that there were some minor considerations in favour of the proposal which had not yet been brought to the notice of the House. One of these was the rule of these establishments which precluded them from taking any fees from the parents of the children. This was a source of emolument to the National teachers, and he thought that it was another reason why State aid should not be denied them. It should also be borne in mind that the nuns were precluded from making any appointment of monitors or work mistresses from their own community, and thus a source of income was lost to them. It was clear that the miserable stipends offered to the convents were no remuneration whatever for the services they gave to the State. The grievance brought forward by the Motion was one not of a particular section, but of the whole people of Ireland. The nuns devoted their lives to the poorer classes of Ireland, and their desire was not that their convents should be enriched, but simply that the scope of their labours should be extended, and that the duties to which they gave their lives might be productive in good results. The only difficulty in the way of recognizing the claims of the convent schools seemed to be the question of the examination; but he thought that that was an artificial difficulty which could be easily removed. Even in the case of the ordinary National teacher his examination was not the chief element in fixing the salary. No matter how satisfactory might be his examination from a literary point of view, unless his school was in a certain state of efficiency he did not get the class for which he might have passed. This itself was a proof that even the Board of Education did not look to his examination as the proper test of the value of the services which a teacher might give to the State. After all, the state of efficiency in a school was to every reasonable man the proper test of the value of the teaching; and it did not follow that those teachers who passed the best examination necessarily kept their schools in the highest state of efficiency. Both as regarded the regularity of attendance and the proficiency of the pupils, the convent schools stood far above the National. It was only fair to the National School teachers to say that this was owing to the fact of the communities of the convents having a larger staff in the working of their schools. That, however, did not at all diminish the claim of the nuns to proper remuneration from the State. The difficulty of examination was one which might be easily disposed of; and in disposing of it in a satisfactory manner, so as to remove the soreness felt on this question in Ireland, the Chief Secretary would find himself in collision with no class in Ireland. The unanimity exhibited in the House to-night went to prove that on this question the whole Irish people were practically agreed.

MR. FINDLATER said, he rose, as an Irish Protestant Member, to give his hearty support to the Motion of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). When the National School system was founded in 1831, the Commissioners, at one of their earliest meetings, consulted the Irish Government as to the propriety of giving aid to Monastic and Convent Schools, and the proposal was warmly supported, approved, and acted upon. Up to 1837, the original scheme proposed, which was the grant of gratuities of £8 or £10 to each school for every 100 pupils on the roll, was carried out as regarded all schools, whether convent, monastic, or secular; but in that year a change was made, and permanent salaries founded on classification were first introduced. These salaries, small at first, had been increased from time to time until they now stood thus:—Masters, first class, £70, £60, and £53, according to grades; second class, £46 and £44; and third class, £35. Mistresses, first class, £58, £50, and £43; second class, £37 and £34 10s.; and third class, £27 10s. These schools conducted by the religious communities being opposed to the principle of individual examination of their mistresses, and to class certificates, the original capitation allowance made to them of £10 for every 100 pupils on the roll was changed in 1855 to £20 for every £100 pupils in average daily attendance. This was substantially the same, as the former was nearly double the latter, so that the religious schools were now exactly in the same position they were in 30 years ago. In 1871 the scheme of payment by results was introduced, under which the teachers of secular schools derived two-thirds of their State aid from personal salaries, and one-third from results; while the religious schools, which were subject to the same test, obtained a very much smaller proportion of aid through the miserable capitation grant of £20 for every 100 pupils in average daily attendance. There could be no doubt that results were the best of all tests of the efficiency of the teachers; and, judging the religious schools by this standard, they stood in an excellent position. He quoted figures to show how well the convent schools did their work both from a literary and industrial point of view. In fact, these schools were in the van in the matter of industrial education. Furthermore, their teachers were trained at their own expense, and while the secular teachers received pensions from the State, the nuns sought no pensions, and never had. Why, then, when the cost to the State was so much less in many respects, had not the State been more liberal to those who had done and were doing such excellent work? He would, no doubt, be told that if the nuns chose to undergo the examination necessary for classification they would be entitled to the benefits of the recent increase granted to classified teachers; but he presumed that they were precluded by the Ordinances of their Church from submitting to such an examination. He would ask why should not a feeling such as this be respected, and justice done to these schools by an increase of the capitation grant, which in the case of the religious schools had the same relation as the salary of the lay teachers? The nuns had shown unmistakably that they both possessed the knowledge and the power of imparting it by the results which their pupils had attained. Why, then, should there be such a disparity in rewarding services in all respects similar? He was afraid that the answer must be that the nuns had either no Parliamentary influence, or they did not make effectual use of it. He had great pleasure in supporting the Resolution.

MR. P. MARTIN said, it appeared to him that the hon. Gentleman who had brought forward this question had proved to demonstration the justice of the claim now made. That claim might be summarized in a few words. It had been admitted that the teachers of these schools were competent and proper teachers. Their schools were under Government supervision and inspection; and the ladies, as was shown by the Reports of gentlemen appointed by the Government, produced the very highest and most excellent results. The Inspectors admitted the superiority of the nuns' teaching over that of the ordinary National Schools as well as of the model schools. It was, therefore, reasonable, looking to the educational results produced, to ask that these convent schools should have the amount of grant increased. Every class teacher under the State, both in England and Ireland, had within the last few years demanded and received fitting recognition for their labours in augmented salaries and a right to pensions. But though each year the Inspectors under the National Board testified to the excellence of the educational work performed by the teachers in the convent schools, yet these teachers had been treated with shameful neglect by the Government. Indeed, instead of augmented aid, they had suffered diminution, because the building grants which they were formerly allowed in aid of schools had been of late withdrawn. He hoped that the Chief Secretary would give a favourable answer to this Motion. As far back as 1878 the National Board in Ireland felt so convinced of the justice of the claim of the nuns in respect of this matter that they recommended they should get a large increase. The Chief Secretary would find from documents in his possession that the recommendation was made alike by Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Catholic Members of the Board; and he must say, in justice to the late Conservative Chief Secretary for Ireland, that after his attention had been directed to the matter by means of Questions, he showed a desire to meet the demand then made in a fair and equitable way. This was shortly before the right hon. Gentleman left Office; and he believed that if the Conservative Government had remained in power the convent teachers would not now be waiting in vain to have their just claims redressed at the hands of the House.

MR. TREVELYAN: I may say, at the outset of the remarks I have to make, that the Resolution in the shape in which the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) has moved it, is one which it would be impossible for the Government, and perhaps impossible for the House, or any part of the House, to adopt. It is a very difficult Resolution. There are, no doubt, some words in the Resolution which the hon. Member has moved which justified the remarks which have been made by hon. Members who have followed him, all of whom have spoken in strict accordance with the spirit of the Resolution; but I can hardly think that the hon. Member for Cavan would wish the House to set the seal of its approbation on the opinion that—

“It is just and expedient that the teachers of Convent National Schools in Ireland be dealt with, as to remuneration, on equal terms with those applied to other teachers of Primary Schools in connection with the system of Irish National Education.”

The rules of the Commissioners of the National Education in Ireland on this point are absolute; and, so far from being the worst treated, as far as the rules can define that treatment, teachers of the National Schools are better treated than any other teachers in Ireland. Rule 57, which is the cardinal rule in this case, was quoted by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), and quoted quite correctly. The amount of salaries in the Convent National Schools is exactly the same as that allotted to teachers of other schools, if they were only willing to adopt the principle of classification, and submit themselves to classification. [“Oh, oh!”] I am not trying to bewilder hon. Gentlemen, but I am simply speaking to the terms of the Resolution; and if those schools object to that principle, and are unwilling to submit themselves to examination, then they are not left as other teachers would be, to what they can get by result fees, but they are allowed to take a capitation grant of 4s. for the number of children educated. Therefore, if the Resolution of the hon. Member for Cavan were carried exactly as it stands on the Paper, I conclude that the only result would be that the teachers would be deprived of that privilege of being able to get the capitation fee, where, in a great number of cases, they refuse to subject themselves to examination. I gather from the speech of the hon. Member for Cavan, and those of other hon. Members, that they do not suggest to the Government any cut-and-dried or any unelastic principle, and that their object in the debate to-night is to impress upon the minds of the country and the Government that teachers in convent schools are under disadvantages which ought not to exist. Now, it is important to consider what those disadvantages are. I must say that, in some respects, hon. Members have only stated one-half of the case to-day. The hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. J. E. Redmond), putting the case in somewhat more animated language than it was put by other hon. Members, but still speaking in exact accordance with their views, said it was a remnant of the old penal statute, forbidding the teaching of Irish children by Catholics, or words to that effect. Now, the grievance under which the Catholic convent children are labouring is one that is peculiar to Ireland; and, so far from the assertion of the hon. Member being correct, Ireland is the only country in Europe where nuns are permitted to teach in a public school, and to obtain any State aid for their teaching without submitting to the examinations demanded from other teachers. I will not enlarge upon that statement. It is sufficiently strong in itself to refute, and refute absolutely, the idea that, in this case, there is any special disadvantage placed upon Ireland. It is difficult to argue this as a question of principle, when we are arguing it with reference to such a Church as the Roman Catholic Church—a Church which I conclude does not know any difference in right or wrong in different countries. In England, all the teachers of the Roman Catholic denomination are included, so far as the statistics of the Education Department are concerned, in the general body of certificated and assistant teachers. There were, and no doubt are, some convent schools in England which refuse to submit to the examinations demanded by the Department; but the teachers in those schools have, at the same time, to submit to the disadvantage which that refusal brings with it, and they do not share in any respect in any of the advantages which the certificated teachers receive. Ireland is the only part of the United Kingdom, and the only country in Europe, in which members of religious Bodies, whether male or female, are allowed to share in any of the advantages of public subsidies, unless they submit themselves, in the first instance, to a public examination. And now in regard to this question of undergoing a State examination. I think some words have been used which convey an inaccurate meaning to the House. We have heard of these ladies being obliged to come out from their cloisters, or of their being obliged to expose themselves to the indiscriminate contact of a public examination; but it must be remembered that these examinations are written examinations only. There is no oral examination whatever, so these ladies are perfectly free from the embarrassment which might attend a visd voce examination at a distance from their own establishment. Nor is it the case that the objection to undergo these examinations is universal among these ladies, and among the members of religious houses of the other sex in Ireland. There are, if I recollect right, 224 schools attached to convents and monasteries. Of these, 20 schools have submitted to a system of examination and classification; and of these 20 schools the nuns receive as much payment as if they were lay-trained teachers. In fact, they receive more; because there is one point in which I can most heartily agree with every hon. Member who has spoken on the subject; and that is that, in regard to these payments, which depend upon the efficiency of the teaching, the amount of money earned by the convent schools is very much in excess of that earned by any other schools, although it falls short, at the same time, of that which is earned by the smaller number of model schools.

MR. SEXTON: Have any teachers been qualified in these schools since 1875?

MR. TREVELYAN: I conclude that that is so; but I am unwilling to speak positively. From information I have received, I believe it is the case; but I cannot say positively whether the members of these religious Bodies have been qualified or not. They certainly were between 1873 and 1875.

MR. HARRINGTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman refer to any case?

MR. TREVELYAN: I can only say that it is not a question of any particular diocese, but that these certificated teachers connected with the convent schools are scattered throughout 10 of the Roman Catholic dioceses of Ireland. The hon. Member for Cavan, when he introduced this question, referred to what he considered to be an unfair distinction which the Government drew between the teachers of convent schools and the teachers of the lay schools with regard to the amount of the capitation grant. The hon. Member said the teachers of convent schools were rigidly confined to 4s. per head for the children; whereas in lay schools, where the capitation grant was given, that capitation grant was as high as 16s. 8d. per head. The hon. Member spoke quite correctly; but he did not apprehend the circumstances under which this grant is made to the lay schools. There is a rule that, in schools in which the children in average attendance are under 30, the teacher shall not be allowed to obtain a grant certificate; and, under those circumstances, in order to provide that these small schools are not stinted in regard to public money, a capitation grant is given to the amount of 16s. 8d.; but that capitation grant is given only in the special case of a small school, which, otherwise, could not be maintained at all. It is given as a pis aller; because there are no other means of seeing that such schools are properly endowed with proper money. But in the case of the convent schools taught by the nuns, the number of children are large, and there is no cause that they should come under the same head as these small schools, where it is necessary to name a certain sum of capitation grant in order that they may get a share of the public funds at all. The hon. Member likewise spoke of the disadvantage under which the nuns stand in regard to monitors. I did not take down his words at the time; but they amount to this—that they did not get sufficient pay for their monitors. Now, I cannot say that is a fair or a just statement according to the views of the Education Commissioners. In addition to the capitation payments, and the result payments in the convent schools, they receive a sum of about £10,630 a-year in payment of their monitorial staff, and also premiums for instructing those monitors, which places them on equal terms with the lay teachers. In that respect, again, they are better treated than similar schools in England, because the same class of teachers in England who receive capitation grants are teachers who were permitted, during a very short period after the passing of the Education Act, to be paid by capitation grants, because the demand for teachers was so great in England at that time that they were unable to get a sufficient number of certificated teachers. But capitation grants under these circumstances were made during a very limited period, and there was an express stipulation that no teacher paid by capitation grant and who was not a certificated teacher should be qualified to have a pupil teacher under him or her. In the case of these ladies the Education Department showed that amount of confidence in them that it allowed them to teach and have the care of monitors, while it paid those monitors by exactly the same rate at which monitors under certificated teachers were paid. Under those circumstances, I think it must be evident to the House that there are two sides to this question, and that hon. Members have dwelt far too much on the one side, while they have neglected the other; but I do not, at the same time, say that there is not another side. I think that the principle from which the Government cannot possibly depart is the principle that as an element in the efficiency of the schools it is very important to have a Government test in regard to the efficiency of the teachers. One hon. Member says that the teaching of the children is the other work that the nuns have to do, and that they have other things of greater importance to occupy themselves in, and that it would be very hard to call upon them to present themselves for public examination. Not in their capacity of sisters of a religious Body, but in their capacity of teachers, in which they are distinctly public servants, we have a right to call on them to subject themselves to the conditions to which other public servants are subjected. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that they cannot depart from this principle. In every possible way we must encourage the teachers of the public schools to present themselves at these examinations in order to test their efficiency as teachers. The Government certainly cannot act as far as the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Gentlemen who have spoken this evening would be prepared to go, in placing these ladies who have not passed an examination on exactly the same level as the lay teachers who have passed an examination. On the other hand, there is a great deal of truth in what has been stated by several hon. Members that what the House has to look to is the results, and that if it can be satisfied that it gets a very good article, it should pay the money which that article is worth. The Irish Government have for some time past had this question under their consideration. I regret that these convent schools, or, indeed, that any schools, should have been dealt with under the principle of bold and downright capitation. It seems to me that is dealing with human heads in the school in almost the same manner in which you deal with cattle in the market. It is a principle which, in my opinion, is an exceedingly false one. I have been sorry to hear it started, and I certainly shall not, as far as I am concerned, carry it any further; but I must say I think it is worth while to see whether there is not some middle course. I think, as I have said already, that the Government would not be justified in placing these members of religious Bodies in exactly the same position pecuniarily as the lay teachers who possess certificates, and I see an argument against it in the extremely eloquent speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). As far as I can follow the passage of his speech to which I refer, he appealed to us on the ground of the very great extent to which these ladies involved themselves by the charitable works in which they engaged. Now, it is no part of the business of the Government to help these ladies in their charitable works. The Government fully admire their zeal in that respect, and warmly appreciate the sacrifice they make in the work of education; but it is no part of the duty of the Government to provide them with money for that purpose. It is one of the conditions of their life that they are able to give some of their spare time to the teaching of the children; and I think for that reason, among others, that they can hardly complain, if they do not find themselves, they having as it were abandoned the world, in exactly as good a position as teachers who have taken up professional teaching in order to live by it. They cannot expect to be paid exactly as if they were in the open market competing with teachers, who are compelled to live by their teaching, and to make a profession of it for their wives and families. For these reasons, the Government still wish to give great encouragement to these ladies as to other teachers to submit themselves to Government examinations, in the belief that, as time goes on, the feeling against submitting to these public examinations will die out. The Government, therefore, intend to keep up, whatever else they may do, the distinct difference between lay teachers and the teachers in the Convent schools; but, at the same time, the Government are considering, with an earnest desire to come to some satisfactory solution of the question, whether some means may not be found, dependent upon the efficiency of these Convent schools, to enable the grants from the Exchequer to approach somewhat nearer than they do at present to the desires of these Convent schools.

MR. DAWSON said, he had to complain that while the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland admitted, as a universal proposition, the efficiency of the teaching in the Convent schools, he refused to the nuns the remuneration given to the lay teachers who failed to produce the same excellent results. Now, what was the whole business of education? He was glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Education and some other Ministers, although it was past midnight, entering the House for the first time to take their places on the Treasury Bench and listen to the discussion. Only a few minutes ago the Treasury Bench had been entirely denuded of all the responsible Ministers of the Crown. The Committee of Education, of which he (Mr. Dawson) was a Member, was now sitting; and although, from private reasons, he had not been able to attend the sittings, he entertained deep sympathy with the object, and had carefully studied the reports of the proceedings. He repeated that the Chief Secretary had entirely admitted the whole of the case attempted to be made out by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) and those who supported him. Now, what was the aim and object of education? It was not to produce teachers, so much as to produce an educated people; and it was admitted that the nuns had pre-eminently distinguished themselves by the efficiency of their teaching. It mattered not how the results were attained, if the people were educated in a successful manner; and he regretted to see the Government turning round upon some quibble, and refusing to these ladies, who had produced such satisfactory results, the remuneration to which they were fairly entitled. The right hon. Gentleman said, in one breath, that the Government would make no distinction, and, in the very next, he proposed to make a very serious distinction. The right hon. Gentleman said the complaint of the hon. Member for Cavan was against the 57th rule. Now, the Irish Members found fault with no rules; but they found fault with the terms on which the Convent schools were paid, not only for the same, but for better results than those produced by the lay teachers. He (Mr. Dawson) thought that too much stress could not be laid upon that point. He was himself altogether in favour of a system that would secure that, when the State paid for education, the country should really get it; and he thought that the State ought to pay for it all the same, whether it was supplied by Convent schools, or in any other form, if the results were satisfactory. In this case, however, if there was any choice between the two, the results in the case of the Convent schools were better than the results in the case of the other schools. Where, then, was the consistency of the right hon. Gentleman or of the National Board of Education? It was not a question of principle, but a question of degree. The Government abandoned the principle when they gave a capitation grant. Why did they give a capitation grant at all? Why did they give £20, or £10, or any sum whatever? It was a salary, and why did they give it? In giving it, they at once abandoned the principle. They only gave it, however, to a small and restricted extent, and refused to extend it any further. There was no principle in such an argument. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or the Minister of Education, to stand up in that place and say why it was that they gave a capitation grant at all. On what ground did they give £10, and refuse to give £40? They ought to act upon some principle of logic, in order to show that they properly appreciated the question. There was another thing he wished to mention. Why did the hon. Gentleman the Member for New Ross (Mr. J. E. Redmond) assume that, if they cut down the nuns' well-earned fee, those ladies would gladly continue to give their services in the cause of education? There was no compulsory system of education in Ireland; that was, it was alleged that because compulsory education did not exist there, that the nuns were to be defrauded of their remuneration. He protested against the starving of the Convent schools. It was said that in England the school rate was supplemented largely by voluntary contributions, and that that was not the case in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman having granted the general proposition, as if he were trying to make the case still stronger, went on to quote the advantages afforded by the schools. The right hon. Gentleman had told the House that the Convent schools had a much larger number of children in proportion than the National Board schools. Did the right hon. Gentleman not know that that fact produced a saving to the Board of Education, and that more largely a school was attended the less expense was incurred in inspection and other respects? These Convent schools, therefore, gave advantages to the National Board, for which they ought to be recompensed. It had often been urged that it was the nuns alone in religious orders who carried out the work of education in Ireland, and he had not only seen it stated in the Press, but had read it in evidence, that the people of Ireland would not contribute anything to the work of education. He asserted, on the contrary, that a much larger proportionate amount was contributed voluntarily for educational purposes in Ireland than in rich England. It was a fact that the Convent schools of Ireland had been built at a cost of £400,000, and that altogether more than £1,000,000 had been contributed for educational purposes in that country during the last few months. Nevertheless, hon. Members opposite turned round flippantly, and said the Irish people did nothing. The nuns of Ireland sprung from the laity, and they expended their fortunes without remuneration in works of education and charity. All that was asked was that the Government should treat the Convent schools on the same principle as the National schools. They did not ask the Government to maintain them. The nuns maintained them themselves through the resources they obtained from the Irish people. Therefore, they had an unanswerable claim upon Her Majesty's Government to take their case into consideration, and to see that the country really got what they paid for. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to what was done in foreign countries; but he (Mr. Dawson) contended that no parallel could be drawn between the systems pursued abroad and in Ireland. In every other country education had been raised, whether lay or clerical, to a dignity and position which it did not occupy in Ireland. At present there were two systems pursued in Ireland, and he called upon the Government to abandon one of them, and retain the other. If they were to pay the nuns by results, let them be paid by results; and if they were to be paid by salary, then let them be paid by salary. Unless some such principle were adopted by the Government, it would be almost preferable to go back to the system by which education was made to depend upon the love of learning, without being undertaken for any kind of remuneration whatever. On the Treasury Bench education was rapidly becoming to be regarded as a mere mechanical and trade matter. The Government admitted the overwhelming efficiency of the Catholic schools, and because they were efficient, and had produced wonderful results, they ought not to be deprived of the fruit of their labour, while others were rewarded who had altogether failed to produce the same results.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he wished to say a word or two as to the two ways by which the Government sought, to a certain extent, to meet the question, without giving salaries, where a public examination had not been passed. One mode was suggested by the Commissioners of National Education in 1878. When £60,000 a-year was given towards the increase of national teachers, the Commissioners recommended that it should be given for results; and, if their advice had been followed, the Convents would have had a fair share of the Vote. But the Government of the day, no doubt, for sufficient reasons, elected to give the money in another way, the consequence of which was that the payment by result fees did not apply to the Convent schools. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, on referring to the Reports of the Commissioners on National Education, would be able to put his hand upon that scheme; and if he would adopt it now, or an alternative scheme submitted about the same time for a special scale of result fees to schools paid by capitation grants, a great deal of what the Irish Members had been asking for would be effected. There was another way in which considerable assistance might be given—namely, in regard to the question of building. There had been, as several hon. Members had observed, an enormous expenditure on the part of the Convents in the shape of building schools out of their own resources. If a system of building grants, or building loans, were introduced in reference to non-vested schools, the Convents would be able to take a share of it. At present, no assistance was given to building, except to schools which were vested in Trustees. As it was impossible for Convents to invest their schools in Trustees, they were, therefore, excluded from the building grants. He believed that, if building grants were given to non-vested schools, they would be largely resorted to by Convents, and, in addition, those Convents which had already private schools should be allowed to recoup the expenditure they had incurred by obtaining loans to pay off the debt upon such schools. He submitted these points to the consideration of the Government, because his right hon. Friend had frankly and completely admitted that there was a grievance. He certainly did not take the unfavourable view of his right hon. Friend's speech which the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) did; and he thought that a more liberal system of result fees and building grants would get over the difficulty.

MR. ARCHDALE said, that if grants of public money were given to Convent schools, they ought also to be given to the Church schools.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 71: Majority 27.—(Div. List, No. 67.)

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

MR. BIGGAR moved for a Return of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland showing the name and religious denomination of each Commissioner, the number of attendances at the ordinary and special meetings of the Board during the 12 months ended in March last, the dates of the ordinary and special meetings, the number of Commissioners present on each occasion, the number necessary to constitute a quorum, the names and addresses of Commissioners who had been paid personal expenses, the sum paid to each, and a copy of any minutes or regulations of the Board defining the conditions, duties, and powers of Sub-Committees.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, a Return of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, showing:—

- (1.) The name and religious denomination of each Commissioner;
- (2.) The number of attendances made by each at (a.) the ordinary and (b.) special meetings of the Board during the twelve months ended the 31st day of March 1884;
- (3.) The dates on which (a.) ordinary and (b.) special meetings were held, and the names of Commissioners present on each occasion;

(4.) The number necessary to constitute a quorum (if any), and the number of occasions (if any) on which the attendance of Commissioners fell short of this number;

(5.) The names and addresses of Commissioners (if any) who have been paid personal expenses, and the sum so paid to each;

"And, Copy of any Minutes or Regulations of the Board defining the constitution, duties, and powers of Sub-Committees." — (Mr. Biggar.)

MR. TREVELYAN said, that, in reply to the Motion of the hon. Member for Cavan, he was always unwilling to stand in the way of any desire for information upon any public question; but, with regard to this Return, he must own that he should be glad if the hon. Member would give some explanation of the use to which he proposed to put it, or the object for which he moved it. It was a Return of such a nature that he should be unwilling, under any circumstances, to grant, unless a decided public advantage could be shown for giving it.

MR. BIGGAR said, the reason he asked for the Return was that he desired to ascertain to what extent these public servants performed their duties. The first part of the Motion was of a merely formal nature. He believed that gentlemen who professed the Catholic religion were, in some cases, quite as unfavourable to the work of education as non-Catholics. He wanted also to know the attendance given by each of the Commissioners, so that there might be an opportunity of seeing who was responsible for the different matters of which complaint was made. As was very well known, many of the Commissioners lived in different parts of Ireland, and he wanted to ascertain whether the entire work devolved upon a very small number, or whether the whole generally attended the meetings. He thought the document he asked for was a very reasonable one, and that it was much wanted. If they found that certain gentlemen gave no attention at all to the work of the Commission, their names ought to be removed from the list of members, and their places supplied by others who would do the work. The question of National Education was a very important one, and one in regard to which questions were constantly arising that were of interest to the constituents whom the Irish Members represented. It was most desirable, therefore, that they should have the means of knowing who were responsible for the various matters which arose in connection with the work of education.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he saw a long list of questions included in the Motion, and he thought the answer of the hon. Member for Cavan had increased his difficulty in granting the Return. The hon. Member said he wished to see who were in constant attendance at Dublin, and who were not. It was quite obvious that upon a very large Board, chosen for the purpose of representing the whole of Ireland, all the members could not live in Dublin. It was very undesirable that they should do so; and the object of the hon. Member appeared to be to ascertain which of the members were not the ordinary attendants of the meetings of the Board. It was only to be presumed that among the members who were not ordinarily in attendance would be the great majority of members who lived away from Dublin at a very considerable distance, and who could only come up at very great inconvenience, but who reserved to themselves the right of coming up on any occasion when a great and important work of administration, carried out by the Board, had to be discussed. He could quite see that Irish Education might be very well managed by two or three paid Commissioners, all of them quartered in Dublin; but that was not the system on which it was managed, and he thought the present system was a better one. It was managed by a special representative Body selected from the whole of Ireland, and to pick out those who lived at a distance, and who could only attend on great occasions, and to hold them up in some sense to public reprobation would, he thought, be unfair. He would tell the hon. Member what would be the effect of granting this Return. The Return asked for the names and addresses of Commissioners, if any, who have been paid personal expenses, and the sum so paid to each. Now, who were those members who had their personal expenses paid to them? They were those members who lived at a distance from Dublin, who, when they came up, were paid their fares and their residential expenses during the period they were in Dublin; and those gentlemen would find themselves in the disagreeable predicament of being held up, on the one hand, as having attended much more seldom than those gentlemen who habitually resided in Dublin; and of having, on the other hand, received the public money, while those who were resident in Dublin had received none. Under those circumstances, he certainly could not agree to Sub-head 5 of the Return, because that was merely another form, and he thought an unpleasant form, of specifying the names of those gentlemen who lived at a distance from Dublin, and who obtained payment of their expenses, without any explanation of the circumstances which induced them to ask for an allowance. Nor could he agree to the religious denomination of each member being attached to the name of each Commissioner. Upon that point, he must enter an absolute protest on the part of the Government. To the best of his knowledge, during the time he had been connected with the Government, they had never given a Return of that nature. The utmost they had ever done was to give the aggregate number of members of each religious denomination in any special Body connected with the Public Service. He would not say that it had never been done by others; but, certainly, it had not been done in any Department with which he had been connected. He should be glad to give the names of the Commissioners, and the aggregate number of members of each religious denomination, but nothing further. Then, again, with regard to the number of attendances, he should be willing to give that, if the hon. Member would withdraw the Motion at the present moment, and allow him slightly to alter it, or if there was an understanding that a note might be subjoined, which should specify what members of the Board were habitually resident in Dublin, and what members lived at a distance from Dublin. If that were done, the objections he entertained to the Return would be substantially removed; and although the Commissioners of National Education would not, he thought, approve of the Return being given in any shape, because it was most unusual to ask for any Return of that sort, still if hon. Members opposite pressed it in the shape he had outlined, he would agree to give it.

MR. SEXTON said, he quite understood that the Commissioners of National Education would make a strong objection to this Return in its present shape, or, indeed, in any shape which human ingenuity could devise. The Commissioners of National Education, of all public Bodies in Ireland, were the most nervous in regard to the publicity of their transactions. He could, therefore, quite understand why the Government should be unwilling to give a Return which would supply any data to the House; but would they give the dates of the ordinary meetings, and the Commissioners present on each occasion? Would they give Sub-head 3?

MR. TRÉVELYAN said, he was quite willing to give the first four sub-heads of the Return and a copy of the Minutes, with the exception that, in the 1st sub-head, he could not attach the religious denominations of the Commissioners.

MR. SEXTON said, that, in that case, he should advise his hon. Friend (Mr. Biggar) to accept the Return in an amended shape; but he must express a hope that, whenever it was necessary for the House to have a Return, the unwillingness of the Department to give it and have criticism applied, would not be given as a reason for not granting the Return.

MR. HEALY suggested that the Return should be granted now as it stood, and that then the Speaker should amend it by leaving out "religious denomination" in line 1, and the whole of Sub-head 5. He thought that would meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He would move to leave out "religious denomination" in Sub-head 1.

Amendment proposed, in sub-head (1.) to leave out the words "and religious denomination."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and religious denomination' stand part of the Question."

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he could not understand this difficulty about the religious denomination. Why should the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland object to give the religious denomination of the Commissioners? He (Colonel King-Harman) did not suppose those Commissioners were ashamed of their religion, and he did not see why their religion should not be given in a public Return. As to the allegation that they kept their proceedings secret, he knew nothing about that; but he had invariably found them to be a body of men who were always perfectly willing to face the light of day, and he could not see why the right hon. Gentleman should object to giving this Return in every respect. It was ridiculous to object to give their religion, as if any gentleman in Ireland was ashamed of his religion, or as if there was anything wrong in their religion, or anything to be concealed. There was nothing of the kind, and he hoped, that if the Return was granted, it would be given in its entirety, or not at all.

MR. PLUNKET said, he could not agree altogether with what had fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel King-Harman). Not in the least did he suppose that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland were ashamed of their religion; but he objected altogether to granting a Return of this kind with regard to such a Body as had been assailed on the present occasion. The Commissioners of National Education in Ireland had had a long history, and in that long history they had not received very fair measure at the hands of, at one time, one Party in the State, and of another Party at another time. So far as his judgment went, they had done a great deal of most excellent work in Ireland, and that under great difficulties. They had been assailed at one time by persons who took an extremely strong view—the high Protestant view; and at another time they had been assailed by those who took a very strong and extreme Roman Catholic view; but through all this they had pursued their course with firmness and fairness and impartiality, and they had come out of all the scandalous accusations made against them very creditably. Everyone remembered the famous O'Keefe case, which came before this House on a good many occasions; and he thought that this Return was obviously intended for the purpose of founding attacks hereafter, and if the House granted it they would open the door to unpleasant controversies. The Education Question in Ireland was long the burning question of the day, and there had been debates in this House upon University Education, Intermediate Education, and Primary Education. The unfortunate circumstances connected with the case of Father O'Keefe were over and over again brought before the House, and no result whatever came of it, except a great deal of heart-burning on both sides of the House. Who brought that matter forward, and for what purpose? It was brought forward because accusations were made against the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland respecting their action in that case; but that was only part of the question, because Intermediate Education in Ireland at that time had hardly shown its head. University Education was taken up and fought out on the question of religious or denominational or united education. The Ministry were actually defeated, and their fall was ultimately brought about by their defeat over that question. The question of University Education in Ireland was fortunately set at rest by the late Ministry, at all events for some time, and the Royal University of Ireland was proceeding with a considerable amount of success. He was aware that there were some outside questions with regard to the Queen's Colleges; but he must say that the Motion for this Return, as far as he could see, could have no other purpose than to afford material for founding some kind of attack upon the Commissioners of National Education, and for re-opening the old controversies. As the Chief Secretary for Ireland had said, the Commissioners would not at all approve of this Return, but not because they had anything to conceal; and he greatly regretted that the Motion had been made.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) was interesting, as his speeches always were; but he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) could not see the relevancy of his observations to the question before the House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said there had been a great deal of progress in regard to education in Ireland, and in that he quite agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. There were only two points between himself and his hon. Friend (Mr. Biggar) and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan). He thought Sub-head 5 was certainly too inquisitorial, and he was glad that his hon. Friend had seen his way to omitting that portion of the Return. The second point of difference was with regard to the 1st sub-head. The hon.

and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), who certainly could not be supposed to be predisposed in favour of any Motion made by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), was actually more in agreement with his hon. Friend than the Chief Secretary for Ireland; and he wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the religion of every one of these Commissioners was notorious in Ireland. Whatever else might be known about a man in Ireland, his religious persuasion was known, and, consequently, the right hon. Gentleman would not be making any statement of anything that was not notorious in Ireland. He was sorry to see that the right hon. Gentleman had brought into this matter many ideas which were just in regard to England, but inappropriate in regard to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman was a friend of religious toleration, and thought, as he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) himself thought, that the absence of questions as to a man's religious persuasion in a public office was a necessary corollary to religious and political toleration. But the right hon. Gentleman knew that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland were selected not only for their fitness for the position, but also because of their religious persuasion. They were a Body consisting of the representatives of the different religious persuasions, as well as of every other interest in Ireland, and it was as members of certain religious persuasions that a number of them were entitled to hold the position of Education Commissioners. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman, in giving this portion of the Return, would not be stating anything which was not already notorious to the people of Ireland; but the object of the Return, he assumed, was to bring before the House in an official form the religious constitution of the Board. The Return obtained by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), giving, in an official form and with the sanction of the Government, the religious persuasion of the Irish magistrates, had done a great deal to enlighten public opinion on that question. If the right hon. Gentleman would give the religious persuasion only in the aggregate, he did not think his hon. Friend (Mr. Biggar) would meet him with any obstinate opposition; but, as religion in the aggregate meant the religion of the individuals, the right hon. Gentleman would simply be fighting a shadow, and he thought that if the hon. Member withdrew the whole of Sub-head 5, the right hon. Gentleman might agree to give the rest of the Return in its present form.

MR. DAWSON said, he could not help feeling, considering the position of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) with regard to educational matters in Ireland, to what a lamentable position he had fallen. This opposition was very much of the type of resistance which would be offered to light being thrown on University Education in Ireland, and on the vast resources and emoluments of the Board of Trinity College, Dublin, and the slight benefit that accrued to the nation which provided those emoluments, and placed at its disposal thousands of acres of Irish land.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that the objection of the Government to giving this Return was a most extraordinary objection. Why should the Return be refused on the ground the Government had advanced? If the Return, when granted, gave grounds for accusations, why should they not be made? If it afforded no such grounds, the accusations could not be made; but it was most extraordinary to refuse a Return, because, if the Return was granted, certain accusations might be founded upon it. Such an objection came with especially bad grace from hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House. What were hon. Gentlemen doing here, night after night, but seeking for information—trying to draw information from the Government, not on historical facts, or matters that could be embodied in a Return of this kind, but on telegrams only a few minutes old? They wanted information, and they were a most inquisitorial Party themselves; and if they refused information on so simple a matter as this relating to the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, why did they seek for all that information they looked for day after day and night after night? Was it not for the purpose of founding accusations? Yet the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland could coolly stand by and seriously urge the Government and the House not to give this information, because accusations might be founded upon it. Who were the accusing angels of the Government? They were the people who were in continual resistance to the Government; and the more grounds of accusation they could find in the newspapers, and from any other source, the better they were pleased; and yet other hon. Members were to be refused useful information because they might found accusations upon it. That objection was of no avail or weight whatever. If there was anything in the complaint it was only right that the Return should be granted, in order that that complaint might be substantiated. As to the religious objection, he agreed with what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman). Who was it that was ashamed to have his religion published in public Returns or in any other way? The Catholic members of the Commission were not—were the Protestant? If they were not, what, then, became of the objection raised against the Return? He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would reconsider his decision, and would give fuller information than that which he had promised this evening.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thoroughly fell in with the Amendment moved by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), to leave out the words "and religious denomination" from Sub-head (1). He did not place any substantial value on the words, and should be quite content to leave them out. He also fully agreed with the suggestion that Sub-head (5)— should be left out. Probably it would be a mean thing to make inquiries as to the travelling expenses of the Commissioners. They were fully entitled to those expenses, seeing that they got nothing for their services. If he had thought that any imputation would have been cast upon these gentlemen in consequence, he should not have put Sub-head (5) in the Return.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of Sub-head (1.) to add "and the aggregate number of each religious denomination in the Commission."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Sub-head (5.)—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question "That Sub-head (5.) stand part of the Question," put and negatived.

Sub-head omitted accordingly.

Ordered, That there be laid before this House "a Return of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, showing—

- (1.) The name of each Commissioner, and the aggregate number of each religious denomination in the Commission;
- (2.) The number of attendances made by each at (a.) the ordinary and (b.) special meetings of the Board during the twelve months ended the 31st day of March 1884;
- (3.) The dates on which (a.) ordinary and (b.) special meetings were held, and the names of Commissioners present on each occasion;
- (4.) The number necessary to constitute a quorum (if any), and the number of occasions (if any) on which the attendance of Commissioners fell short of this number;"

"And, Copy of any Minutes or Regulations of the Board defining the constitution, duties, and powers of Sub-Committees."—(Mr. Biggar.)

PRIMARY EDUCATION (IRELAND)— NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MELDON said, that, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour (12.45), he intended to proceed, in accordance with the Notice he had on the Paper:—To call attention to the subject of the National system of Education in Ireland, especially as to the position of the Irish National Teachers; and to move—

"That, having regard to the Resolution passed by the House of Commons on the 7th May 1878, and to the pledges since given on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, this House deprecates the delay which has occurred in removing the admitted grievances of the Irish National School teachers, and is of opinion that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to have acted in conformity with such Resolution, and to have submitted proposals to this House for a satisfactory adjustment of the claims of the Irish National School teachers."

He thought he should be able to satisfy the House that the facts he would have to bring before it would entitle him to claim its verdict for his Resolution. The grievances of the Irish National Teachers were brought before the House so far back as the year 1874—on June 7th, he believed. A complaint was then made that the salaries of the Primary School Teachers were insufficient, that they were entitled to pensions, and that the number of residences supplied for them was insufficient. The manner in which the Motion was met by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who was then Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, was by making an entire admission of the case brought before the House. That admission was of the most unqualified kind, and the right hon. Gentleman had asked the House to allow the matter to remain in the hands of the Government until it was settled, the right hon. Gentleman giving an undertaking that satisfactory proposals would be made for the removal of the three grievances. Nothing was done until the following year, when, in the month of June, the right hon. Gentleman brought forward his proposals. He (Mr. Meldon) proposed to deal with only two of the grievances which had been submitted for the consideration of the House. The first was the question of salaries, and the right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal with that in two ways. He added a sum to the existing salaries of the National School Teachers amounting in the aggregate to £60,000 a-year. The right hon. Gentleman stated that it was the intention and the wish of the Government that the House should add a further sum to the remuneration of teachers with respect to payment by results, and that the results earned by the teachers should be divided into three parts—one-third, by examinations, from Parliament unconditionally; one-third from Parliament conditionally; and the remaining third was to depend upon the discretion of the Board of Guardians, and carried with it the second, on conditional Government payment. The Parliamentary Vote arrangement was agreed to, and he had nothing to say to that; but the other portion of the scheme had wholly and entirely failed. He would state, very shortly, what the nature of the arrangement was. The pupils in the different schools were to be examined for results; and, in the case of those who passed, the fees to which the teachers were to be entitled were to be divided, as he had said, into three parts—the first to be paid unconditionally, and the second to depend on the Guardians taxing themselves for the third.

It was foretold that the condition as to Boards of Guardians would necessarily be a failure; but a pledge was given to Parliament, to the teachers, and to the public of the most explicit character. When it was pointed out to the then Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland that the scheme would necessarily fail, he made use of these words, which constituted a pledge, which, to the present moment, remained unfulfilled both to Parliament and the Irish teachers. He said—"We do not intend this to be a permanent measure. I consider it highly important to get Boards of Guardians to contribute, and I should like to train them up to it. If it succeeds, well and good, the teachers will be reasonably remunerated; if not, the Government will take steps to secure that the remuneration now intended shall be paid to them." These were, in effect, the words spoken by a Minister of the Crown nine years ago, and the gravamen of his (Mr. Meldon's) charge now was, that that promise remained at the present moment entirely unfulfilled, the remuneration it was intended they should have remaining unpaid. It was foretold that this "Permissive Act," as it was called, would remain a failure. In 1875, 65 Unions out of the entire number contributed; in 1876, 70 Unions contributed; and so on until the year 1881-2, when there were but 16 Unions which contributed; and last year the number decreased to four. They might assume that the substantial failure of the Act was proved to demonstration in 1877, when the number of Unions contributory had fallen to 39. They were entitled to have the pledge given in 1875 fulfilled, and to have the Act, which had proved a failure, remedied in some way. Up to the present time, however, nothing had been done to remedy the failure of the Act. The Unions in Ireland, or the great mass of them, had declined to become contributory, and the thing was going from bad to worse. The teachers, in every Union not contributory, had been debarred of a third of the hard-earned result fees the Government had given them in 1875. Under ordinary circumstances, it would have been two-thirds; but the case really was so flagrant, that the Government were obliged to step in and say—"We will not insist on the condition that the Guardians are to contribute before Parliament gives the two-thirds; but, if you will get made up from other sources, local or otherwise, a certain sum of money, we will contribute out of the Parliamentary grant as much as you get." But so far as the result fees were concerned, they had been absolutely lost in those cases where the Unions had not been contributory. That was the position in which the salary question remained at the present time. As to the pension question, nothing was done from 1875 to 1878; and, as to residences, a Bill had been brought in which, for other reasons, had not worked satisfactorily. However, he confined his complaint to the two points he had mentioned. Nothing had been done up to 1878 in regard to pensions, and nothing had been done to redeem the pledge made to the House by the Government. Every kind of pressure had been brought to bear on them to make them redeem their pledge. The teachers had been obliged to bring their case before the House.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at One o'clock.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he wished, on behalf of the Government, to inform the House that the Business after the Budget to-morrow would be—first, the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, and next, the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases Bill, both Bills of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, and both to be referred to the Committee on Law. After that, if there were time, the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill would be taken. If the Bills were not reached to-morrow night after the Budget, it was proposed that there should be a Morning Sitting on Friday, when they would be taken in the same order.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, that the Question which he had upon the Paper had been answered by the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman, and it would, therefore, be unnecessary for him to put it.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SITES FOR CHURCHES, TEACHERS' RESIDENCES, &c. (IRELAND) BILL.

(Colonel Nolan, Mr. Gray, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. O'Shea, Mr. Biggar, Mr. O'Sullivan.)

[BILL 18.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

COLONEL NOLAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he wished to explain that it was one proposing to afford facilities for the sale of sites by owners, for the erection of churches, clergymen and teachers' residences, and other like purposes of the character it indicated. The Bill was one which he felt confident would obtain the approval of the whole House. It was not confined to the voluntary sale of land by owners; but, in certain cases, it would give a compulsory power for the acquisition of these sites. However, with regard to the Compulsory Clause of the Bill, he had endeavoured, as much as possible, to adopt means which would prevent it causing inconvenience to landowners and others affected by it. He might also mention that he had consulted with a Conservative Member who had suggested some alterations in the Bill, all of which had been accepted by him. The Bill had been conceived and framed in a spirit of fairness; and he might mention that, if any of the hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Conservative Benches wished to insert any further safeguards to the rights of the owners, he should be happy to receive them, as he was desirous of purchasing their consent by any amount of concession possible in that respect. There were two or three causes which rendered the introduction of this Bill necessary in Ireland, which he would briefly enumerate. In the present state of the country, there were three causes which prevented sites being given for the purposes mentioned in the Bill in Ireland. The first was the way in which the land was tied up in Ireland. That was one of the reasons why it was so difficult for owners to dispose of their land. He quite allowed that landowners in England laboured under similar disadvantages; but these constituted much more serious difficulties in Ireland than in the former country. The second cause was the prevalence amongst some owners of the remnants of feudal ideas. The third was the religious difficulty. He did not consider that, at present, religious intolerance prevailed with or influenced the great majority of landowners in Ireland; but it unquestionably did with some, and there was a minority who were still affected by it. There were still a number of owners of property, who thought that, by the Law of Property, no one should have any claim whatever to the land—not even to a plot of ground which would be required for such a necessary purpose. However, the real and main difficulty was the law regulating the sale of land in Ireland, and also the arrangement under which these sales had to be completed. He was aware that the same difficulty was experienced in England, and it might be asked why it did not produce the same result as in Ireland? That was an argument to which he would reply, by saying that it was always easier to get over difficulties of that kind in a country which governed itself. A bad law, moreover, always worked worse in a country like Ireland, which was under external rule, than it would in a country enjoying such advantages as England. There had, he said, always been large endowments for schools in England, and Education had flourished; but Education was prohibited in Ireland, and it was penal to encourage it until very lately. The means of Education in Ireland had really only existed for the last 30 or 40 years, and there had not been time to obtain these sites. People might think that it was very easy for the landowners to sell a couple of acres of land. If he was able to do it, certainly, it would be of great advantage; but it would give a very great deal of trouble to sell two or three acres out of 10,000 or 12,000. The landlord might be afraid of a question of title being raised; he might have to consult two or three different sets of mortgagees, and one or two ladies with jointures on the property. The object of the Bill was to make sales of land for sites as cheap and easy to the landlord as possible, such transactions being at present very troublesome and costly. In the market town near which he (Colonel Nolan) lived, the Poor Law Board of which he happened to be Chairman, had bought a site of three or four acres of land, and for it they paid £350. Well, what were the law costs? They were about £300. He maintained that the state of the law which made the acquisition of £350 worth of land cost £300 for law expenses, was a great scandal, which demanded immediate attention and remedy. The Union to which he belonged might be able to pay it; but a poor Union could not afford to spend £300. He might say the costs would have been nearly the same, if they had only paid £250 for the land. It might be imagined, from what he had said, that they purchased this land compulsorily, and that they had an unwilling owner to deal with. On the contrary, the landlord had behaved extremely well to the place. It would, he considered, be of enormous advantage, if they could introduce some simplification of the law, which would make the purchase of land for special purposes more easy. People say—"Oh! wait, till we have a thorough system as to the sale of land." He (Colonel Nolan) believed nothing would help the landowners of Ireland more than a simple and inexpensive system for the sale of land; but they might have to wait a very long time till that took place. Landowners might object to the Bill, because it might throw too much land into the market at one time; but the small portion he proposed to affect by it could not possibly injuriously affect the price of land in the market. The Bill dealt first with providing sites for schools; but it was also intended to provide sites for churches. It was a disgrace and a scandal that half-a-dozen places should be kept out of church accommodation, from the difficulty and, indeed, impossibility of obtaining sites. This Bill, with a very trifling amendment, would certainly supply great want in this direction, and it could be altered so as to include churches built on terminable leases. Then there was the case of houses for the clergy. There were a great number of cases in which clergymen could not obtain a proper site on which to build houses, the reason for which was that the proprietor might impose such conditions as made it very expensive for the clergyman, or he might have to deal with four, five, or six small proprietors. This Bill was very modest in its proposals, and he had restricted it as far as possible. Referring to the question of schools, he could say that the schools in Ireland were in an extremely bad state. There had been a very bad distribution of the schools throughout the country, and it had evidently been settled by questions other than the density of the population. If they asked the clergyman or manager, why was not the school in greater proximity to the population, the reply generally was, that there were difficulties about getting a site, that they had to go where there was a site, and very fortunate they thought themselves in getting one where they had it. In consequence of the choice of sites for schools being so limited, the State was wasting one-tenth of the money they spent on education. The children had often to go miles to school; and, although, in fine weather, it might not matter if they had to go an extra couple of miles, yet, in bad weather, it was a very serious thing. Their shoes were, perhaps, not quite suited for the weather, and they did not employ umbrellas. The result was that they often caught very severe colds. But that might be largely prevented if they had not to go an unnecessary distance to school. He did not wish to rest his case altogether on his own assertions, although he had often seen the want of proper sites for schools, and for residences for the clergy. He would read an extract from a letter from the Archbishop of Tuam, in which he said—

“There is a widespread feeling of dissatisfaction at the impossibility of procuring sites for churches and schools where they are so much needed.”

He had also seen letters from other Bishops. The Bishop of Down wrote to say that he had made an arrangement to buy an acre and 12 perches of land at £18 a-year, and after he had made this arrangement the agent asked him for what purpose he wanted the land. The Bishop replied that it was for a church. The land was then refused, although the proprietor formerly was willing to give it. In another case, in the same diocese, another site was refused. The Archbishop of Cashel said he could not imagine a more useful Act; but he was an ecclesiastic who had spent some of his time in the Colonies, and he pointed out that it prevailed in the Colonies. One part of his letter had a melancholy kind of amusement about it. He said he thought the Bill could have been drawn up in one page, because it was only a page long in the Colonies. He seemed to forget the difference in the land system in the Colonies. He (Colonel Nolan) only hoped our land system was something like that in the Colonies; and if they had free sale of land in Ireland, he believed the Land Question would settle itself. Another Bishop had said of the Bill that there was no more crying necessity than there was for it. He could not get a spot on which to build a school, and he had been obliged to build new schools in churchyards. He (Colonel Nolan) did not suppose there was anything necessarily unhealthy in building schools in churchyards; but, still, his own idea was that it was not a place for building a school.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the hon. and gallant Member if, by churchyard, the Bishop meant graveyard?

COLONEL NOLAN said, he really could not say; but, in any case, a churchyard could not be the best place for a school. The same Bishop wrote that some of the landlords would not give a spot, even of the most worthless land, and others only on the condition that the site was vested wholly in the Board; and he said that it would be a terrible calamity to Catholics in the North of Ireland, if a compulsory Education Bill was passed while this state of things lasted. His Lordship evidently feared that they might be driven into National schools, which were not managed in the manner that Catholic schools were, if a compulsory Education Act were passed before these sites were granted. Besides these letters from Bishops, he had a letter from Father Crealey, who had done a great deal of good in the counties of Galway, Mayo, and Connemara, in which he said that two sites for schools were refused in the parish of Moyrust, in Connemara; two more were refused by one landlord in the parish of Omagh; another by a landlord in the parish of Omagh; and in another parish two were refused. Since August last, in Mayo, he had been refused sites for schools by three different landlords. In every instance in Connemara, and, he believed, in some of the instances in Mayo, the land asked for was barren and rocky, and of no agricultural value. A great many clergymen in Ireland were also put to great shifts for want of small pieces of land for the erection of residences, schools, and school residences, and he maintained that a Bill which merely afforded facilities for the building of churches would not be complete. He only asked that each schoolmaster might be allowed three statute acres. At present, those persons had to spend a large part of their incomes on those necessities of life which they could produce for themselves at great saving if they had this land. According to a pamphlet published by the Irish School Teachers, their Body numbered 7,429, and of these only 1,515, or 20 per cent, were provided with residences, leaving 80 per cent unprovided; and it was set forth that these figures compared very unfavourably with those for England and Scotland, although the accommodation was not wanted nearly so much in those countries as in Ireland. But the National School Inspectors, as well as the teachers, had expressed views favourable to such legislation. In support of this statement, he (Colonel Nolan) would refer hon. Members to several letters which he had seen from National School Inspectors in Ireland, including those of Mr. Greer, Mr. M'Aulay, Mr. Eardley, and Mr. Keenan. These communications, written before the introduction of the present Bill, advocated the adoption of some such legislation as this now proposed, in regard to sites for schools, declaring that the wretched cabins in which the National School Teachers were obliged to reside in some districts of the country rendered study almost impossible; and that the absence of proper school residences rendered it necessary for some schoolmasters and schoolmistresses to walk as much as 12 miles a-day. The statements of the Government School Inspectors, in fact, could not be more strongly in support of the Bill if they had been written to order. In what he proposed, he was not asking for an increase to the salaries of the National School Teachers, directly or indirectly, even by giving free residences—indeed, the teachers themselves, in the pamphlet, declared that they would be willing to pay for the sites by annual instalments. They would like to have free residences, and they thought they had a fair claim for increased salaries; but they, at the same time, regarded the question of sites quite apart from the question of increase of salaries. As to the machinery of the Bill, he was not wedded to his own proposal, save, perhaps, to that part affecting cheapness of Law costs. He should also have no objection to accepting the Board of Works as the executive authority in preference to the Local Government Board; and, if it were desired, would be agreeable to meeting Members who were not favourably disposed in the Smoking Room to settle the question. [Laughter.] Well, meetings of that kind had taken place with regard to other measures, if not in the Smoking Room, at any rate in the Conference Room—notably as regarded the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill in the last Parliament—and he should be disposed to welcome such a mode of settling any difference there might be as to machinery; or to send the Bill to a Select Committee for the purpose, if hon. Members preferred it. He should also be willing to modify the safeguards he had proposed in the Bill, or to meet Conservative Members halfway on any point, in order to secure the principle of the Bill and make it a working measure. Furthermore, he would point out to Irish Conservative landowners, that the object of the Bill was not to confiscate any part of their property, but that a fair price would be paid for the land compulsorily acquired. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Leitrim County (Colonel Tottenham), who had given Notice of opposition to the measure, should remember that he had himself acquired land compulsorily. He had constructed a railway, acquiring land for the purpose from his neighbours; for though the line ran through his own property, it also went beyond it. That railway was a public benefit, no doubt, as well as a benefit individually, to the hon. and gallant Member; but so would the granting of compulsory sites under this Bill be a benefit to the people of Ireland. He would, therefore, urge the hon. and gallant Member to agree to an extension of the principle recognized in his own railway scheme. It had been said that the Conservative Members themselves gave sites for school-houses, churches, and residences; but that was no argument against the Bill, for the reason that it was only the most popular Conservatives who were returned to Parliament. Those hon. Gentlemen were good landlords; but there were a large number of other landlords in Ireland who had no desire to get into Parliament, or who knew they had no chance of ever being returned, and who would refuse voluntarily to surrender sites, however convenient their property might be, for the purposes of education. At present, it was to the best-natured landlords the teachers and clergymen went for the facilities they desired; and, therefore, an extra burden was thrown upon those gentlemen, and this extra burden would continue, from time to time, to be imposed until the State took the matter into its hands. He maintained that he had presented to the Government a very strong case for the granting of compulsory powers. He did not expect an absolute refusal from them in point of principle, for he did not think they could possibly get over the statements of their own Inspectors. Her Majesty's Ministers might say they were such a perfect Government that they had every possible remedy for every possible grievance in their portfolios, and that they would, at some future time, legislate on this subject. Such an answer would be as bad as unwillingness to do anything, for it would mean that they had so many Bills to pass that one was bound to block the other, and that nothing would be done on any subject until action was rendered necessary by violent agitation. To his mind, the Government would be setting a very bad example if they refused to act until forced by agitation, though he was sorry to say that the history of the past few years showed that they never did do anything until they were forced by such agitation. There was no prospect of the Government being able to pass a Bill on the subject either that or the next Session; and he hardly thought that, if the next Government chanced to be Conservative, there would be much hope of the matter being taken up by them. If the present Government would undertake to take up the measure, or to introduce a similar one, and pass it through this year, he should only be too delighted, and would himself abstain from proceeding any further with the present proposals. All he wanted them to assent to was the principle of the Bill. Its machinery he would leave to them, even were it such as he could not readily sympathize with.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he rose to second the Motion with great pleasure, because he believed there were few Bills brought before the House which would be of more service than this. There was not a county in Ireland in which the want of such a measure was not deeply felt. In the county which he had the honour to represent (Limerick), although a rich county, many of the clergymen's and teachers' residences were a disgrace to a civilized nation. In one case which he knew, where the clergyman's residence was partly constructed out of an old police barrack, the clergyman had to come every morning to his church, a distance of over three miles, and the same returning. His residence, which was at the extreme end of the parish, was the only one he could get. He (Mr. O'Sullivan) did not wish to make a personal attack on anyone; but he must say that three very extensive landowners held all the land surrounding the church, and none of them would give the smallest portion of land for a residence for the clergyman. The tenants in several places around the church would give the required number of acres, but none of the landowners would consent. He was sorry to see that the Amendment to reject the Bill was put down by one of the largest landowners in that House. It was unfortunate for the landlord class that they would not learn, even at the last moment, that even when they saw their power was dying out, they still did things which made them objectionable in the eyes of the country. In another portion of his county, the clergyman, after waiting for years before he could get a place for his residence, was at last compelled to build a house in a very small churchyard not three times the size of the House of Commons. There he had to make his garden and the stable for his horse, and all the necessary requirements. In another case, the clergyman had to take part of the old chapel, in order to make a school-house, because he could not get a site; and that occurred, too, in the rich county of Limerick. In the very same parish, there was no residence at present for either the male or the female teacher, and he had known the female teacher to walk every morning three miles to her duty. In another case, a male school, a female school, and a residence for the female teacher had to be built within the churchyard, which was scarcely 100 yards square, and yet the land surrounding the church was held by three large owners. The male teacher had to go two miles to a miserable residence. Then, in towns, a great many of the teachers had to go into lodgings, where they got a miserable room for which they had to pay largely. Both teachers and clergymen, in fact, were in a miserable way in the country for want of residences. He believed the Bill contained sufficient safeguards to protect the interests of the landlords; and, if it did not, in the opinion of the Government, the promoters would be glad to make any and as many alterations to meet their views as they pleased. Those who sought that legislation had no objection to pay the full value of land. All they wanted was that, where the landlords would not give voluntarily, they should be compelled to give it. It was true there was an Act giving power to purchase; but they could not purchase unless they had powers to compel both occupier and owner. They wanted nothing unreasonable or unfair, and they trusted the Government would not stand in the way of remedying a grievous injustice.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel Nolan.)

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the Bill showed they had not yet settled the Land Question of Ireland. His hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Nolan) had shown a great grievance to exist in Ireland which demanded the attention of the House. There was no evil in Ireland so great, even after all the reforms made by Parliament, as the limited ownership of the land. It existed to so great an extent that, at that moment, one-third of the land was in the hands of fewer than 300 persons. Under such a condition of things, no doubt, there was great hardship in connection with the obtaining of sites for objects of public importance and utility; but his hon. and gallant Friend, when he asked the House to adopt the Bill, must bear in mind that, in reference to the principle of the measure, there was nothing in the particular circumstances of Ireland in which that country so greatly differed from England and Scotland, and English and Scotch Members who voted for it would not be committed to its principle in regard to their own countries. With reference to what had been said as to the acquisition of land for the purposes of schools, he was not able to go further with the hon. and gallant Member than to say that, for all purposes on which the nation were agreed, it was right and proper that power should be given for the compulsory acquisition of land. Parliament having agreed that education was a matter of primary national concern, for which the Government was bound to make provision, he (Mr. Arnold) quite agreed that if there was no power now existing in the Government of Ireland to take compulsory sites for the education of the people, such power ought to be vested in them. But was there no such power? He believed, at all events as far as England was concerned, there was unquestionably power for the Privy Council Office, in all the educational arrangements throughout the country, to acquire sites for the building of schools in any and every part of Great Britain compulsorily; and if the law of Ireland were not so comprehensive as that, he was disposed to say that the sooner it was amended the better. But his hon. and gallant Friend was not content with asking that that power should be vested in the Irish National Board of Education. His Bill went very much further, and asked that all recognized religious denominations in Ireland should have power to purchase land compulsorily. That, perhaps, would work very well in Ireland, where there were, certainly, only two or three religious denominations which were in great prominence; but in the United Kingdom there were 75. [Mr. WATSON: 160.] There were certainly not fewer than 75 Christian sects in this country who, if this Bill applied to England as well as to Ireland, would have the power of making representations to the Local Government Board to obtain power for the compulsory acquisition of land. The Local Government Board would, if they made a restriction, have to say invidiously which of these sects should have the right of compulsory purchase. It would be impossible to sever the religious question from the decision which would have to be given. Though some hon. Members might not believe it, he was a stickler for rights of property. He had no desire to promote legislation at the expense of the rights of property; but he did desire to multiply owners of property so as to give a larger choice to would-be purchasers, instead of depending on one or two great landlords. He would earnestly entreat hon. Members from Ireland, instead of bringing forward a measure like this, to use all their endeavours to promote the multiplication of owner-ships in Ireland. An Act of the time of George III. had allowed one religious Body only to acquire land compulsorily. That had been the order of legislation which had prevailed in that House at one time, when there was an alien Church in Ireland, and when it was presumed that everyone was of one mind in religious matters. Now it would be absurd to propose such an Act as that, because it would be entirely against the sentiment of the people. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, in proposing the Bill, had made one observation, at least, that was sensible—that if they had a free system of land transfer there would be no difficulty in this matter. He fully agreed with that sentiment, and until they had Land Laws such as existed in Australia and other Colonies, this difficulty would undoubtedly occur. He sympathized with the difficulties which occasionally existed where the Roman Catholic community were brought face to face with Protestant landlords, who would not afford facilities for the erection of churches and schools; but he declined to vote for the measure. If the Bill had only referred to education, he would have heartily supported it.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months said, in his opinion, there was very little argument advanced in its favour, and, therefore, very little for him to answer. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Arthur Arnold), and who had given them a lecture on various religions, and on political economy, about which he appeared to know something, had made a charge against the Protestant landlords of Ireland, that they placed themselves in direct opposition to their Roman Catholic brethren on the subject.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I did nothing of the sort. I said when such cases occurred, I sympathized with the Roman Catholics.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was in the recollection of the House, and he thought the House would agree with him that the hon. Member did make that charge against the Protestant landlords of Ireland. In doing so, the hon. Member showed his absolute ignorance of the subject. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway County (Colonel Nolan), in moving the second reading of the Bill, appealed to the Conservatives as Conservatives, and the landlords as landlords, not to oppose it now. He (Colonel King-Harman) thought that the giving of power to three persons, to be called "Trustees," to seize any property they liked for these indefinite purposes, was as likely to injure the tenant farmers as it was to injure the landlords, and, perhaps, more; because, whereas the landlord would get compensation, the tenant farmer would be turned out of the land without compensation, which would mean, according to hon. Members below the Gangway, a sentence of death.

MR. SEXTON: The Prime Minister.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, the Prime Minister used the expression, and it was often cheered and endorsed by hon. Members below the Gangway. Now, his objection to the Bill was that it was absolutely unnecessary, and would be used for the purpose of annoyance and little else. In his own experience, the difficulties of obtaining land for the purposes in question seldom occurred, and were by no means so great as had been alleged. It had been said that the landlords could not part with their land. There might be a difficulty in selling it; but there was no difficulty under the present system in letting a plot of ground sufficient either for a place of worship or a school on what amounted practically to a perpetuity. When any difficulty did arise, it was because the landlord objected to the site selected, but was ready to give another. In the counties with which he was connected there was no difficulty found, and he was always ready to give such sites. Indeed, one of the things most remarkable about Ireland was the large number of handsome Roman Catholic churches that were to be found everywhere throughout the country; for even in times of poverty and distress the people were ready to build churches of a high order. One objection to the giving of sites which he had known to arise was that the tenant farmers did not like to have a church or school in their neighbourhood, on the ground of the damage that the children would do on their way to the school in trespassing after birds and other objects over adjoining grounds. Surely, gentlemen and farmers living in the neighbourhood had as much right to a voice in the matter as the persons who chose the site. He opposed the Bill because its principle was thoroughly vicious and radically wrong, and because its machinery was absurd and ridiculous. There were 40 religious denominations in Ireland, each of whom under the Bill would be entitled to take 12 acres wherever it liked. Any three persons, even persons who might not have anything to do with the parish or know anything about it, might come down and say—"You are very badly off here for a teacher's residence; we shall get you one;" and then these three persons were to become trustees, and the teacher was to be under their thumb. They would have power to go down and take 12 acres of land anywhere they liked for a teacher's and clergyman's residence, and a school and church; and if the Bill passed, people would probably find a church of one particular denomination in Ireland at one end of their land, and a Quaker's meeting-house at the other. Then the Bill could be used, as the Labourers' Act was now being used, simply as an instrument of intimidation and torture. [Laughter.] It was thoroughly well known that the Labourers' Act was now being used so as to put up labourers' houses on the lands of every loyal and respectable man that could be found in a Union; but he (Colonel King-Harman) had never found that the Land League

Guardians were as anxious to have such houses placed on their own lands. Whenever there was a man in the district who had voted against them or their Party, it was at once proposed to settle six or seven labourers on his holding. The Bill, if it were passed, would be used in the same way. It would be used for the purpose of terrorizing the tenants. Further than that, the safeguards which were contained in the Bill as to the trustees were absolutely illusory. What was going to be done after they had made the schools? Supposing that the school broke down altogether, what were they going to do with it? Were the trustees to put the money in their pockets? Yet they were to erect these buildings all over the country, and put them into the hands of three trustees, who were self-elected, and over whom there was no control. He also thought that the matter being referred to the Local Government Board was not a sufficient guarantee, as the Local Government Board in Ireland had shown itself to be a remarkably "squeezeable" Body at the present moment, as he knew. It was said that this 12 acres of land would not be taken from inside demesnes; but that was all "clap-trap," for the farmer, who only owned from 15 to 20 acres, valued his plot of land quite as much as he (Colonel King-Harman) did his demesne. He supposed that the supporters of the Bill would not take the land from their own friends; but he had as much right to see that his friends would be protected. The Bill he believed to be one of the most absurd ever brought before the House, and was contrary to all precedent and common sense; and he did not see how any Government could support it. He therefore earnestly moved its rejection.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." — (Colonel King-Harman.)

MR. WARTON said, he had to complain that the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) had taken away almost all the arguments he (Mr. Warton) was about to advance against the Bill. However, there were some of its provisions which had not been criticized, and to which he thought attention should be called, as to his mind they were most absurd. He was deeply grateful to the Irish Members when they brought forward a Bill; for, even although it might be absurd, there was always some fun called forth. He was amused by the reference of the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin to trespassing schoolboys. It reminded him of the manner in which a high authority had described the office of the teacher—

"It is a gentle task to rear the tender mind, and teach the young idea how to shoot."

He, therefore, on account of the poetic originality which was displayed by the Irish Members, was always inclined to forgive them—even for some of their schemes of plunder. He, however, must dissent from the manner in which they drafted their Bills. In the present case the Bill was so vaguely worded that it left in perfect uncertainty the amount of land that might be taken under its provisions. Beyond that, there were several other clauses in the Bill which, he argued, were not sufficiently explicit, a circumstance which, he thought, was to be attributed to the fact that the hon. and gallant Member who introduced the Bill (Colonel Nolan) was not a lawyer. The effect of the Bill would be mischievous, and its whole object was malicious.

MR. GRAY said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Warton) was very fond of poetry. He (Mr. Gray) wondered had he ever heard of a celebrated poem entitled "Who Killed Cock Robin?" He wondered had the hon. and learned Gentleman ever heard the historic lines—

"Who saw him die?"

I, said the fly, with my little eye,
I saw him die."

The hon. and learned Member seemed to be possessed of "a little eye" of a most microscopic description. He had referred, in a very interesting manner, to the fact that the hon. and gallant Member who had introduced the Bill (Colonel Nolan) was no lawyer. Well, he (Mr. Gray) understood that the Bill had been drafted by a Queen's Counsel, who had probably had as much practical experience of law as learned Gentleman who had just sat down. The hon. and learned Member had criticized some of the smaller provisions of the Bill; but he had not attempted to show that there was not a necessity for such a Bill; in fact, he (Mr. Gray) thought he had not touched the main spirit of the Bill at all. His speech would have been more appropriate on the Committee stage. He had also listened to the reckless objections of the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman), who appeared to be ready to back himself as a sort of "special prize bamboozler." Probably, however, the hon. and gallant Member knew well how to lay out his money in making bets in that character; but he (Mr. Gray) wished to remind the hon. and gallant Member that most persons were inclined to be guided by "public form" when doing so; and, therefore, judging by the "public form" of the hon. and gallant Gentleman on the present occasion, he would not be inclined to back him as the special prize bamboozler which he had described himself. In his speech he had managed to discover a considerable amount of absurdity in the Bill—indeed, in the way he had criticized it, it was very absurd. The "idea of people building churches for the purpose of terrorizing landlords" had never been heard of before, most assuredly. [Colonel KING-HARMAN: I said terrorizing the tenants.] He would accept the correction of the hon. and gallant Member; but must say that the idea of building churches for terrorizing those for whose benefit they were erected was exceedingly comic indeed. He was sorry that the hon. and gallant Member had not considered the Bill in a somewhat more serious spirit. It was simply ridiculous to imagine that the churches would be erected with any idea of terrorizing over anyone. The hon. and gallant Member must be aware of the public sources from which the money would come, and must know that the ratepayers would supply the funds required. The money being obtained from private individuals, he (Mr. Gray) would ask the House, was it likely that it would be expended in any scheme for terrorizing over landlords or respectable tenants; but rather for the purpose of supplying a public want in the locality. The fact that the proposal would have to be supported by the Guardians of the Union, and other persons in the district, when there was an intention to erect school-houses, teachers' residences, or manse in a district, ought to be a sufficient guarantee against all the imaginary and somewhat comic terrors which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had conjured up against the Bill. It was manifest that, when a school was proposed to be erected in a locality by public subscription, in order to supply a public want, it was the best possible guarantee that it would be preserved for the purpose for which it was erected. The very name of trustees would be sufficient to guarantee that the buildings would be preserved for their proper purpose, as would the trustees of a marriage settlement, for instance. The other criticisms of the hon. and gallant Member were not at all relevant to the Bill. He (Mr. Gray) ventured to say he could not quote a single Act of Parliament dealing with the acquisition of land in large tracts which contained the provisions which he seemed to think should be required in order to obtain a few acres. [Colonel KING-HARMAN: The Tramways and Public Companies Act.] If that Act did contain those provisions, it was quite an exceptional Act to all others. The hon. and gallant Member had not opposed the main principles of the Bill, but merely some trivial details, which could be better dealt with in Committee. The one and only question, as to whether, in Ireland, when the public of a certain locality were, owing to one circumstance or another, unable to procure land for the public purposes enumerated in the Bill, had not been considered by him at all. There was no doubt, he (Mr. Gray) believed, that that was the case in a number of instances; and, therefore, when it was required for public and useful purposes of that character, some provision should be made for the acquisition of land by Act of Parliament. The hon. and gallant Member had apparently a strong objection to Boards of Guardians; but he (Mr. Gray) would like to remind him that these bodies were already armed with far more power than was sought under this Bill under the Sanitary Acts; and there was no reason why there should not be some provision which would facilitate such useful works as the erection of places of public worship and places of public instruction for children. He would not weary the House by giving any quotations in support of the case, but would merely direct their attention to a communication which he had received from a clergyman in the county he represented (Carlow), which he thought would make apparent to the House the necessity which existed for such an Act. Following the example of a previous speaker, he would not seek to introduce any bitterness into that debate by mentioning the name of the landlord. The letter stated that they had been repeatedly refused the site for a schoolhouse, and had been threatened by the Commissioners with a withdrawal of the teachers' salaries on account of the dilapidated condition of the house. The landlord, who was a dignitary of the Episcopalian Church, refused to grant the site. Would the hon. and gallant Member, who, he believed, showed a most liberal example upon his own estates in this respect, desire that such a state of things as was shown by this letter, and which was not exceptional, should be continued? If the hon. and gallant Member objected to any particular machinery, they were perfectly ready to introduce such safeguards as might be thought desirable; but he thought that the sanction of the Local Government Board was a thoroughly reliable safeguard. As regarded the principle of the Bill, he would ask, was it or was it not reasonable that, in a parish where a site for a church or school could not be found, owing to the hostility of the landowners in the neighbourhood—for they knew that a single landlord would be often the owner of a whole district—some provision should be made for complying with the requirements of the people in this respect? A great absentee landlord, who absolutely put his foot down and refused such facilities, practically controlled a whole parish, and could refuse all reasonable facilities for the education of the children or convenience of the public in his locality. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would see his way to having some of the provisions of the Bill adopted by the Government. They could, of course, then be simplified or improved as far as might be deemed desirable, for the hon. and gallant Gentleman who brought it forward (Colonel Nolan) was not wedded to the machinery, and he would have no objection to alterations in points of detail. However that might be, there could be no reasonable objection to the principle of the Bill. Surely the time had come when the Government should do something in the matter to meet what was recognized as a public necessity, by giving some assurance that they would adopt a course which would give much satisfaction in Ireland, and remove a very just cause of complaint.

MR. P. MARTIN, in supporting the second reading, said, it was remarkable that hon. Members who had opposed the Bill claimed credit for having, of their own accord, so far as they were individually concerned, given practical effect to the principle of the Bill. Their criticisms had been directed mainly to the manner in which the Bill had been drafted and the machinery provided. He would suggest it was contrary to precedent and most unfair to thus, on the second reading of a Bill, enter into the discussion of matters which were more proper to be considered in Committee. The only question now to be debated was as to the principle of the Bill—whether it was right or wrong—whether it was reasonable that facilities should be granted for the erection of schools and schoolhouses; and he contended that a strong case had been made out, showing the necessity of the Bill. In his opinion, it was absolutely necessary that compulsory powers should be granted for obtaining sites for places of worship and teachers' residences. Those sites had undoubtedly been refused in Ireland; and he believed that the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had left nothing unanswered in the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman). The Bill should, therefore, be allowed to pass the second reading, and any Amendments which it was desired should be made in it should be proposed in Committee. He (Mr. P. Martin) was surprised that the hon. and gallant Member should have thrown aspersions on the Local Government Board. If a dispute arose between parties in respect to a school site, there must be an impartial authority to settle the matter; and where could they have a more impartial authority than the Local Government Board, which was a Government institution? That the Bill was absolutely necessary was proved by the evidence brought before the House. The Reports of the Inspectors of Schools proved that it was required for educational purposes. He believed, under an Act recently passed for Scotland, powers similar to those sought for in the present Bill had been given. He could give several instances where there had been most wanton and unreasonable refusal on the part of owners in fee to grant sites for chapels. Not 20 miles from Dublin there was a very extensive estate owned by a Nobleman now dead, and every lease on that estate contained a covenant that the tenant should not give a site on his land for a church; and the consequence was that for years no Roman Catholic church could be erected, and Divine Service had to be carried on in a room granted by a hotel-keeper for the purpose. He would remind the House, unless clearly shown that these sites were, in fact, required for the public good, and that the refusal was unreasonable, the compulsory powers could not be enforced. The Bill had been introduced by his hon. and gallant Friend in no sectarian spirit. The principle had been already sanctioned by the Legislature in Scotland and in this country. They already had the principle of compulsory purchase of sites applying to Board schools in England, and also the principle of compulsory purchase of sites for churches of the Established religion in England. Why not, therefore, apply the principle which obtained for the wealthy classes of England to the poorer Catholics and the poorer Dissenters of Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN said, that as no hon. Member on the Opposition side of the House rose to answer the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin), it might, perhaps, be convenient if he (Mr. Trevelyan) now stated to the House the views of the Government on the subject. The opinion of the Government was perfectly clear as to the course which they would propose to take. That opinion he would state clearly to the House, and he hoped to be able to commend it to the House also. The Bill contained a great deal that was new. In the first place, the process which it proposed to apply was new. It would apply to compulsory purchases, sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; but it would apply under circumstances essentially different from those in which they had been hitherto exercised. The Bill proposed that any persons three in number, with the assent of 100 ratepayers, might present a petition to the Local Government Board, asking for an Order to enable them compulsorily to take land for sites for churches and schools, and for teachers' and clergymen's residences. This petition was to be forwarded to the Board of Guardians, who were, however, only to be the channel of communication with the Local Government Board; and then came the important difference between the mode of proceeding under the Bill and that adopted in all Acts of Parliament previously passed dealing with cognate subjects. In all similar cases, at present, an Order made by a Body in the position of the Local Government Board for the compulsory purchase of land was a Provisional Order only. If, for example, the London School Board desired to take a site compulsorily, a Provisional Order only was granted; and if the compulsory taking of the site was opposed by any persons interested, the Provisional Order might assume the form of a Private Bill, when evidence could be taken and the rights of those interested could be ascertained. But, according to the Bill before the House, the Order would be absolute; and when once the Local Government Board had made that Order all persons concerned would have to abide by it. That would be quite a new system of procedure, and the objects to which it would be applied were also new, and that was a very grave matter indeed. Some hon. Members—the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny, and the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray), for instance—said that a Bill like the present ought to be met at the stage of second reading by acceptance or resistance to its principle, and that the only question to be decided that afternoon was whether the principle of the measure was right or wrong. Now, he (Mr. Trevelyan) should say that he thought these hon. Members were carrying that principle much too far. Wednesday was too often used as if it were Tuesday or Friday, and Bills were brought forward which the House should not accept, and hon. Members voted for them, merely because there was something in the principle of those measures which they approved. Now, there was something in the principle of the present Bill which the Government approved, and with regard to which they would give a practical sign of their approbation; but he thought the Government, if, because they approved of a certain part of the Bill, voted for a principle which they considered utterly unlike that which they should apply, would be establishing a very serious precedent. Their approbation, therefore, would not go far enough to justify them in voting for the second reading. He regretted very much, and thought it very unfortunate, that on Wednesdays Bills of this important character were discussed before such a small section of the House. The result was that last year they passed unanimously on a Wednesday a measure into which such alterations were introduced by the Government that it partook of the character of a Government Bill—he meant the Labourers' Bill. Now, that Bill was brought forward and agreed to, in what appeared at the time to be a perfectly unanimous House; and when an assurance was given in consequence by the Government that they would carry it into law, a great number of Members came to them, and appealed to them not to carry out their promises, on the ground that it would be a very serious step to take to establish the new principles embodied in the measure in question. Instead of acting in that manner, Members ought to attend and discuss the second reading of Bills like this, so that the Government might hear their views. Then the Government would know what to take and what to reject, and then a Bill relating to Ireland, accepted with apparent unanimity, or almost unanimity, in what constituted the House of Commons at the moment, might be quoted as a precedent for other measures. Now, what were the objects to which compulsory purchase was to be applied under the Bill? That was the question for consideration, and, as he thought, by far the most important part was that relating to the compulsory purchase of sites for schools. However, he was not at all satisfied with that part of the Bill which related to schools, because, as far as he could gather, the Bill would allow private schools and schools established by religious denominations and not brought under Government inspection to be erected on sites compulsorily purchased. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Nolan), in bringing forward the Bill, had made the most interesting speech he (Mr. Trevelyan) had ever heard him deliver, and he had heard him deliver very interesting speeches. He had brought forward a large body of evidence to show the necessity of the measure. The hon. and gallant Member for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman), who moved its rejection, strong in the consciousness of what he had himself done to help forward education, said there was no difficulty in obtaining sites for schools. Now, that was not the view of the Government as regarded the question. In the opinion of the Government this was a very great and a very crying grievance. The statistics on the subject which he had before him were almost unanswerable, and the complaints respecting it were not in any way exaggerated. Out of 7,302 schools, 1,704 were without out-offices. The Commissioners of National Education had a strong objection to allowing schools to be erected on sites used for strictly religious purposes; and yet in 340 cases the Commissioners had to erect schools on such sites, because they could not obtain sites elsewhere. At present, in the cases of 107 new schools which the Commissioners considered were absolutely required, the promoters of them could not obtain sites; and in 86 of these cases the deadlock was in consequence of the refusal of the landlords to provide the land; and in 21 because of the refusal of the tenants in occupation of the land. Again, in the cases of 246 schools managers found great difficulty in obtaining the suitable sites for the rebuilding and enlargement of schools which were in an imperfect condition. Innumerable instances could be cited from the Reports of the Inspectors to show how impossible it was to obtain sites. In one district every landlord applied to refused to grant a site; in another, where a school had been built, the only title to the site was the goodwill of the tenant; in a third, the tenants would not give up a single foot of ground for school sites, and so on. With regard to this matter the Government had fully made up their minds. In England sites for board schools could be obtained compulsorily, and the Government were to apply to Ireland the same which had been adopted in the case of board schools in this country. They were convinced that the necessity was as great as the average necessity in England, and perhaps very much greater than the average existing in England. Scotland was still without powers of this sort; but there were circumstances there which rendered those powers unnecessary. If the Bill stopped at schools, they would have no doubt whatever in accepting it, altering it in Committee. His objections to the Bill on the part of the Government were with regard to the proposal to make compulsory the purchase of land for clergymen's and teachers' residences. The Bill proposed that sites for residences might be purchased for clergymen with five acres of land attached, and for schoolmasters with three acres of land attached. That was an innovation of the gravest sort, to which the Government were quite unable to agree; and he supposed that that was the first occasion in which a proposal to purchase ground compulsorily for the occupation of persons in some private capacity had ever been made in Parliament. He thought hon. Members must take into consideration what an immense vista they opened up. What was there that made it desirable or convenient that a clergyman should be allowed compulsorily to acquire a residence? Why should a clergyman have the privilege of acquiring five acres of land any more than a Member of that House or any other man? Just think what five acres of land was. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Hear, hear!] He should suppose that in England there were not fewer than 50,000 persons who would, in some shape or other, come within the category of ministers of religion; and let the House reflect upon the privilege they would be conferring on that body of individuals by allowing each to put in a claim to purchase five acres of land wherever they could persuade the Local Government Board to allow it. It was argued that clergymen were, in some sense, public servants. Even if that were allowed, there were many other people who were likewise public servants. There were tax collectors, and other people engaged in the local government of the country, who were at least as much public servants as clergymen, and who were quite entitled to be in the same consideration; and if they went into the necessity for the existence of a clergyman in a particular place—he was not going into the question as to the degrees of necessity, which no one would be able satisfactorily to deal with with any certainty—they would have to admit that a doctor was a very important person in a village, and quite as necessary as a clergyman. Then the lawyer also considered himself a very important person; and he (Mr. Trevelyan) could quite see the possibility of a landed proprietor in Ireland, who objected to the opinions of a certain class, refusing to allow an attorney, though the body of the people might trust him, to come within 10 or 12 or 15 miles of some particular centre of population. Hon. Members had spoken of the extreme importance of providing these small properties for clergymen and schoolmasters, on the ground that it would form such a substantial addition to their incomes. But those hon. Members could scarcely have realized what was the nature of the demand they were making upon the community for the benefit of two classes of individuals when they asked that, in a country where land was such a great source of comfort as it was in Ireland, these two sorts of men, taken out of the whole community, should be adjudged the privilege of taking compulsorily small farms for the purpose of increasing their incomes. But hon. Members had spoken with considerable point and effect about the difficulties and scandals that were thrown in the way of education through teachers being quite unable to get residences anywhere near their schools. He had already spoken about obtaining sites for schools. As to houses for teachers, he could only say that the debate of that day would afford matter for very serious reflection to the Government. [“Hear, hear!”] He did not want hon. Members to suppose, for a moment, that he endorsed the idea that teachers, in any case, should have anything like small farms allowed to them; but he could quite conceive that, if it were a question of adding a residence, and a residence only, to a school in the case where the convenience or the economical advantage of the teachers had to be considered, but where it would be absolutely impossible otherwise to have the teachers housed in a way that would be decent, or in some cases housed at all—he could quite conceive that the Government should consider the propriety of making such residence part of the school buildings; but he must, however, repeat that hon. Members must accept the declaration of the Government, that nothing in the shape of farming land, or land for cultivation, or anything based on the number of acres mentioned in the clauses of the Bill, could, for a moment, be allowed to the classes it was sought to benefit. With regard to the process by which the hon. and gallant Member for Galway wished to carry out his object, he did not agree either with the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin), or the hon. Member for Carlow County (Mr. Gray), that the machinery of the Local Government Board would be sufficient for making compulsory Orders. The hon. Member for Carlow County and the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny said the Local Government Board might be thoroughly trusted in this matter. He thought the Local Government Board might, for certain purposes, be trusted, and he would presently state what those purposes were; but he did not think it was, as the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny called it, the proper tribunal for deciding whether a school or a teacher's residence was wanted. And as regarded the question of whether a clergyman or minister of religion should have a house, he could not conceive any Government Department that would be a good or proper tribunal; but as regarded the question whether a school or a teacher's residence was wanted, there was only one tribunal that could possibly pronounce a good and valuable opinion upon it, and that was the Board of National Education in Ireland. An absolutely necessary preliminary to any system for granting compulsory sites for schools and teachers' residences was that an application for the compulsory Order should have to pass through the Commissioners of National Education, and they should scrutinize it most carefully, as he was sure they would scrutinize it, both in the interests of local education and next in the interest of public economy. When the Commissioners of National Education had, under this hypothetical scheme for erecting schools and residences on compulsory sites, de-terminated that such a school ought to be erected, then the Local Government Board was by far the best tribunal for determining all the questions of place and of the convenience of those whose land it was proposed to take. They had a staff of Inspectors who were accustomed to hold inquiries in reference to the taking of land under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for various purposes, for waterworks, burial grounds, and under the Labourers Act, which came most nearly within the class analogous to the cases referred to in the Bill. He did not agree with the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman), whose speech he listened to with very great interest, and with which in some respects he heartily agreed—he did not think that the hon. and gallant Gentleman was quite justified in his sweeping charges against the working of the Labourers' Act, that there certainly had been some most improper applications under that Act, and some that he could characterize as nothing else than absurdities, and in one case as insanity.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he did not make a sweeping charge. He did not comment on particular cases.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he understood the hon. and gallant Member to refer to particular cases of a very serious class, indeed, of improper applications; but he (Mr. Trevelyan) had not yet heard any complaints, neither had he any apprehension that the Local Government Board would not be a perfect guarantee against any cases of injustice under the Act, and, above all, against cases of the Act being put in force for purposes of strife. The hon. and gallant Member approved of the Bill, before it became an Act, on the second reading, on the ground he (Mr. Trevelyan) said that he trusted the Local Government Board; and he earnestly hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would acknowledge in the course of one or two years that that trust had not been displaced. If he should have reason not to make that acknowledgment, all he (Mr. Trevelyan) could say was that the Irish Government would have laid themselves open to about as serious an imputation as could possibly be brought against any Government in the world. The state of things then with regard to the Bill was this—the Bill contained in it which a Government could not possibly endorse in a second reading. To give a second reading to a Bill proposing to give residences and small farms to ministers of religion, however glad the Government would be to see them obtain these advantages by other means, was what would, he thought, lay them open to very great inconvenience. He did not want to make any vague promises to the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). He was a veteran in the House, and no one knew the condition of the Business of the House better than the hon. and gallant Member; and he (Mr. Trevelyan) was glad to say that it was better than it was this time last year. The condition of Business being what it was, gave him very great hopes indeed that the Government would be able to introduce a Bill, which he actually had in his pocket that moment in draft, and which would go very far indeed, and which would satisfy, he thought, what he might call all the legitimate aspirations of the hon. and gallant Member. Under these circumstances, he earnestly trusted that the House would not proceed to a Division upon the Bill. He would use every personal faculty that he had to try and get that Bill passed into law this Session; and though he was not going to make a public declaration as to the exact order in which it would come forward in the Irish Business, he might state that it would come forward as soon as they could possibly put it down after the Bill which stood first on the list of Irish Bills—that was to say, the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill.

MR. EUGENE COLLINS said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had made it a ground of opposition to the Bill that it would be an innovation to give powers to the Local Government Board in Ireland to make Orders, empowering persons to purchase lands compulsorily for purposes of this Act, without coming to Parliament for authority to do so, either by Bills or Provisional Orders; and he stated the fact that, in England, land for school board, and other such public purposes, could only be acquired under powers conferred by Provisional Orders. He (Mr. Eugene Collins) desired to direct the right hon. Gentleman's attention to Acts already in operation, under which could be acquired, without coming to Parliament. He might mention the Irish Tramways Acts of 1860 and 1861; by those Acts, land could be compulsorily acquired for the purposes of tramway projects. The applications for that purpose were first brought before Presentment Sessions; then they were referred to the Grand Jury for approval; and, finally, brought before the Lord Lieutenant in Council, who could definitely sanction them without the necessity of coming to Parliament, unless serious opposition were offered. He would, therefore, suggest—and he had no doubt that the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Galway (Colonel Nolan) would comply with the suggestion—to introduce a clause in Committee, providing that the applications under the Bill should be similarly dealt with, so that there should be a final appeal to Parliament from the Order of the Local Government Board, in the case of opposition of a serious character being persisted in. With such an undertaking from his hon. and gallant Friend, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, on the part of the Government, would agree to allow the Bill to be read a second time.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought the debate was very disappointing indeed. The Bill was introduced by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Galway (Colonel Nolan) in a speech which was as conciliatory and as temperate in tone as any speech that had been delivered in that House. In fact, if his hon. and gallant Friend made any mistake whatever, it was really in making admissions against his case. In the first place, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) must express his strong disappointment at the attitude taken by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), who had the reputation—he did not know whether it was deserved or undeserved; but he assumed it to be so, and he believed it was so—of dealing upon the very points raised in the Bill with no stinted liberality whatever towards his fellow-countrymen; and how he could get up and oppose that being made compulsory by law on a very small minority of his fellow-landlords, which he himself voluntarily approved of, was a position which he did not understand.

He had lately visited that part of the country where the hon. and gallant Member resided, and he understood that among the friends of the hon. and gallant Member were many Catholic priests, who had supported him notwithstanding the unpopularity they incurred by so doing. Under those circumstances, he was surprised at the attitude he had taken up, and at his reluctance to allow this small measure of justice to be meted out to the Catholic priesthood. The action of the hon. and gallant Member showed the gratitude with which their support was regarded. The attitude of the Government also had been very disappointing to him. In fact, he was reminded of two very true sayings in regard to the attitude of the Government on this question. There was an old Latin saying that “those whom the Gods wished to destroy they first made mad;” and there was the well-known expression of Campbell that “in the sunset of life a man about to depart from existence seems to get a more than usually clear appreciation of circumstances and facts.” He did not know whether the Government was in a moribund condition or not; but he must say that he thought it displayed all the madness of persons about to be destroyed, the want of intelligence of those about to depart from existence. There had not been a single measure brought forward by the Irish Members which had not been confronted by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland with the most obstinate, and he must say the pedantic opposition. Last night the right hon. Gentleman assumed an exactly similar attitude with regard to the proposal to increase the remuneration of teachers in the Convent Schools. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman in having secured for his Government a combination of the hatred of all the farmers, all the clergy, and all the nuns in Ireland. He wanted to know what the particular objections of the right hon. Gentleman were? He noted, with some satisfaction, the presence during the debate of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), though he must say that he could not express his satisfaction at the attitude he had shown by his cheers on this question. The Bill proposed to deal with a grievance which, as Leader of the Dissenting Party in this country, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford was constantly bringing before the English people—that was the refusal by the landlords belonging to one religious persuasion, whether from motives of mistake or religious sentiment, to give facilities for the erection of places of worship belonging to persons of another persuasion which they did not possess. That was a power they ought not to possess; and it was to protect the Catholics of Ireland against that mistaken view of the obligations of a landlord to insist upon his own creed alone to have a facility for the erection of a place of worship, at which the right hon. Gentleman, as chief champion of the Dissenters in England, so constantly protested, that this Bill was entered. From the cheers of the right hon. Gentleman, when the Chief Secretary for Ireland made some particular point which commended itself to his special admiration, the point in his speech which the right hon. Gentleman apparently thought was the strongest was the point in which he said—“Why should a Catholic priest get five acres of land any more than anybody else?” But did the right hon. Gentleman not know that the proposal of the Bill was not that a Catholic priest should get five acres of land for his own benefit as an individual; but that it should be given to the congregation of the priest, who, out of their own pockets, raised the money for the purpose of the erection of his chapel and his house? The proposal was, not that the land should be given to the priest as an individual, but that it should be given to him and all his successors enjoying the confidence of the congregation, and that this should be permitted to the congregation, in spite of the whims and caprices of the landlords. The object was simply to rescue the congregation from the despotism of a landlord who would not consent to sell on religious grounds. The hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) spoke of this as an unexampled interference with the rights of property. The most land that could be taken under the Bill, for one of the purposes dealt with under it, was five acres; and the hon. and gallant Gentleman knew as well as any hon. Member that legislation had permitted railway companies to take 1,000 acres. The proposal of the Bill was not that land should be taken for nothing; but that land should be taken at a fair valuation, settled under Government auspices. The second proposition was that the land should be taken for what were practically public purposes. They were unable, in many parts of Ireland, to get a site for the house of a clergyman, in the only place where a site was possible, owing to the caprice and despotism of the landlord. The purpose of the Bill was just. The uses to which the Bill should be applied were public uses. There was no interference with the just rights of property, and the Bill was urgently demanded by a serious grievance which pressed very hardly on a large portion of the people.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY, in supporting the Bill, said, he did not think it was material to its case, whether they wished to have Catholic schools built or not. The objects of the Bill were, at any rate, innocent and harmless. When any section of the public were willing to club together, and found some object of sufficient interest to them to make it desirable, they should subscribe money and erect buildings for the purpose of carrying out these innocent and harmless objects—it might be by a church, or a school, or a social or political club, representing the common want or desire of a considerable aggregation of people—they ought not to be shut out from giving effect to their wishes by the accumulation of the soil in the hands of a few individuals. The refusal of such claims, whether made by Catholics or others, struck at the root of property in land far more than the Socialistic theories of Mr. George or anyone else. He supported the Bill on wider grounds than the desirability of erecting Catholic schools and chapels. Whatever might be the views of men, it was unreasonable that a local magnate should be able to say—“Your opinion should be extinguished, and I will extinguish it so far as I have power to do it.” The Bill was a step in the right direction. It asserted that the State would step in on behalf of the mass of the people and enable them to get some advantage from the land on which they lived. As regarded the question whether the area of land to be taken was to be five acres, that was a question of detail unaffected by the principle of the Bill, which was all that was affected by the second reading.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would like to ask why it was that the Chief Secretary for Ireland drew a distinction between Catholic schools and churches? It might be that he recognized the utility of the school in Ireland, but could not recognize the utility of the Catholic Church in Ireland, even to a Catholic population. The right hon. Gentleman must be still under the influence of those views of Catholicity to which he gave expression in dealing with Catholics and Pagans in India, when he declared that the rites of Catholic Churches were as idolatrous, as degrading as any performance in the temples of Aboriginal Pagans. The right hon. Gentleman expressed his views now with a greater regard to appearances; but he (Mr. O'Donnell) could not see any reason, but the reason of unreasoning sectarianism, in the opposition of the Government. Its objects were of the greatest importance, and yet the Government proposed to veto a demand so moderate and so limited as that contained in its provisions. The reception given by the Government to this Bill also taught a wider lesson. It threw a strong light upon their attitude with regard to much larger questions of land reform; for if the Government would not permit or facilitate the acquisition of land for such public purposes as these on the fairest terms of purchase, how could Irish Members look forward with the slightest confidence to the fulfilment of certain electioneering declarations of theirs upon those questions? The omens visible on the Treasury Bench that day declared that if they put off attempts for the realization of their National aspirations till the Government helped them to a satisfactory settlement of the Land Question, even in the smallest degree, they should be putting off the agitation for the satisfaction of their National demands till the Greek Kalends at the very least, and they might be playing the game of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) had taken a far juster view of this matter than the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold). He (Mr. Sexton) was surprised that the latter Member should have fallen into the gross error of considering an Irish question from the state of opinion and facts in England, where land was in the hands of members of various religious denominations, so that it was easy generally to find someone willing to sell. For the purposes of the Bill, it was only necessary to consider the case of the Roman Catholics, they being the vast majority of the three principal religious sects in Ireland—Catholics, Episcopalians, and Presbyterians. Out of the 5,000,000 of persons in Ireland, there were only 100,000 who did not belong to one or other of those three great communions. It was also perfectly notorious that the smaller communions of 100,000 souls were sufficiently provided with places of worship, and no such question as that apprehended by the hon. Member for Salford could possibly arise in Ireland. With regard to those three great communions, he did not believe any intelligent Member of any one of those three great Bodies in Ireland would have the least objection that the Local Government Board, in making inquiry under the Bill, should, as an element in that inquiry, consider whether, in the particular case, the congregation was so numerous as to have need of a place of worship erected under the Act. He was astonished that the hon. Member for Salford should have separated education from worship in this case. Freedom of worship was certainly quite as much a matter of State concern as education, and in the term "freedom of worship" he included the matter of facility for carrying on that worship, and if such facilities were denied there was practically an end to all freedom of worship. In that case a matter of public concern was interfered with, if chapels could not be built where they were required; and public interests were prejudiced, if schools could not be built where they were needed, and if teachers were compelled to weary themselves by walking miles between the schools and the houses they were compelled to occupy. The hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) might have spared his eloquence, and the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) his wisdom, in the opposition they had given to the Bill, because they need not have been under any concern that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have shown any predilection for public feelings or interests. He (Mr. Sexton) had observed lately that whatever the demand made by Irish Members might be, the course of the right hon. Gentleman was always one and the same. The right hon. Gentleman admitted the grievance, but would do nothing to remedy it. Sometimes, even, he would go so far as to prove the case, and then, having wound in and out, he always concluded by declaring that no reform would proceed from him, and that he would take no steps as regarded it. It was new to him (Mr. Sexton) to learn that a Bill was to be condemned because it contained new proposals. That plea came with bad grace from the Minister of a Government which had carried the most novel measures of coercion that had ever been applied to Ireland. After paying very careful attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he (Mr. Sexton) was reluctantly compelled to say that he could discover no principle whatever in it. The right hon. Gentleman declined to give what the people required, and offered them something which they did not want. He objected to give the Local Government Board power to order the compulsory sale, except in cases where there was no objection to the sale on the part of the landowner. The right hon. Gentleman did not seem to remember that, under any scheme of the nature which he had mentioned, it would be necessary to obtain the consent of Parliament. If the case for the schools was strong, the case for the school teachers was very much stronger. As to them, the right hon. Gentleman mentioned that he had before him 40 pages of Reports from Inspectors which were against the measure; but he seemed to have overlooked those which had been quoted by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), which contained extracts from the Reports of Inspectors in Ireland, who had stated that the teachers in Ireland were living in hovels many miles distant from their schools, and were, therefore, obliged to walk to and fro daily long distances, which exhausted their energies. They were also under the necessity of living in dwellings which exposed them to the contempt of the parents of their pupils. They, therefore, from these causes, sustained a loss of health and sacrifice of energy which left them without spirit, and in a condition of lassitude which prevented them from being able to discharge their duties adequately. He thought it would be more consistent and more frank if the right hon. Gentleman had stated why he relied upon one set of Reports and rejected another equally trustworthy. It was true that an Act was passed some years ago, in 1875, to enable teachers' residences to be erected in suitable places; but there were 6,000 such teachers in Ireland, and up to the present the residences proposed to be provided under the provisions of the measure had only been erected at the rate of about 45 residences annually since 1875; so that, at that rate, it would take 150 years to procure accommodation for the Irish teachers under that arrangement. There was no difficulty as to funds, public money was available, and a house could be built for £200; in fact, a teacher could be accommodated with a suitable dwelling for the small sum of £5 a-year; but the body represented by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin, the landlords, obstinately refused to assign suitable sites for the purpose required. About the most amusing, and, at the same time, the weakest, passage in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was that in which he referred to the claims of the clergy of Ireland. The fact was, he was not able to combat the evidence which had been advanced in favour of the Bill. He could not answer the claims which had been advanced by the eminent Bishop of the diocese of Loughrea, who had been for years vainly trying to get a suitable site for his church. For, although the people of that town had in other ways been very much attended to by the Government, as when they were under the régime of Mr. Clifford Lloyd they seemed likely to be forced to allow the grass to grow in their streets, it was strange that their other wants should be so entirely neglected. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had spoken in a manner of the clergy in his speech, which had both amused and surprised many Members of the House. He had shown very little sympathy with their request; indeed, he (Mr. Sexton) considered that the proverbial incapacity of Englishmen to understand the wants of Ireland had been more than usually exhibited in the remarks he made. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to consider clergymen in the light of public servants. He (Mr. Sexton) did not know whether, in England, people were in the habit of regarding the clergy as "public servants;" but all he could say was that, in Ireland, they were regarded in the light of public guides rather than public servants. He had placed them in the same category as public servants, taxpayers, and tax collectors.

MR. TREVELYAN explained that he had carefully distinguished the two cases, and considered them separately. He distinctly stated that the clergyman was not a public servant, and in that respect differed from the schoolmaster.

MR. SEXTON said, that if the right hon. Gentleman had not argued as he had stated, then there was no meaning in his words. It would be well for the priests in Ireland if they were on the same level with tax collectors. The Government were very scrupulous about laying hold of a piece of land for a site for a church, a school, or a teacher's residence; but they had very little scruple in regard to the obtaining of a site for a Coastguard station or a police barrack, each of which had a little plot of ground about it. The Government, also, were not so extremely chary about land in the Phoenix Park for the Viceregal Lodge, or for the residence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland himself, or for the heterogeneous collection of gamekeepers, who absorbed large portions of the Park, which was supposed to be the property of the people. The people were, moreover, shut out from some of the most desirous parts of it by the grants which had been made in this way. He felt sure that when the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was read in Ireland, it would be regarded as the most extraordinary effort of Parliamentary ingenuity which they had had in recent times. It was unworthy of a Minister of the Crown, and would be for ever regarded in Ireland as a proof of the right hon. Gentleman's incapacity to understand the feelings of the people of the country. His language amounted to a doctrinaire argument, that it was something horrible to propose that 5,000 clergymen in Ireland should possess about a quarter as much of the land of the country as was held by the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin County, who opposed the second reading of the Bill. He could not help thinking that the land might be trusted with much more fearlessness to the clergy; for if the landlord in Ireland had been proved to be a bad popular master, the priest had always proved to be a faithful popular guide. Therefore, it would be looked upon in Ireland as the most extraordinary speech which had been made by a Liberal Gentleman representing a Liberal Administration during the last quarter of the 19th century. The right hon. Gentleman would never fail to be remembered, even when he himself and his Administration had long passed away, as the Gentleman who had admitted the justice of every effort to remove a grievance from the people, but had never made an effort to remedy one. The comparison between clergymen and tax collectors, drawn by the right hon. Gentleman, would be regarded as an affront by the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland and the majority of the people who worshipped in their churches.

MR. DILLWYN said, he felt it his duty to support the second reading of the Bill, although in some respects he thought it went too far. Those points, however, might be altered in Committee; but he supported the Bill on the ground that, as regards the schools, the quantity of land required should be obtained for them, as it was of the utmost public importance that there should be facilities afforded for the education of the people. He also thought that, where a parish required a piece of ground for the erection of a place for religious worship, they should have an absolute right to do so.

MR. FINDLATER said, that he was prepared to support the second reading of the Bill in its integrity, because such a measure was required in the present state of affairs in Ireland. He would, however, deprecate, in the strongest manner, the entirely unprovoked personal attack which had been made by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. During the whole of the debate he (Mr. Findlater) had been in the House, and had listened with the closest attention to the observations made by the right hon. Gentleman; and he had not heard him utter a single word which could, by the greatest ingenuity, be tortured into an insult to Roman Catholic clergymen in Ireland. If he had done so, although he (Mr. Findlater) was a Protestant, he would have resented it as strongly as any Roman Catholic Gentleman in the House. He (Mr. Findlater) supported the Bill, because he believed it to be a most useful one. It was possible it might require to be amended in Committee in order to carry out the objects of its introducer; but that had nothing to do with the principle. That a measure of the kind was required there could be no doubt. Why, in the county he (Mr. Findlater) represented (Monaghan) it was known to many that a nobleman, a proprietor of land, refused the Commissioners of National Education a site for a school; and they had to erect a wooden structure of a temporary character for the purpose. The correspondence which took place on the subject appeared in the papers, and was matter of public notoriety. The same territorial magnate recently—he (Mr. Findlater) supposed to prove his consistency, having had a quarrel with the Monaghan Town Commissioners, because they succeeded in upsetting an election of the old Tory Commissioners made by his agent—had already ejected them from the Town Hall, in which they held their meetings. In effect, he had practically ruined the town, because he would not grant facilities to the local body to make improvements. The sooner, he (Mr. Findlater) thought, there was some modification of the extreme right of the owners of land required for reasonable public purposes obtained, the better would it be for the community at large. Where it was required, power should be given to take it. He should, therefore, support the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. PLUNKET said, he thought that nothing could be fairer or more moderate than the way in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had introduced the Bill (Colonel Nolan) had stated his case; and he (Mr. Plunket) would admit that he thought that there was a great deal in it. It was, no doubt, a considerable misfortune in Ireland that there was such a want of provision for school teachers, and everyone ought to desire to see the deficiency removed. But when the hon. and gallant Gentleman went on to speak of applying the compulsory provisions of the measure to obtaining sites for churches generally where they were wanted, and proceeded still further to speak of acquiring sites to enable clergymen who were to officiate both as regarded schools and churches, he (Mr. Plunket) thought there might arise great injustice and inconvenience to landowners. On that point he could not, therefore, hold with him as regarded the Bill. He could not see why a clergyman should be given a compulsory share of the land of somebody else. It had certainly been stated that there were not sufficient facilities for conveying land for these purposes; and, for his own part, he would heartily rejoice if such facilities could be increased, as he thought that their absence was a great disadvantage to the country. With regard to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he (Mr. Plunket) entirely concurred with him in his objections to the machinery of this Bill; and he would add that in Ireland the danger of injustice to the landowner under such a measure would be far greater than in England, since in Ireland any amount of evidence against the landowner could be brought forward of people who, no doubt, thought that they were stating the truth. As regarded the scheme shadowed forth by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, for the Government giving greater facilities for the erection of schoolhouses on a plan similar to that adopted in England, speaking as well as he could from the information he (Mr. Plunket) possessed, he could not see any objection. Of course, a great deal must depend upon the machinery, which at present appeared somewhat faulty; but, so far as he could see, he was inclined to accept and concur with it. He would remind the House that, in 1879, a Bill was brought in by the hon. and learned Gentleman the present Solicitor General, seeking to give similar powers with regard to sites for churches as those contained in the present Bill; but the measure of 1879 was opposed by the Liberals because of its compulsory character, and came to nothing. The ground upon which he objected to the Bill was not hostility to the main object—namely, that there should be proper sites for churches and schools and schoolmasters' residences. What he objected to was, that it was now proposed to adopt a system of giving some vague powers for public undertakings of this kind, and conferring more compulsory powers against the existing rights both of occupiers and owners of land. All that involved a principle which had never yet been adopted by the House, and therefore he must oppose the Bill.

COLONEL NOLAN, in reply, said, that he most heartily thanked the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) for the support he had given to the Bill. He could only say further that, in Committee on the Bill, the Irish Party would be quite ready to accept any Amendment that might be considered necessary. He could not agree to withdraw the Bill, notwithstanding that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had promised to deal with the case of the teachers.

MR. ARCHDALE said, that he rose merely for the purpose of repudiating the attack—the unwarrantable attack—which had been made on Irish landlords by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). As far as the County Fermanagh was concerned—and he (Mr. Archdale) knew the county well—the landlords acted most generously, and were always ready to give sites not only for schools, but for teachers' residences. He could also assure the House that those gentlemen, and himself included, not only took the very greatest interest in the educational establishments of the county, but many of them were school managers as well. He himself was a manager of two schools, and he had given residences to both of them. He quite agreed with the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, dealing with the sites for schools, and would support it when brought forward. As regarded the Bill under notice, he quite agreed with its principle; but he was bound to oppose it on account of its clauses. Some very dangerous courses of procedure were contained in them, and he should therefore give his vote against the Bill.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS.—First Reading—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (The Labourers Act) (Enniscorthy, &c.) * (64).

Third Reading—Army (Annual) (59); Freshwater Fisheries Act Amendment * (43-65), and passed.

(The Earl of Morley.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."
—(The Earl of Morley.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD wished to know from the noble Earl whether there was any prospect of progress being made with the erection of a new War Office for which plans were exhibited two years ago? There could be no doubt that the Army administration suffered materially from the great inconvenience arising from the fact that the business of the Department was conducted in several buildings not near to each other.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he did not see what relation there would be between his Motion and the question of the noble and gallant Earl. He however, quite admitted the importance of it; but it was one which ought to be addressed to the Commissioner of Public Works rather than to himself. He could not say more than that measures had been taken for carrying into effect the proposals which had been made with regard to the erection of new offices, and he believed that a large number of designs for those offices had been sent in; but no designs had as yet been selected. He sympathized with the desire of the noble Earl that the administration of the Army should be under one roof.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^d accordingly, and passed.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE INTERNATIONAL AFRICAN ASSOCIATION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF FIFE, in asking whether Her Majesty's Government had any intention of recognizing the International African Association, and whether they could give any information as to the status of this organization in S.W. Africa and its relation to the lives and trade of British subjects, disclaimed any intention of dealing with the question of the Congo Treaty, as he could not see what better arrangement could have been made unless we were prepared for wholesale annexation on the South-West Coast of Africa. He maintained that the Lower Congo, although possessing at present what little trade there was now in those regions, led practically nowhere, and that the recent labours of Mr. Stanley and Mr. Johnston abundantly proved that the real route in the future by which to reach Central Africa was the Kwilu River. The successful exploration of the Kwilu, the establishment of seven stations on the river, and the mapping out of the practical route to Stanley Pool, was accomplished last year in the name of the International African Association, a society formed eight years ago by the King of the Belgians, and which had now virtually assumed possession of a vast territory stretching from the shores of the Atlantic to the confines of the Soudan. It was the anomalous position and extraordinary constitution of that society that he was anxious to call attention to, and to inquire what official cognizance Her Majesty's Government had taken or were about to take of it. They had lately heard that the United States had decided to recognize it as a Government. Did the British Government contemplate any similar course? The founders of this peculiar organization disclaimed all national rivalries, and professed to carry on a purely philanthropic and non-commercial undertaking; but he found an intrepid American traveller extending his sway over 4,250 miles of waterway and 49,000,000 of population, supported by 13 steamers, 1,800 Natives, and some hundreds of Europeans. Was it possible that one man, aided by a few clever and adventurous spirits taken from all countries of Europe, could maintain order without some organized force, and keep up a semblance of justice over such limitless areas? On the coast it was ominously asserted that the White men considered there was no law. Could this state of things continue when the interior should have been opened to the markets of the world? What was, or what was to be, the status of that gigantic association flying its own flag over half a continent, and what powers for the defence of lives and property was it to have over British subjects whose number was likely to increase in those newly-discovered lands? It had been suggested by M. Emile de Laveleye that the Valley of the Congo should be neutralized, and an international control had also been spoken of to be established by the European Powers. It seemed to him that it was high time to secure for Great Britain some influence and share in the management of an association which, if recognized and developed, might be made to serve the ends of civilization. It would seem that the French had recently come into possession of Loango, and Black Point, south of the mouth of the Kwilu River, and considerably south of their old Possessions in the Gaboon—indeed, separated from them by the Kwilu Province, which Mr. Stanley was very anxious not to see in the hands of the French or Portuguese. In view, therefore, of the newly-acquired French Possessions, the altered Portuguese frontier, and the establishment of the International African Association as a great power covering 200 miles of the coast, it could not be denied that the position and status of that association was a matter of great importance, and on which it was not unreasonable to ask for some information from Her Majesty's Government.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl had referred to a very large, important, and difficult matter, in regard to which he was not prepared to give a definite answer on the present occasion. The noble Earl had very accurately described the character of the International African Association. He understood that that Association was promoted by the King of the Belgians, not as a Sovereign, but as an individual who had carried out the scheme on philanthropic grounds with immense munificence. The Association was not altogether separated, he thought, from commercial objects, and under the energetic conduct of its leader (Mr. Stanley) very large and important results had been achieved. With regard to the recognition of the Society by Her Majesty's Government, he might say that the noble Earl had correctly referred to the recognition of it by the Government of the United States. He had himself to-day received a telegram showing that the Government of the United States had recognized the flag of the Association as that of a friendly Government. The whole question of the constitution of the Society was, of course, very important; but Her Majesty's Government had not under consideration at present the particular Question which the noble Earl had put, and they would have to go much further into detail as to the matter and the view which was held by the Government of the United States before giving any definite answer to the Question.

THE EARL OF FIFE said, he should again call attention to the question on an early day.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—RELIEF OF BERBER AND GENERAL GORDON.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that, before the House rose, he would like to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in view of the information which had been received in this country, it was the intention of the Government to take any steps for the relief of Berber or of General Gordon?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he must adhere to the line which he had always followed, and which was also the tradition of their Lordships' House, in declining to answer a Question of which Notice had not been given in the ordinary way, and of which the noble Earl had not taken the trouble to give him Notice in writing of his intention to put it.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDERS (THE LABOURERS ACT) (ENNISCORTHY, & CO.) BILL [H.L.].

A Bill to confirm Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board for Ireland under the Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1883, relating to the Unions of Enniscorthy, Clonakilty, Gorey, Killadysert, and Shillelagh—Was presented by The Lord MUNSON; read 1st. (No. 64.)

House adjourned at Five o'clock, till
To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 24th April, 1884.

PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Second Reading—North Metropolitan Tramways.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities (Scotland)* [179].

Second Reading—School, &c. Buildings (Ireland) [45]; Public Health (Members and Officers) [164].

Committee—Report—Public Health (Confirmation of Bye Laws)* [173].

Third Reading—Marriages Legalisation (Wood Green Congregational Church)* [174], and passed.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

NORTH METROPOLITAN TRAMWAYS BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

MR. HICKS said, he was happy to say it was not necessary for him to detain the House beyond a few moments in regard to this Bill. Since he placed his Notice on the Paper he had had an interview with the Promoters of the Bill, who had undertaken to withdraw in Committee the clause to which most objection had been taken; and he, therefore, did not wish to proceed with his opposition to the second reading. He might also mention that some of the streets through which the proposed tramways were to pass were of a very narrow gauge, and the particular attention of the Committee would be drawn to that fact; and they would be asked to decide whether, on that ground, it was desirable that some, at least, of the lines should be sanctioned. But this was a question for the Committee to decide, and he would not now enter upon it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

QUESTIONS.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION ACT, 1879— FLOGGING.

MR. INDERWICK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called by direction of any of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates, or by residents in Wimbledon or elsewhere, to the defects of the Law in regard to cases of wilful damage to property by boys under the age of sixteen years; whether boys under sixteen, who cause wilful damage to property with intent to steal, may, under "The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879," be ordered by a magistrate to be privately whipped instead of being sent to prison, but when such boys cause wilful damage to property without intent to steal, the magistrate has no such alternative power unless the damage exceeds £5, and, in default of the offenders paying a fine and the value of the damage done, he is bound to send them to prison for a term not exceeding two calendar months; and, whether, under these circumstances, the Government will take steps to relieve magistrates from the obligation in such cases of sending boys to prison by extending "The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879," to cases of wilful damage by boys under sixteen years of age, whether such damage does or does not exceed £5 in amount?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: As my hon. and learned Friend is aware, I have long had this subject under consideration, and am anxious to deal with it. But the question has been postponed until action has been taken upon the Report of the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Commission. All I can say is, that I entirely agree in the views taken by my hon. and learned Friend. I have also had communications with the Police Magistrates of London. I hope that effect will be given to the views of my hon. and learned Friend.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ATHY BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the vote of censure passed by the Athy Board of Guardians on the Local Government Board for useless expenditure of the public money in inserting the advertisement announcing the holding of an inquiry under the Labourers Act in The General Advertiser, a paper rarely or never seen in the district; if it be a fact that, at the same time, no advertisement was inserted in The Kildare Observer or Leinster Leader, the two local papers; and, if so, whether he, as President of the Irish Local Government Board, will see to a more judicious distribution of such advertisements in the future?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Local Government Board in this case followed their usual practice with regard to advertisements relating to proceedings under the Labourers' Act—namely, to select those newspapers in which the Guardians published notices of their schemes under the Act, and also to publish in The General Advertiser, a paper which circulates gratuitously, and is easily accessible in all parts of the country. The Board do not think they could adopt a more judicious distribution of such advertisements. It does not appear reasonable on the part of the Guardians of Athy Union to object to the Local Government Board not having selected the two local newspapers mentioned in the Question, inasmuch as they had not done so themselves.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POST OFFICE ARRANGEMENTS, DUBLIN.

MR. ION HAMILTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will provide for an after collection of Letters on Sundays within the township of Rathmines (county Dublin), at a sufficiently early hour to enable Letters to catch the English and Provincial Mails; and, whether he can arrange to have Telegrams delivered free of charge within the boundaries of the said township?

MR. FAWCETT: At the present time, in the town districts of Dublin, there is no collection of letters on Sunday afternoon, and, so far as I am aware, there has been no demand for such a collection. This being the case, I do not think it would be expedient to treat Rathmines in this respect exceptionally. With regard to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, I may explain that under the regulations framed pursuant to the Telegraph Acts, telegrams, when they are delivered at a distance beyond one mile from any telegraph office other than a head post-office, are charged portorage. In these circumstances, I am sorry that it would not be possible to give a free delivery of telegrams in those portions of Rathmines which lie beyond a radius of one mile from the Rathmines post-office.

NAVY—H.M.S. "BENBOW."

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he will state, approximately, how much money is to be expended on the hull of Her Majesty's ship Benbow, and how much on the engines, this year, and when the Benbow will be handed over by the contractors; and, whether the armour-clads now building and to be built are to be partially armoured like the Collingwood, or completely armoured all round?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The amounts provided in this year's Estimates for the Benbow are, for hull £160,000, and for machinery £27,100. The contract date for her completion is July, 1886. All the armour-clads of the Admiral class have the water-line armour confined to the central part of the ship. In the Hero, as in her sister ship, the Conqueror, the water-line armour extends to the stem, but not to the stern.

INLAND REVENUE—WINE AND SPIRIT LICENCES.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there are cases in the City of London of merchants who, having taken out licences for dealing in wines and spirits, have continued to deal in them after those licences have expired, until detected by the officers of the Inland Revenue; and, if so, why no prosecutions have been instituted?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): Yes, Sir; I believe the right hon. Gentleman refers to the case of a foreigner who was detected selling wines and spirits without licence, although he had held a wine and spirit licence for other premises. He paid a fine of £50, with which the Board of Inland Revenue were satisfied. It has not been the rule to institute a public prosecution in all cases, and some discretion in this respect must be, I think, left to the Board.

MEXICO—RESUMPTION OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH ENGLAND.

MR. SALT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in reference to the following passage in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech:—

"Arrangements are in progress for the resumption of diplomatic relations with Mexico, and special envoys have been despatched by each Government to promote that end,"

Whether he can furnish any more distinct information on the subject; and, whether diplomatic relations have been resumed?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There is no further information to give upon the subject. Permanent diplomatic relations with Mexico have not yet been resumed, but the negotiations with this end are being carried on. Meanwhile the two countries will continue to be represented by special Envoys.

FRANCE AND TONQUIN—STATE OF AFFAIRS.

MR. SALT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can supply any information as to the present position and claims of the French in Tonquin; and, whether British trade in the East is affected injuriously by the events that have recently occurred?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Some communications of a strictly confidential character have recently passed in regard to the claims of the French in Tonquin; but I am not in a position to make any communication to the House. No complaints have reached the Foreign Office as to British trade having been injuriously affected.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES CONVENTION —SPIRIT TRAFFIC.

MR. BIRKBECK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to the following paragraph in the Protocol dated 29th October 1881, and signed at the International Conference held at the Hague, relative to the police of the fisheries in the North Sea, viz. :—

"The Conference is unanimous in declaring that it is exceedingly desirable to put an end to the abuses occasioned by the traffic in spirituous liquors carried on by the floating drink shops in the North Sea, but, having regard to the divergence of fiscal laws and regulations in the different Countries, it thinks that it ought to confine itself to expressing the hope that the Governments will endeavour to establish an International understanding for preventing these abuses, as well as the barter of fish, nets, &c. which results therefrom ; " and, whether any steps have been, or are being, taken in the matter; and, if not, whether, taking into consideration the loss of life at sea resulting from the injurious effects of the abuses referred to, and the serious losses incurred by owners on account of the bartering of nets, gear, and fish, for spirits, &c., Her Majesty's Government will, without further delay, communicate with the Governments of the other Countries who were parties to the North Sea Fisheries Convention?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: This matter has received the attention of Her Majesty's Government. When the Convention relative to the North Sea Fisheries was ratified last month, Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague was instructed to communicate with the Netherlands Government as being the Power which convoked the Conference referred to by the hon. Member on this subject. Her Majesty's Government await the answer of that Government to the representations made to them before taking any further steps.

INTERMEDIATE AND HIGHER EDUCATION (WALES)—ABERYSTWTH COLLEGE.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether an inquiry has yet been instituted into the financial condition of Aberystwith College with a view of deciding upon the expediency of continuing the present grant to the College; and, when he will be in a position to state to the House the decision of the Government?

MR. MUNDELLA: We are in communication with the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Rendel), who so ably represents the Governing Body of Aberystwith College. He has undertaken to submit, as soon as possible, a further statement for the consideration of the Education Department and the Treasury as to the present and prospective position and claims of the College, and the probable increase of local contributions.

ARMY—DUBLIN DISTRICT PAY OFFICES—THE WOODMAN TRUST.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If, recently, a Circular has been forwarded to any of the Pay Offices in the Dublin District, to the effect that any applications from Irish Pensioners to obtain any of the money gratuities derivable from the Woodman Fund are at present not to be entertained; if such a Circular has been issued; and, is it with the sanction of the Commander in Chief of the Forces?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: In the absence of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, I regret to say through indisposition, perhaps I may be allowed to answer the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Leitrim. Assuming that the charity referred to is the Woodman's Trust, I have to say that the only Circular sent out has been a general statement to the effect that from the low condition of the fund no applications for assistance can at present be received. This applied equally to Irish and all other pensioners. I may add that more than half of those relieved by this charity are Irish.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—OVER-PRESSURE IN BOARD SCHOOLS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether his attention has been called to the case of J. Abbott, who was summoned, on the 11th of March, before the Bradford bench of magistrates, on the prosecution of the school attendance officer, for not sending his son to school whole time; whether the prisoner produced, in his defence, the following medical certificate :—

"I have seen and examined Arthur Abbott. Last January twelve months he was trodden, by a horse, on the head, and sustained a severe injury, which compelled him to keep, for six weeks, in the infirmary. Since then the boy has been duller than he used to be, this being, I think, a remote effect of the injury. In my opinion it would be a mistake, and detrimental to his health, to send him to school for more than half-a-day, nor should he do any evening work with his head."

whether the magistrates, without reading the medical certificate, inflicted a fine on the prisoner; and, if the above allegations are true, whether he will restrain the Bradford School Board from instituting, through their school attendance officer, such prosecutions in future?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have inquired of the Bradford School Board and of the magistrates as to the conviction of the man Abbott for the non-attendance of his boy at school. It appears that the boy has only passed the First Standard, and, notwithstanding repeated warnings, the father continued to send him to work and to keep him from school. He was defiant to the School Board, said he had money, and could afford to pay fines. When at length he was brought before the magistrates he produced a note from Dr. Rabagliati, which was read by the clerk, and the Chairman of the Bench inquired whether this note had been submitted to the School Board. On finding it had not, and that the boy, who was said to be too delicate to attend school, was sent out to work and to sell newspapers in the streets till a late hour at night, they convicted Abbott, and inflicted a fine of 2s. 6d. Since the penalty was inflicted the man has applied to the Board for permission for the boy to work half time, stating that he had a certificate of the boy's inability to attend school full time. On asking him to produce this, he stated that it had been sent to London, as the matter was coming before the House of Commons. He admitted the boy was employed early and late in selling newspapers. In reply to the last Question of the hon. Member, it appears to me that the School Board and the magistrates have shown great forbearance in the discharge of a plain statutory duty, and I have neither the right nor the power to interfere with the action of the local authorities in such cases as this.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

MR. MAC IVER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any present intention of constructing or improving harbours of refuge or ports of shelter round the coasts of these Islands to save the lives of our sailors and fishermen; whether they are aware that the French Nation is expending the sum of five and a half millions pounds sterling for a similar purpose over a district of only 250 miles; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have it in contemplation to expend, except at Dover, any considerable sum of money in providing similarly improved harbour accommodation on dangerous coasts in Great Britain and Ireland?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The Government has no present intention of constructing or improving, at the public expense, shelter or refuge harbours; a Select Committee on Harbour Accommodation is sitting upstairs, and until their final Report has been made and considered, it would be premature to express any decision on recommendations which that Committee has made or may make. Whatever sum the Government of France originally intended to contribute to harbour works in the commercial ports of the Channel, the amount has subsequently been considerably reduced; and it has been recently suggested to supply some of the deficiencies by a tax of one franc on every passenger landing in any of the French ports. Except at Dover, the Government do not contemplate any immediate expenditure.

SCIENCE AND ART — BUILDING EXTENSION OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. COOPE asked the First Commissioner of Works, What progress has been made in the buildings for the extension of the National Gallery, for which a vote was taken last year, and when is it probable that they may be completed and thrown open for the use of the public?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that tenders were invited two days ago for the first portion of these buildings. It was hoped the whole building would be completed in about three years from the present time.

care that all these notices shall be laid before the Commission, and I have given personal assurance in that respect to the hon. Members.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the Returns?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am afraid I shall be obliged to contest the Returns on the part of the Government.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Why?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have stated the reasons. You cannot expect that the College authorities will undergo at the same time an inquiry for the House of Commons and an inquiry by a Royal Commission. I can give other reasons showing that these Returns would be extremely difficult to collect in any other way than by means of a Commission. Some of the information could not be officially given, and could only be given in reply to a Question. I shall take care that every information asked for in these Returns shall be given by the Commission.

MR. SEXTON: Who are to be the Members?

MR. TREVELYAN: We are carefully endeavouring to select proper gentlemen for the purpose. Several gentlemen have been communicated with.

MR. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that the Commission will report before the Queen's Colleges Vote comes on?

MR. TREVELYAN: I gave an undertaking some time ago that before the Vote is asked for I will inform the House of the progress made.

MR. SEXTON: When will the names of the Commissioners be announced?

MR. TREVELYAN: We are not in a position as yet to state. I hope to be able to state it on Tuesday or Wednesday, but it might be possible to state them to-morrow.

LAW AND JUSTICE — ARREST OF P. N. FITZGERALD.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. P. N. Fitzgerald, now detained in Sligo Gaol, was seized in the street in London, and forced into a cab without being shown a warrant for his arrest, and was refused permission, either while detained in London or in Dublin, to see any friend, or to consult a solicitor; whether, on arrival at Sligo, he was privately remanded by a magistrate, on the application of the police, in a room of the gaol; whether Mr. W. M. Stack, who waited upon Mr. Fitzgerald with an authorisation from Mr. M. J. Horgan, solicitor, to act as his deputy in taking instructions for his defence, was refused an interview with the prisoner by the governor of the gaol, the county inspector, and the resident magistrate; whether Mr. Fitzgerald has yet been shown the warrant for his arrest, or given any facilities for preparing his defence; and, whether the resident magistrate will be directed to hold any further investigations respecting the charge against Mr. Fitzgerald in open court, and in presence of the representatives of the press?

MR. TREVELYAN: Fitzgerald was arrested in London, taken at once to Scotland Yard, and sent the same evening to Dublin on his way to Sligo. The warrant was not shown to him because police were out looking for him in different directions, and the men who arrested him did not happen to have it with them. Moreover, the charge being one of felony, I am advised that a warrant was not necessary to justify the arrest. In the public interests it was not advisable to permit him to see anyone in London or Dublin, and I am advised that prisoners are not entitled to see persons while in transit. The prisoner was privately remanded in Sligo Prison, the remand being merely a formal one. Mr. Stack was refused permission to see him because he was unknown, and could get no one to identify him. Mr. Horgan was telegraphed to; but when his answer was received identifying Mr. Stack, the police could not find him. Fitzgerald is fully aware of the grounds of his arrest, and he will, of course, be afforded ample opportunities of preparing his defence. The inquiry will be proceeded with as rapidly as possible; and if the interests of justice do not require otherwise, it will be in open Court, as I have no reason to doubt it will be.

MR. O'BRIEN: I would wish to ask whether it is usual that a man should be arrested without a warrant, hustled away to Ireland, and remanded week after week since, and the police should be spreading false reports about him—[Cries of "Order!"]

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POSTAL ADMINISTRATION — RURAL LETTER CARRIERS — THE GOOD-CONDUCT STRIPE.

Mr. LYNCH asked the Postmaster General, What is the total number of parcels received and transmitted in Ireland since the introduction of the parcels post system on the 1st August last; what number passed through the hands of the rural letter carriers; what rule (if any) has been laid down for provincial postmasters in Ireland in order to secure for letter carriers the unfavoured allotment of the good conduct or long service stripes; and, whether the rural letter carriers have received any increase of pay to compensate them for the additional labour entailed upon them by the parcels post; and, if not, what steps are proposed to be taken to make an equitable improvement in their condition in this regard?

Mr. FAWCETT: The number of parcels posted in Ireland since the introduction of the Parcels Post up to the 31st of March was about 757,000, and the number delivered about 908,000. Of these, about 208,000 passed through the hands of the rural postmen. It has not been thought necessary, in consequence of the introduction of the Parcels Post, to make any general revision of the postmen's wages, but an increase of wages is given in cases where the circumstances are considered to justify it; in many cases assistance is provided. In reply to the last part of the hon. Member's Question, I may explain that the Provincial postmasters have not the bestowal of the good-conduct stripes. I am responsible for their bestowal, and great care is taken to give them to the most deserving. About half the postmen in Ireland who are on the Establishment are at the present time wearers of good-conduct stripes.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—THE TRANSVAAL—GRAVES OF OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS KILLED AT BRONKHAUS SPRUIT.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of Government has been called to the neglected state of the graves of the officers and soldiers killed at Bronkhaus Spruit; and, whether the British Resident at Pretoria has taken any steps in the matter?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: This subject has not been lost sight of. I would refer the hon. Member to Command Paper 3,419, pages 41 and 85, by which he will see that in 1882 steps were taken to enclose the burial place by a solid wall. I may add that the Resident at Pretoria paid another visit to the graves last December and directed some small necessary repairs.

SUEZ CANAL COMPANY—PROXIES.

Mr. MONK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any and, if so, what facilities are afforded to the holders of Suez Canal shares in this Country to record their votes by proxy at the meetings of the Suez Canal Company, without incurring the risk and expense of sending their shares to be registered in Paris?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I am obliged to my hon. Friend for calling my attention to this subject. The Statutes of the Company contemplate the appointment of "representants" at the principal capitals, with whom shares may be deposited for this purpose. I have asked our official Directors to see that any necessary facilities in this matter are now given; but I understand that no complaint on this subject has yet reached the Company. Probably the contemplated London office will be the best place for this deposit.

ROYAL UNIVERSITY (IRELAND)—THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES.

Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government are prepared to grant the Returns with regard to the Queen's Colleges (Ireland) and the Royal University (Ireland), which are specified in a Motion in the Order Book of the House?

Mr. TREVELYAN: When I announced a few days ago the decision of the Government to appoint a small Commission to inquire into matters connected with the Queen's Colleges, I stated that the terms of Reference would cover all the points mentioned in the Notice to which the hon. Member refers, and I expressed a hope that the Returns would not be pressed for. I shall take been addressed by the French Government to Her Majesty's Ministers upon this subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have seen the paragraph. The answers I have already given to the hon. Member are quite correct.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— SLAVERY AT SUAKIN.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any instructions have been sent to the British Consul at Suakin with respect to the treatment of slaves; and, if so, will those instructions be laid before Parliament?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No special instructions have been sent to Mr. Baker; but on March 20 last Lord Granville transmitted to Sir Evelyn Baring for his observations some suggestions connected with the question of slavery from Consul Baker, and the subject is still under consideration.

MR. BOURKE: In these instructions is the Consul at Suakin authorized to send back runaway slaves to their masters?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I could not answer that Question off-hand, because it involves matters of some difficulty. I shall be willing to inquire.

MR. BOURKE: Will these general instructions be laid before Parliament?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I did not say they were general instructions. I said Consul Baker made some suggestions which have been referred to Sir Evelyn Baring, and no decision has been come to.

MR. BOURKE: Will these suggestions be laid before Parliament?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not think it will be convenient to produce them separately.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
GARRISON OF BERBER.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a telegram has been received at Cairo from the Governor of Berber—

"Asking if reinforcements are coming. If so, he will make the best resistance possible with his garrison of 700 men. If otherwise, he asks for instructions prior to making the best arrangements possible with the Mahdi;"

whether a telegram has been received by Sir Evelyn Baring from General Gordon, in which

"General Gordon expresses his utmost indignation at the manner in which he has been abandoned by the English Government, and states his resolution henceforth to cut himself entirely adrift from those who have deserted him, on whom will rest the bloodguiltiness for all lives hereafter lost in the Soudan;"

and, whether it is true that Nubar Pasha declines to hold office longer unless help is sent to Berber, and that the Khedive proposes to send General Wood's Egyptian army to the relief of Berber?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The first and fourth parts of the hon. Member's Question will, I think, be more conveniently answered in connection with Question No. 36. In regard to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, full information will be given to the House in the Blue Book which I hope to lay on the Table of the House early next week; but I may state at once that the information contained in the hon. Members's Question is incorrect. No information to the effect that Nubar Pasha declines to hold office unless help is sent to Berber has been received at the Foreign Office.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
"THE TIMES" CORRESPONDENT AT KHARTOUM.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Mr. Power was in any way connected with Egypt or the Soudan before his appointment as Consular Agent at Khartoum; whether he is the same gentleman who accompanied the late Mr. O'Donovan there last year as his secretary; whether he receives any salary as Consular Agent; if so, what, and what are his duties and his functions; whether he is in possession of any exequatur either from the Egyptian Government or any other Government; and, whether it is contrary to the rules of the Foreign Office that any Consul, Vice Consul, or Consular Agent shall act as correspondent of a newspaper?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have no information with regard to the personal matters mentioned in the two first Questions of the hon. Member. Mr. Power receives no salary, but will be entitled as Acting Consul to draw an allowance of half the salary assigned to the post. His duties and functions are defined in the official Consular Instructions. He would require no exequatur as Acting Consul. There is no rule against the practice mentioned in the fifth head of the hon. Member's Question. It is, however, contrary to practice; but the circumstances of Mr. Power's appointment are altogether peculiar and exceptional. It would have been more correct if in the telegrams relating to the subject contained in Egypt, No. 1 and No. 5, 1884, Mr. Power had not been described as Consular Agent, which is a technical term given to gentlemen holding a permanent and not, as in Mr. Power's case, a purely temporary appointment.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then, do I understand that Mr. Power is Acting Consul and retains that office at Khartoum?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No; it is entirely a temporary arrangement. His title is Acting Consul. He was called Consular Agent in Sir Evelyn Baring's telegram, but that was an error.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Has any intimation been sent to Mr. Power to withdraw from Khartoum?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: As I stated in the debate on the Vote of Censure, Mr. Power was informed he was at liberty, notwithstanding his having accepted this duty, to leave Khartoum at any time he chose. But, as I also added at the time, Mr. Power, in the most honourable manner, declined to take advantage of the offer so made to him, and he continued at his post, although, not being a regular member of the Consular Body, he was under no obligation to do so, and notwithstanding the very great peril to which he was exposed.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: Can we be told when Mr. Power was appointed, by whom, and how long he has been in office?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Papers relating to that subject are already before the House. They are "Egypt, 1 and 5, 1884."

MR. RITCHIE: Will the noble Lord say how long Her Majesty's Government have considered Mr. Power to be in peril?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I cannot give the exact dates in the documents to which I refer; but the hon. Member will see from the Papers I mentioned the other evening that they are in the Blue Books.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The noble Lord has stated that Mr. Power is in very great peril. The Prime Minister has informed us that General Gordon is in no great peril. I wish the noble Lord or some other Member of the Government would inform us what peril it is to which Mr. Power is subjected, and from which General Gordon is free?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I quoted the statement I made in the debate on the Vote of Censure. I then said that Mr. Power had accepted duties which were undoubtedly of a perilous character, and, considering that he was not one of a regular staff, he was told that he might consider himself perfectly free to leave Khartoum at any moment. He was not bound to remain; but Mr. Power, in the most honourable manner, did remain, as I stated. I added nothing in the statement which I made just now to what I said in the debate on the Vote of Censure some time ago.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Will the noble Lord tell us what are the duties which Mr. Power has to perform?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: They are the duties of an Acting Consul.

MR. O'DONNELL: Will the noble Lord tell us what Government Mr. Power is accredited by?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I stated just now that it was not necessary that Acting Consuls should have an exequatur.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—NEW ORDER IN COUNCIL.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, with reference to his intimation that an Order in Council had been prepared and would soon be issued, which would restrict the power of local authorities to exclude cattle coming into their districts, Whether he will delay issuing such Order until local authorities have an opportunity of expressing their opinions on the proposition; and, whether the Privy Council will receive a deputation on the subject?

Mr. DODSON, in reply, said, he had not stated that an Order was prepared, but that it was in contemplation to issue one which would restrict the power of local authorities to exclude cattle from their districts. The matter, however, was in abeyance, pending the result of an inquiry into the alleged importation to Bristol of Irish cattle affected with foot-and-mouth disease.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.

Mr. T. A. DICKSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is now able to name a day for the Second Reading of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill?

Mr. O'SULLIVAN: I beg to ask if the right hon. Gentleman has seen by the papers of yesterday that the following was proved in public Court at Dundee on Saturday last:—

"That on the previous Sunday the Artizans' Club in that town admitted 510 men and seven women, and sold 298 glasses of whisky, 1,200 bottles of beer, and 18 gallons of draught porter ;"

and whether the right hon. Gentleman, as First Lord of the Treasury, thinks it fair that the sale of spirituous liquors should be transferred from those who pay licence duty to those who pay none?

Mr. GLADSTONE: The Question of my hon. Friend behind me has been supplemented by the Question of the hon. Member opposite. I will answer that Question first, and I will divide it into two parts. The first part refers to a statement in the Irish papers, which I have not seen, as to a considerable quantity of liquor dispensed on the Sunday in the place mentioned. That appears to me not to be so much a matter for Question to me as for the speech the hon. Member may be inclined to make on the Sunday Closing Bill. Then he went on to ask if I thought it was fair that liquor should be thus sold in clubs instead of being sold by publicans, who were bound to pay duty? I think that also is a topic well suited for any discussion that may take place on the Sunday Closing Bill. With regard to the Question of my hon. Friend behind me, we put the Bill on the Orders for to-night, with the hope of reaching it if the debate on the financial proposals of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not last a very long time. If it does not come on to-night, we should give it a place on the Orders for 2 o'clock to-morrow, after the Bills of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, in respect of which we have no reason to suppose the debate upon them will occupy any considerable time.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, as the supreme authority, whether he was aware that nine out of ten of the Irish Members preferred that preference should be given to the Education (Ireland) Bill and the Purchase of Estates (Ireland) Bill, upon which they were agreed, over this measure, which was one of an exceedingly contentious character, and one viewed with comparative indifference by the vast majority of the people of Ireland.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Considering that the measures to which the hon. Member for Galway refers are not yet before the House, I could hardly say that we would be justified in not availing ourselves of any opportunity that might offer for proceeding with the Sunday Closing Bill. I have agreed to take the Estates Bill soon after Easter, and I still hope to redeem that promise.

Mr. MAURICE BROOKS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the fact that the persons whom it is proposed to enfranchise are those who for the most part will be affected by Sunday closing, he would defer the consideration of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill until the new constituencies shall have had an opportunity of declaring their opinion regarding it?

Mr. SEXTON rose to a point of Order, and asked whether the hon. Member could put a Question which contained matter of an argumentative character? He considered that the statement—

"Having regard to the fact that the persons whom it is proposed to enfranchise are those who for the most part will be affected by Sunday closing," came within the Standing Order dealing with the point.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he might tell the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that he was accustomed, from day to day, to see what he might term, he hoped, without offence, an "insinuating preamble," intended to draw out information in the shape of admissions which could not be directly made, and it occurred to him that a very slight attempt of that character had been made in the Question of the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Maurice Brooks); but, answering the Question directly, he did not think it would be right on any ground to postpone the Irish Sunday Closing Bill till the Franchise Bill was disposed of.

ENGLAND AND EGYPT.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When the Papers will be presented purporting to show that "the covenants under which this country has been acting in Egypt were not made by the present Government?"

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have presented those Papers to-day.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— BERBER AND KHARTOUM.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the assurance given by Her Majesty's Government that there is no apprehension at all of danger to General Gordon and the other Englishmen at Khartoum, it is a fact that General Gordon has requested Her Majesty's Consular Agent and Colonel Stewart to leave Khartoum, that measure being essential for their safety, and has stated that the only means of doing so would be by Equatorial Africa and the Congo?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the particulars enumerated in this Question, none of them are accurately stated, although, no doubt, they are the result of the best information at the hon. Member's command. He asks whether it is a fact that General Gordon has requested Her Majesty's Consular Agent and Colonel Stewart to leave Khartoum. It is not a fact. Then he asks whether General Gordon gave as a reason that that measure was essential for their safety. That is not a fact; and it is not a fact that General Gordon stated that the only means of leaving Khartoum would be by Equatorial Africa and the Congo. This Question not being accurately framed, I would prefer to leave the matter there and refer the hon. Member to telegrams which will be faithfully given to the House in the course of a very few days, and from which he will be able to form a much better judgment than I can convey to him across this Table. The hon. Member should observe, and the House should observe, that while we have reason to believe, through Sir Evelyn Baring, that General Gordon is not in receipt of some of our papers, and, indeed, of important telegrams of ours, on the other hand we have no reason to know that we are in receipt of all the telegrams that he has sent. For that reason, perhaps, it is that certain telegrams, particularly the telegram which the hon. Member has in mind, have to the Government an isolated appearance, and do not carry with them the full and precise signification of the documents now in our hands. I would, therefore, prefer that the hon. Member should wait for a short time until he can form his own opinion of the purport of the telegram, in which General Gordon certainly left it quite open to Colonel Stewart and the Consular Agent to leave Khartoum.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked when the Papers would be produced, and whether they would contain the telegrams referred to.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have said that I hope to lay before the House the Papers containing the telegrams early next week.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: May I ask whether it is the intention of the Government to include in the Blue Book telegrams which have been sent to General Gordon, which they think he has not received?

MR. GLADSTONE: We shall not exclude them. The hon. Member will understand we shall be obliged to present the Blue Book with a degree of uncertainty as to what telegrams General Gordon has received, and the same degree of uncertainty as to the telegrams sent to ourselves; but we certainly will not withhold them.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: The Prime Minister refers to a telegram as an isolated one. Would he lay it before the House at once?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: That Question was answered the other day. It is impossible to lay isolated telegrams on the Table. They would only mislead the House. As the Papers will be ready next week, I think the House would prefer, when it has information, to have full information.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: May I ask who is responsible for the extreme delay in printing a few telegrams and a small number of despatches?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I cannot admit that there is, or has been, any delay, or that the information to be supplied is likely to be very small. I cannot see how the hon. and gallant Member can know anything about it, as he has not seen the Papers.

MR. BOURKE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the fact that the inhabitants of Berber and Khartoum, under the impression that no relief is to be sent to them, may, in despair, submit themselves to the Mahdi, it is advisable to announce that a relief expedition will be sent as soon as the Military authorities think it feasible?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answering this Question I must carefully divide the two cases with which it deals conjointly, the cases of Berber and Khartoum. They are not, in our view, similar in a material respect. With regard to the case of Berber, we have already stated to the House that that place is, to all appearance, in danger. We have received communications with respect to its condition from Egypt, and we have made our reply to those communications; but we do not think it would be conducive to any of the interests involved to make any statement either as to the communications received, or the communications sent in reply—that is, as regards Berber. With respect to Khartoum the case stands thus. We see no reason to modify, in any respect, the statements previously made, that there is no military or other danger now threatening Khartoum. I will not refer to the speech of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), which was made almost immediately after the beginning of the Session, and which referred prospectively to the state of things before us. At the time it was quite natural to suppose that those who went to Khartoum might go into a position of peril; but I speak for my noble Friend and myself, according to the knowledge which we possess, and which the House will possess, I hope, in the course of three or four days, when we say that there is no military or other danger threatening Khartoum. The Question assumes that there is danger and apprehension respecting Khartoum at the present time, and the right hon. Gentleman asks me whether it is advisable to announce that a relief expedition will be sent as soon as the military authorities think it feasible. I do not complain of that Question, and before Notice of it had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the matter had had our careful consideration. What we conceive to be the case is this—that the country feels a profound interest, and likewise a strong sense of obligation dependent upon it, with regard to the safety of General Gordon. That feeling of interest and that strong sense of obligation with regard to the safety of that gallant and heroic officer Her Majesty's Government have fully shared from the very first, and they have been careful to put themselves in a position to fulfil this obligation in the sense in which they believe the country, in common with themselves, recognize it. Having made that statement, which I hope is sufficiently explicit and significant, it would not be possible, consistently with my public duty, to enter upon any further explanations.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: May I ask the Prime Minister if he can inform the House whether the garrison of Berber is in peril of being taken by the Arab tribes acting under the orders of the Mahdi, and subjected to the same fate as the garrison of Sinkat was subjected to? I wish also to ask whether the Government can say what information they have with regard to Berber? And further—and this, I admit, is rather a hypothetical Question—if the garrison of Berber were to fall, whether the position of General Gordon would not become one of imminent peril?

MR. GLADSTONE: I understand the noble Lord to ask whether, if Berber were to fall into the hands of the tribes around it, the position of General Gordon would not then become one of peril. We believe, according to all the information we possess, that there would be no essential change in the position of Khartoum in consequence of that change in the position of Berber. With respect to the important matter in the first part of the Question, we have no reason to believe that there is any risk at Berber of any such catastrophe as unfortunately happened at Sinkat.

MR. BOURKE: With reference to the last part of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, may I ask him whether it is true that the Council of Ministers at Cairo yesterday decided that it was necessary to send an expedition, half English, I think it was, and half Egyptian, to Berber?

MR. GLADSTONE: I must make two replies to what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman. The statement which he has embodied in the form of a Question, as far as my knowledge goes—and I think my knowledge is pretty direct and accurate—is widely apart from the fact. Secondly, I must refer him to the answer I have already made—namely, that I think that for us to describe the communications made from Egypt, or the replies we have made to those communications, would be prejudicial to the interests involved.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, when the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs answered his Question with respect to Berber, he stated the Prime Minister would deal with it in his reply; but the Prime Minister had not answered one point in his Question. He wished to know whether it was true that a telegram had been received by Sir Evelyn Baring from General Gordon, in which General Gordon had expressed his utmost indignation at the manner in which he had been abandoned by the English Government. He would also ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he still adhered to the statement he made yesterday with regard to the comparatively valueless character of Mr. Power's information, based on the alleged fact that he was merely a Consular Agent at Khartoum?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he had answered the latter part of the hon. Member's Question by stating that full information would be given in the Blue Book, which would be laid on the Table early next week, while as to the former part he could say at once that the hon. Member's information was incorrect.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOTT: I wish to ask the Prime Minister a Question, because I think in the answer he has given the country will hardly understand what the Government are going to do. I wish to ask the Prime Minister a plain Question—Whether the Government have made up their minds, while there is still time, to endeavour to relieve, not only the garrison of Berber, but the 2,000 women and children who had been sent from Khartoum, and are now in Berber?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry the hon. and gallant Baronet should have put a Question which I have already answered in the most explicit terms by saying that we have received a communication with respect to the condition of Berber and have replied, but that it would not be conducive to the interests of those concerned that we should state the nature either of the communications or the reply.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked whether the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs could inform the House how many women and children who had left Shendy had been massacred?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No further information has come upon that subject. As I stated the other day, the only information we have was that sent by M. Cuzzi, General Gordon's agent at Berber, and his words were that they were believed to have been massacred.

MR. ONSLOW asked when it would not be detrimental to the public interest to give the information to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded?

MR. GLADSTONE: When it will not be detrimental to the interests involved, it will be our duty to give the information.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am afraid the question which is uppermost in everybody's mind has not been fully answered. It is this—Is it, or is it not, the intention of Her Majesty's Government to send an expedition or otherwise to protect and relieve General Gordon?

MR. GLADSTONE: That Question involves interests of a wider scope than perhaps the right hon. Gentleman intends, when he asks, Is it the intention of Her Majesty's Government to send an expedition to protect and relieve General Gordon—[Cries of "Or otherwise!"]

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I said "or otherwise to relieve" him.

MR. GLADSTONE: Well, what I have said is this distinctly. We believe the country recognizes an obligation with respect to the safety of General

Gordon, and we have ourselves fully recognized, and do recognize, that obligation, and, recognizing it, it is our duty and care to put ourselves in a condition to fulfil it should the occasion arise. Beyond that it would be contrary to my functions to go.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
ACTS—FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN CAMBRIDGESHIRE.

MR. HICKS inquired of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he was in a position to give the House any information as to the 101 bullocks which on the 14th of this month were brought from Liverpool to Wimpole in Cambridgeshire; and, further, whether they came from abroad, and whether he could inform the House as to what parts of the country the remainder of the cargo had been sent?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, the animals attacked with foot-and-mouth disease at Wimpole were part of the number of 101 animals to which the hon. Member referred. They were landed at Liverpool from the steamer Quebec on the 9th of April from Canada. They passed the Inspector of the Privy Council on the 10th as being free from disease. They were exposed for sale in the Liverpool Stanley Market on the 14th, and were again passed by the Market Inspector before they were sent into Cambridgeshire. The agent of the Canadian Government wrote to him calling attention to the fact that nine days elapsed after the arrival at Liverpool before the disease appeared, and 20 days, or thereabouts, after they were shipped from Canada. The Privy Council had sent an Inspector to Cambridge to inquire as to the rest of the 101 which were sent to Cambridge, and the Inspector at Harwich had been instructed to inspect the diseased animals at Wimpole, and the Privy Council Inspector at Liverpool had also been instructed to inquire as to the destination of the remainder of the cargo landed from Canada on the 9th instant.

MR. HICKS wished further to draw the attention of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the fact that when the cattle were reported to the Inspector in Cambridgeshire on the 18th, as suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, they were in a very advanced stage of the disease.

Mr. Gladstone

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked whether the Prime Minister contemplated such an alteration of the Business for to-morrow as would interfere with the discussion of the Notices of Motion of private Members?

MR. GLADSTONE: We propose to have a Morning Sitting to-morrow.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked for the indulgence of the House for a few moments in order that he might draw attention to a matter intimately connected with the rights and privileges of private Members. ["Order, order!"] He was not in the habit of intruding unduly on the time of the House. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" "Oh!" and "Move the Adjournment!"] He could move the Adjournment, but he preferred to appeal to the indulgence of hon. Gentlemen. [Cries of "Order!" and cheers.] On a day near the end of last Session he had secured the first place on the Notice Paper, it being his intention to direct attention to a most important subject. The Government, however, asked— [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. LABOUCHERE: I rise to Order. I wish to know, Sir, whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order? [Cries of "Move the Adjournment!"]

MR. J. G. HUBBARD: Then I shall ask leave to move the Adjournment.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is not in Order in the course which he is now pursuing—in raising a question of debate at this stage of this evening's proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman is, however, entitled to ask a Question with reference to the Morning Sitting to-morrow.

MR. GLADSTONE: I may be permitted to say that the House will, of course, meet at 9 in the evening, when the right hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity which he desires.

MR. GORST asked whether the Prime Minister would consent that in future a Morning Sitting should only be proposed by a substantive Motion. The present practice was to say simply, when the Orders were read over, just before the adjournment of the House, that such or such a Bill would be brought forward at 2 in the afternoon.

MR. GLADSTONE: If the hon. and learned Member wishes to propose an alteration in the established practice it is quite open for him to do so.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Are we to understand that the Government have definitively decided to hold a Morning Sitting to-morrow, or is it to be contingent, as was stated yesterday by the President of the Local Government Board, on the progress made with Business to-night? The two statements are quite distinct.

MR. GLADSTONE: If we are able to dispose of the Orders in question to-night, the Attorney General's Bill, and the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, we shall be able to dispense with the Morning Sitting.

PARLIAMENT—MORNING SITTING.

NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE (RULE 2).

MR. J. G. HUBBARD, Member for the City of London, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, viz., the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose a Morning Sitting To-morrow.

The pleasure of the House not having been signified—

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman proposes to call attention to a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the intention of the Government to take a Morning Sitting to-morrow. The House will judge of the importance of the matter. It is my duty to ask the House that leave be given to the right hon. Gentleman. Is the right hon. Gentleman supported by 40 Members?

And not less than 40 Members having risen in their places—

MR. J. G. HUBBARD rose to move the Adjournment of the House. He said that nothing would induce him to take such a course except the conviction that the rights and privileges of independent Members had been very gravely interfered with, and were, in fact, in very great danger. There were but three days in the week upon which private Members could call attention to matters of importance, and by the action of the Government these were practically taken away. On more than one occasion last Session he had been fortunate enough to gain an opportunity for proposing a Resolution on a very important subject—namely, the re-adjustment of our fiscal system; but the Government had stepped in on each occasion and prevented him from carrying out his purpose, and now they intended again to frustrate his object by taking a Morning Sitting to-morrow. What was the use of Members of experience, charged with the interests of important constituencies, coming down to that House when they were not given an opportunity of making their voices heard? Members might as well pair off at once, and leave the administration of the country to a Dictator. He trusted that the Government would see that the course which they were pursuing interfered with the independence and dignity of the House.

MR. GORST seconded the Motion. The Government might well pause to consider whether they were not going a little too far when so quiet and Constitutional a Member as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London was driven into such a course as that which he had been compelled to take on that occasion. There was no desire to intervene between the House and the Financial Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Had it not been for the impatience of some Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite—had they but shown the right hon. Gentleman a little indulgence, it would not have been necessary to move the Adjournment. The Government, he held, ought to show more consideration for the rights and privileges of private Members. In the present Session four Morning Sitings had been taken before Easter; and since the re-assembling of the House every private Members' day had been taken up. To show the extraordinary inconvenience of the course which was taken, it was not only private Members' crotchets that were interfered with, but even so important a measure as the Metropolitan Board of Works (Further Powers) Bill was postponed three times before Easter in consequence of the Morning Sitings which were held. The Prime Minister knew that no previous intimation of a Morning Sitting had been given; it had been quite sprung upon the House, and hon. Members had been taken by surprise; and as no formal Motion was now made in order to fix a Morning Sitting, Members had little or no opportunity of protesting against such Sittings.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Hubbard.)

CAPTAIN PRICE said, that he had a Motion on the Paper for to-morrow of a very important character on the form of Government in Jamaica. On three separate occasions he had obtained an opportunity of making that Motion, and on three separate occasions the Government had induced him to withdraw it. It was an important matter, for the reason that absolutely the only way in which the people of Jamaica could make known their grievances in that House was by getting some private Member to ballot at the Table for an opportunity of bringing the matter before the House. There were at the present time on the Table of the House some very important Papers having reference to Jamaica; and he hoped that if he were obliged to withdraw his Motion again to-morrow, Her Majesty's Government would give him another opportunity of bringing it forward.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): It is not my business to discuss the question whether any change has ever taken place in the practice of the House. All I can say is, that what has been done in this case has been the course which has been adopted for many years past. Besides, Notice was given on Wednesday that there would be a Morning Sitting on Friday. ["No!"] Well, the circumstances under which a Friday Sitting would be taken were stated; and judging from the cheers of the Opposition it was clear that the contingency anticipated would arise. What I want now to do is, to suggest to my right hon. Friend opposite a course which he can take, and which I think he will see will give him a full opportunity of discussing the question he is desirous of bringing forward. To-morrow the first Motion is a Motion by the right hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Wigtonshire (Sir John Hay) regarding Portpatrick Harbour. Therefore, the subject in which my right hon. Friend is interested can only be brought forward for discussion, and not as a Motion; and I take it for granted that my right hon. Friend would then make an interesting speech at about 10 o'clock to-morrow night, when he would have abundance of time to inform us of his view. He will not, however, then have an opportunity of taking a Division upon his Motion. What I would suggest is this. I will undertake at the end of my Budget Statement this evening to move the Income Tax Resolution. My right hon. Friend will then, at the end of my Financial Statement, have an opportunity of making the precise Motion he proposes to make, but cannot actually make, to-morrow. That, I think, is a fair offer; for my right hon. Friend will, in fact, be in a better position by adopting the course I have suggested than he would be in if he brought forward his Motion to-morrow.

MR. J. LOWTHER: The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has omitted to notice the true position of affairs. I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that on Tuesday last I distinctly asked a Question with regard to the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, whether the promise made by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster of a Ministerial statement respecting that Bill would be made at a Morning Sitting, and the answer was in the negative. ["Hear, hear!" and "No, no!"] The answer was certainly understood on this side of the House to be in the negative, and the House was then left under the impression that no Morning Sitting would be held. What happened yesterday? Why, Sir, an announcement was undoubtedly made that, under certain circumstances, a Morning Sitting might be held. It was then said that in the event of the House not advancing to-day a certain Bill—[Mr. WATSON: Three Bills.] Yes; three Bills were mentioned, two of which were mentioned as Bills waiting for one of the Grand Committees, and it was said that it was important that one of these Bills should be advanced a stage for that purpose. I am not going to make any remarks on the so-called Grand Committees; for if I denied that they were what have so properly been called the grand failures, I should be guilty of two acts of indiscretion—one of stating what is not the fact, and the other of tempting hon. Gentlemen to follow me into an irregular discussion. Then, again, the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill is a measure which is likely to be the subject of prolonged controversy, and one which is likely to create a good deal of feeling in Ireland, and yet the House is left in the dark as to that. Without wishing to continue this discussion, I would venture to point out that there could be no surer way of retarding Public Business than by allowing hon. Members to come down to the House in absolute uncertainty as to the Business to be transacted and of the hour at which it is to meet.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he, as well as the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, had endeavoured in vain for two Sessions to obtain a day for the discussion of the question of the Government of Jamaica. There had been Papers of great importance referring to Jamaica laid upon the Table, and no opportunity for discussing them had been given. It was only fair that a loyal and important Colony should be allowed the opportunity of having its grievances stated, as this was the only means it had of having the redress to which it was entitled. In the circumstances, he would make an appeal to Her Majesty's Government to give the hon. and gallant Gentleman or himself an opportunity of bringing on the Motion.

MR. W. H. SMITH wished to point out that the course which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed was one which, instead of facilitating Public Business, would decidedly impede it. It was always understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a Statement upon the finance of the country. But if a side issue were raised, it would result in a red herring being drawn across the scent, and an entirely new method of advancing Public Business being introduced. The proper course was to proceed with the discussion of the Budget that evening. [MR. GLADSTONE: No.] Then it seemed they were not to discuss the Budget that evening. If, however, the Budget were discussed, there would be more time for the discussion of the other matter to-morrow.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman, if he will kindly reflect upon previous history, will see that he has fallen into an error of fact. The Budget is never discussed, for a practical purpose, on the day on which it is introduced. ["Oh!"] Never. I think I have heard 50 Budgets brought forward in this House; and it is a matter of the most elementary practice of the House that the Budget is never discussed on the day on which it is brought forward. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will see that he has fallen into an egregious error. The old practice was until, I think, 10 or 15 years ago, that only a few questions followed the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a day was then fixed for the discussion, if there was to be a practical discussion. Now, there is no doubt a practice under which hon. Gentlemen, without raising a positive issue to be decided by a Division, can give their opinions and set forward their views with regard to the finance of the country after the introduction of the Budget; and that is the very thing my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has proposed to the House, and he has proposed that it should be done on Thursday night with a practical issue, instead of on Friday night without a practical issue. I wish, therefore, simply to say that this is a perfectly regular proceeding; and if the right hon. Gentleman will ask any of his Friends sitting on the Bench with him, they will tell him it is regular. I wish to say one word with regard to Jamaica. I agree with my hon. and learned Friend behind me (Mr. Serjeant Simon) that it is very desirable that it should be discussed, and my right hon. Friend near me has pointed out a way in which it may be done. If the Motion about Jamaica stands second to-morrow, it would come on about 9 o'clock, in the middle of the dinner hour. But after the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. G. Hubbard), which can only take a very short time, there will be an excellent opportunity for discussing it.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: It is quite true that no practical issue is discussed on the night of the Budget, as the right hon. Gentleman says; but I do not think that my right hon. Friend contemplates raising any issue upon which we should come to a vote. Undoubtedly, there is always a fair latitude after the Financial Statement for obtaining certain explanations. I think the course proposed is not altogether fair to my right hon. Friend. This is very early in the Session to be taking so many Morning Sittings; but it is for my right hon. Friend to consider whether he can come to any arrangement with the Government as to the time at which he can bring on his Motion—for instance, whether they will undertake to make a House and keep a House for him to-morrow evening?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes; we will.

MR. MACFARLANE asked whether the arrangement suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer would prevent his Motion coming on?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): No, Sir.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR begged to renew his appeal to the Prime Minister with regard to the Irish Education Bill and the Purchase of Estates (Ireland) Bill. He wished to say there was a very strong feeling indeed among the Irish Members that the right hon. Gentleman was making a mistake in giving preference to the Sunday Closing measure. He spoke with impartiality in this matter, for he never gave a vote for or against the Sunday Closing Bill, and he did not intend to do so; but he thought the right hon. Gentleman might in this matter interpose his authority, as the Gentlemen responsible for Irish affairs both inside and outside the House seemed to go against the prevalent Irish feeling in small things as well as large. Several times in the course of the present Session representations had been made over and over again to the Chief Secretary and other Members of the Government in vain. He thought they were acting most unwisely and most injudiciously, and contrary to the feelings of the vast majority of the Irish Members, in giving preference to this Bill, which was an exceedingly contentious one. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the Education Bill and the Purchase of Estates (Ireland) Bill were not yet before the House. That was quite true; but there was a general consensus of opinion among the Irish Members that those Bills transcended far and away in importance the Sunday Closing Bill, and they would not be likely to give rise to any considerable opposition or difference of opinion; whereas the debate on the Sunday Closing Bill would be met with very strong and very obstinate opposition. He made this appeal to the Prime Minister because he believed there was no use in appealing to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and he said that in no discourteous sense. The right hon. Gentleman's mind with regard to Irish matters seemed to be acting under some outside influences which he was unable to resist.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, that upon the undertaking of the Government to keep a House to-morrow he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

MR. MAC IVER said, he thought the Government arrangements were most objectionable.

MR. WARTON said, he must protest against the practice of taking Morning Sittings so early in the Session without giving the House an opportunity of deciding whether there should be such Sittings or not.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked whether the Government would undertake to bring on the Colonial Vote at a convenient time for him to raise the question of Jamaica?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT invited the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to explain his statement made on Tuesday that there would be no Morning Sitting on Friday.

MR. DODSON was not aware that he had used the words "Morning Sitting" at all. He had said that the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill would be put down for Friday, not with the intention of proceeding with it, but in order to enable him to make a statement as to the intention of the Government with regard to it.

MR. LEAMY inquired whether the Chief Secretary would inform the House if the Education Bill was ready, and when it would be introduced?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Education (Ireland) Bill is ready; and, as I have already stated, I shall be prepared to introduce it to the House when the Sunday Closing Bill for Ireland has made practical progress.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not agree with the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) in the opinion he entertained of that Bill. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) did not regard it with indifference; on the contrary, he was strenuously in favour of it, and would endeavour to be in attendance to support it; but, at the same time, he could not shut his eyes to the fact that, as it at present stood on the Ministerial programme, it was practically blocking all the other Irish measures; and he appealed to the Prime Minister whether he ought not to make some modification in the programme—at any rate with regard to that Bill?

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ARREST OF P. M. FITZGERALD.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that as he was not able to get any satisfactory answer from the Chief Secretary for Ireland this afternoon, in reference to the case of Mr. Fitzgerald, he was under the necessity of stating the facts perhaps a little more fully. Mr. Fitzgerald's own account was that on Thursday he was proceeding across London Bridge to make a business visit, when a man rushed at him and, seizing him, called out—"You are Fitzgerald; I arrest you for treason felony." Mr. Fitzgerald asked to see his warrant. He replied that he had none. The Home Secretary declared that a warrant was unnecessary; but if a warrant had to be drawn up, as the Chief Secretary admitted, surely it was necessary that it should be shown to the person arrested. Fitzgerald said he was forced into a cab and taken to Scotland Yard. He asked to see some friends, or, at least, a lawyer, but was refused. He was taken to Dublin, and again he requested to see several persons, one of them a doctor. Again he was refused, and was driven away upon a long journey to Sligo, and there taken into a room in the gaol, and even then no copy of the warrant was shown him. In Sligo he was refused legal assistance. His legal adviser, Mr. Stack, from the office of Mr. Horgan, travelled all night from Tralee to see him, and presented himself at the gaol, where he was informed that he could not be permitted to see his client. He applied to the Resident Magistrate, and could get no satisfactory answer from him. There could be no possible motive for treating this man as he had been treated, except, what he believed was at the bottom of the whole matter, the desire to create an impression that he had turned informer. Other persons, also, had been arrested on a charge of treason felony, and kept in separate cells, subjected to secret visits from men like George Bolton, broken down, ill-treated, and told that such and such a man had turned approver, in the hope that they themselves would follow the same course, and invent some story. Fitzgerald was a respectable man, a commercial traveller, a man against whom he believed no charge of sedition could be established, and he was seized in London, carted away to Ireland, and then the public were told, through the Press Association, that he had turned informer. Such indignities were not possible in England, even in its worst moments of panic and alarm. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would have something to tell them in the way of justification for treatment of that sort. What was there in the state of Ireland which made it necessary that the man should be treated in that infamous manner? He could not suppose, though he wished it, that the English rule was in such desperate straits in Ireland that, in order to preserve it a little while longer, it was necessary to go to lengths of this kind. He wanted to know why it was necessary for the Government to do those things? In the cases of the prisoners charged with organizing explosions in England, these men were refused for a time permission to see their friends; yet the Home Secretary, after thinking over the matter, withdrew his objection, and allowed them to see their friends. Why was not the same thing done in Ireland, in cases where there was much less ground for apprehension? He had asked the right hon. Gentleman, also, for some undertaking that in the future proceedings against Mr. Fitzgerald he should be produced in open Court, and that the proceedings should take place in the presence of the representatives of the Press. That was but a very small guarantee of the proper administration of justice in Ireland. It was the only guarantee they had, and he thought it should be remembered that proceedings in open Court were now somewhat guarded in Ireland; but the proceedings conducted in private in prison cells in Ireland were worse today than they were a century ago in England. He wanted to know what was the objection which was brought up against having reporters present, so that, at all events, the man's friends might know what the charge was against him, what was the evidence against him, and what was the position he held. If that was not done, he should strongly object to the whole proceedings as simply vile and miserable, and a libel against this man, in order to ruin him with his friends, and drive him to despair, and as an attempt to make him give testimony against guiltless men, or to make him the victim for someone else.

MR. SEXTON said, that before the Speaker left the Chair he wished to support the hon. Member for Mallow in his efforts with regard to this gentleman, Mr. Fitzgerald. He did not dwell so much upon his arrest in London, nor even so much upon the proceedings in Dublin; but he did dwell, with the utmost earnestness and indignation, upon the treatment which he had received in the gaol in Sligo. He complained, first, that he had been refused the assistance of an ordinary legal adviser, a refusal which would never have been made in England; secondly, that the proceedings against him were taken in private; and, thirdly, that the police and Press had circulated false rumours about him for the purpose of inducing him to turn informer. Well, this, he said, was a most vile and scandalous system, and one which, in effect, would give rise to the most corrupt and dangerous form of perjury in Ireland. With regard to the men of Tubbercurry, they had been several weeks in prison without trial. All of them were persons who occupied a respectable position, and yet they were taken out of their beds in the dead of the night. They were hustled into gaol, and had not been allowed to obtain adequate legal assistance. The proceedings against them he regarded as having been conducted in a manner which was highly improper. They then found from day to day vile rumours against one or other of them of the nature of which his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Brien) had complained in the case of Mr. Fitzgerald. There was nothing whatever in the condition of Ireland at present which would warrant such a course of procedure. As regarded crime they were in a most favourable position; and therefore he would ask why the Government resorted to proceedings which were mediæval and barbarous in their nature? He would wish to receive from the right hon. Gentleman an assurance that this would be discontinued, and that the prisoners would be treated fairly and justly. He would ask him to communicate to-night with the magistrates in Sligo and direct them to proceed with the cases. He would also ask him to specially direct Mr. Moloney, R.M., to bring forward any adequate and material evidence which he had. The magistrates should then be directed to proceed with the case to a Constitutional and definite issue. He did not want to ask what the evidence was; but he would ask them to bring it forward if they had had it, and if not he would ask for the prompt acquittal and release of the men if there was no evidence against them. If there was evidence, why could it not be produced; or did the Government want to wait until they were able to manufacture evidence by continuing this system of private examinations, and at the same time spreading false malicious statements in the public Press. He would ask that the very next examinations after the present remand expired should be conducted in open Court, and that whatever evidence they had against these 11 prisoners should be produced; for he might inform them that it was the universal belief in Sligo that there was no evidence against them at all. If there was sufficient evidence to justify any intelligent, rational magistrate, they should be committed for trial; but if not they should be discharged at once. If they did not do this, they would find it very hard to convince the Irish Members that the whole case was not an attempt to obtain manufactured evidence. He observed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) smiled. He was a witness in his time as Chief Secretary of facts and proceedings of this nature; and he would like to ask him how much he thought they contributed to the success of his administration? The Irish Members could not tolerate prisoners being pursued and treated in this manner in Ireland at a time when the country was free from any serious crime.

MR. TREVELYAN: In reply to the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien). I can only repeat the substance of what I stated in answer to his Question, for that answer proved at once the whole case.

MR. O'BRIEN : It admitted the whole case.

MR. SPEAKER : Order, Order!

MR. TREVELYAN : The hon. Member has made several charges against the action of the authorities in England and in Ireland ; but I cannot perceive that he mentioned anything out of the usual course that had been done in this case. I was advised, as I told you, by our legal adviser in Ireland ; and I have since seen that the Home Secretary confirms that advice, in substance, in the few remarks which he addressed to the House. I am also advised by several other hon. and learned Gentlemen that there is no doubt about there being a law to the effect that where a felony has been committed, or is suspected to have been committed, a policeman may arrest without a warrant, or any other person may arrest and commit prisoner to the custody of the police. In this case the warrant was made out, but it could not be in the hands of every officer, and it was necessary, in order to arrest this person, that several parties should be on his track. It happened that the party that arrested him at the moment had not the warrant in his possession ; but I am advised that everything that was done was perfectly legal. The hon. Member then refers to what was the case about the prisoner's solicitor, and the hon. Member referred to what had been done by the Home Secretary in the cases of the English conspirators, who were eventually punished for a conspiracy to produce dangerous explosions, and said that in that case he eventually allowed these prisoners to see their solicitor. I am surprised after the explanation I gave that the hon. Member for Mallow should have retorted with such extreme warmth of language that Fitzgerald had been forbidden to see his solicitor. What passed was this. As soon as the prisoner had arrived at Sligo a gentleman presented himself at the prison who was not known to anyone there. He might have been a solicitor, or might have been anybody else ; and, accordingly, the authorities telegraphed to the solicitor whom he said he came from in order to see if this person was the person whom he represented himself to be. As soon as the telegram arrived from Mr. Horgan stating that this gentleman had come as his emissary or agent, the police looked for this gentleman but could not find him, and consequently for a time Mr. Fitzgerald was without legal assistance.

MR. LEAMY : I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the police informed Mr. Stack that they had telegraphed to Mr. Horgan, and would admit him if they got a reply in the affirmative ?

MR. TREVELYAN : I can quite understand the hon. Gentleman asking that question ; but, at the same time, he must allow that not having any information on the subject I am unable to answer whether or not that was the case. The precaution by the police was a precaution which was perfectly legitimate under the circumstances ; but there was no intention whatever to deprive Mr. Fitzgerald of legal assistance. The next question was that of the remand, which was private, and entirely a formal one. It was simply a policeman who stated that the evidence was not yet ready to be produced, and the remand was perfectly right and legal under the statute. As regards the former point, the next inquiry will be public ; and I may state that the Attorney General is now at the present moment at the Irish Office in London, and will communicate with the authorities in Ireland, and I am informed that, in all probability, at the next inquiry the evidence will be given in public. As regards the Tubbercurry prisoners, the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) has complained that they were unable to obtain adequate legal assistance. Well, as to that point I will inquire into it, and will give the hon. Member all the information which I can obtain upon the subject. With regard to the remands, it was necessary in grave cases to have remands given, and it was not exceptional to Ireland. I am informed that in the case of the English prisoners—I mean Dr. Gallagher and his accomplices—the remands were very frequent, in all as many as 11.

MR. LEAMY : What about the inquiries ?

MR. SPEAKER : Order, Order !

MR. TREVELYAN : As regards the private inquiries, it is quite impossible for me to instruct magistrates ; such a course would be irregular, and, I believe, in fact absolutely unconstitutional. The Government will be able, however, to consult their own counsel as to the cases; and on the point of remands they would see that the cases would be brought on for trial with the greatest possible despatch. He hoped that this answer would satisfy the hon. Member.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—DEATHS IN WATERFORD GAOL—CASE OF JAMES COMMINS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LEAMY said, he wished to obtain some information as to a case which he had brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. It was a case to which the Irish Members believed they were entitled to have an answer. He alluded to the death of a man named James Commins, in Waterford Gaol. The facts of the case were as enumerated in a Question put to the right hon. Gentleman. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was a fact that this man was arrested on the 17th of April, and sent to gaol in default of paying a small fine; whether a day after his imprisonment he was found talking in his cell to himself, and thereupon the Governor of the gaol ordered the man to be put into a strait waistcoat; whether he burst the straps a day or so afterwards, and that he was then strapped down on the bed in the cell in which he was eventually killed; whether during that time he was not allowed to be visited by his friends; whether two similar cases had not occurred in the same gaol? He also asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was a fact that at the inquest held upon this poor man, the prison doctor swore he died from disease of the heart, whilst two other doctors swore he died from inflammation of the lungs; whether evidence was not given by the chaplain of the gaol to the effect that he saw the man in his cell with his hands tied, and no clothing on him except a night-shirt? The right hon. Gentleman's answer was that it was quite customary to treat prisoners in that manner. Then, again, he was asked why the man was held down in such a way, and his answer was that he was insane. Now, there was a rule that the moment a man got insane in goal he should be at once removed to a lunatic asylum. Why was not that done in this case? Instead of that, he was left practically naked, and tied down in a cold cell for a fortnight, until he died from the brutal treatment he had received. He asked the Chief Secretary the day before yesterday whether this case would be publicly investigated; and his answer was that the Local Government Board had sent down an officer to hold an inquiry. But under what circumstances was it held? The Visiting Justices were not informed of it, and none of the relatives of the deceased were given an opportunity to be present at it. And the result of the inquiry the right hon. Gentleman had not communicated to the House. Now, he wanted to know was that House going to sanction such brutal and inhuman treatment of a prisoner whose only offence was that he refused to pay a fine for the trespass of some of his cattle on a neighbour's land. If a man was guilty of a grave offence, if he was suffering penal servitude for murder, such treatment would be shocking and abominable. But what was worse was, that that was the second instance in that gaol in which a poor man strapped to his bed, and believed to be insane, had been found dead. He wanted to know if that was the system which was to be carried out in Irish prisons? Why did the right hon. Gentleman refuse to grant an inquiry into it? If he was not afraid of an inquiry, why refuse it in such a glaring case? [Laughter.] This was a matter which might well excite hilarity on the Opposition Benches; but he would tell the House that they would not cease from discussing this case until an opportunity was given for a public inquiry into it. The Chief Secretary had told him that an inquiry was held, and that a Report was made. But why was not the Report produced and laid upon the Table of the House—one-sided Report though it was—for no one was examined by the Inspector who went down but the doctor of the gaol, the Governor, and the warders. What was the good of a Report if it was only to be kept in a pigeon-hole in Dublin Castle? The chaplain of the gaol said at the inquest that it was usual to have prisoners stripped in this way, and strapped down on their beds. Would the Chief Secretary tell them what necessity there was for all this brutality, and why it was that he refused them a public inquiry? No doubt the officials of the Waterford Gaol were persons who were friends of people with great influence in high places, and Commins was poor and friendless, and with no one to speak for him; but he would tell the House, and he would tell the Government, that this sort of treatment of prisoners would stir up a bad feeling, not only in Waterford but all through Ireland, and that they on the Irish Benches would not rest until they had got satisfaction in this matter; even although the Chief Secretary had evidently made up his mind that a prison official was to be upheld, whether his conduct was right or wrong.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that as his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary could not, by the Rules of the House, speak again, he might perhaps be allowed to make a few remarks, especially as that was one of a class of cases of a painful character with which he was very familiar, having constantly to deal with them. In that particular instance, an allegation having been made that a prisoner had been ill-used and improperly treated, his right hon. Friend took the very natural course of directing that an inquiry should be instituted by the Prison Board in the first instance, in order to ascertain the facts. That was precisely the course which he himself would have taken under the like circumstances in England. He would have called for a Report from the Prison Commissioners in the first instance; and if he thought the case one that required further investigation he would have gone into the matter himself, and have obtained further information. That was precisely what his right hon. Friend had done. ["Oh, oh!"] He thought he might be allowed to proceed without interruption. He was not stating anything offensive. After receiving the Report of the Prison Board, thinking the case to be a serious one, his right hon. Friend directed that it should be referred to the Royal Commission, which had been appointed with great care, for the purpose of inquiring into the discipline of prisons in Ireland, and into any abuses which might exist in them. The Commission, he believed, had the confidence of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and those who sat with him. What fairer course could his right hon. Friend have adopted? The hon. Member opposite was right in calling attention to that case; but he had no right to impute to his right hon. Friend inhumanity or brutality.

MR. LEAMY: I beg your pardon. I did not say that the Chief Secretary was either inhuman or brutal. I referred to the treatment Commins received in gaol.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member had used towards his right hon. Friend language which seemed to him most offensive and entirely uncalled for. He hoped, however, that it would now be admitted that his right hon. Friend had acted in a just and impartial manner, and that he was not obnoxious to the reproaches that had been cast upon him.

MR. LEAMY said, he wished to explain. When he made his speech he was not aware that this case was referred to the Prisons Commission. It was only yesterday that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary refused to produce the Report dealing with the matter, on the ground that it was a confidential document; but he had said nothing about referring it to the Commission.

MR. TREVELYAN asked to be allowed to say a few words by way of personal explanation. He could not, of course, keep himself fully informed of all the details of the Irish administration; and the first he heard of this matter was when it was brought under his notice the day before yesterday by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy). He thought the matter very serious, and had since been in correspondence with Dublin about it; and it was only in the course of that morning he found that referring it to the Prisons Commission was the only way of having it properly inquired into. He had at once communicated his determination to that effect to the Irish Executive.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said that, as a Member of the Royal Commission now sitting on Irish Prisons, he had listened with deep interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Waterford. He promised the hon. Member that they would have this case fully investigated, and would have the officials over from Ireland with regard to it.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Sir Arthur Otway, I shall commence my Statement, in accordance with custom, by a review of the Finance of the year which closed at the end of last month—the year 1883-4.

With respect to the Revenue, the original Estimate, made in my Financial Statement last year, was that it would amount to £86,029,000, and that the Expenditure would amount to £85,789,000, the surplus being £240,000. But I stated in that speech that the Revenue did not include what was expected to come from the Parcel Post system, which would be established later in the year; and in the course of the Session we made this alteration, that, instead of deducting from the Revenue—as I proposed in my Financial Statement—£170,000 on account of the establishment of cheap telegrams, we added £200,000 to the Expenditure, part of £500,000 required to prepare for that establishment. The Parcel Post Revenue and Expenditure, according to the Estimate laid on the Table of the House later in the Session, were expected to reach £340,000 each. There were also one or two minor changes arising out of the Supplementary Estimates of the Session of 1883. When the Appropriation Act passed, the Revenue was estimated at £86,549,000, and the estimated Expenditure was £86,436,000, giving a surplus of £113,000. These figures have appeared since in the weekly statements of Revenue and Expenditure published every Wednesday. I may add that, during the present Session, Supplementary Estimates have been passed for £371,000 on account of the Army, and £147,000 on account of the Navy. We voted £500,000 on account of the contribution towards the expenses of the Afghan War, in anticipation of the payment this year; and other Supplementary Estimates in connection with the Civil Service and Revenue Departments amounted to £367,000, making total Supplementary Estimates of £1,385,000. Of course, against the Supplementary Estimates of the present Session savings are always expected on other Votes; and any comparison between the original Estimates of Revenue and those of Expenditure, if the latter include the Supplementary Estimates of the second Session, would be delusive.

Now, Sir, I will take, first, the Revenue of 1883-4, and I will compare the actual Revenue received both with the Estimate of it which we made and with the actual Revenue of 1882-3. I will take, first, the two great heads of Customs and Excise. It will be remembered that, in my Statement last year, I explained that it was practically impossible to divide the receipt of Spirit Duty between the Customs and the Excise, it being a matter of the greatest doubt whether the receipts on account of Spirits would be for foreign Spirits or British made Spirits. Following the line I then took, I will give the Committee, first, the receipt on account of Spirits under both heads; secondly, the Customs receipts, excluding Spirits; and, thirdly, the revenue of Excise, excluding Spirits. In 1882-3, Spirits had produced, according to my Statement last year, £18,540,000; and I estimated that we should receive, in 1883-4, £18,700,000. The actual receipt on account of Spirits was £18,435,000, being less than the actual receipt of 1882-3 by £105,000, and less than my Estimate of 1883-4 by £265,000. Therefore, Sir, we see that the slight increase of the previous year in the Spirit Duty stopped last year. If I am asked to give any special reason for that diminution, irrespective of the general reasons with which the Committee is well acquainted, I think I may say that the very open weather of last winter, undoubtedly, had a direct effect in the reduction of the amount received from the Spirit Duty during the winter months. This was especially felt in the Duty on Rum. Excluding the item of Spirits, the receipt in 1882-3, under the head of Customs, was £15,280,000. I estimated the receipt for 1883-4, in the Financial Statement of last year, at £15,350,000; and the actual receipt was £15,488,000. Treating the Excise in the same way, the receipt of 1882-3 was £12,765,000. I estimated it last year, for 1883-4, at £12,600,000, and the actual receipt was £12,780,000. It is necessary, however, as a matter of form, to compare the total receipts on account of Customs and Excise with the Estimate; and I find that, whereas I took £19,750,000 for Customs and £26,765,000 for Excise, giving a total of £46,515,000, the Revenue actually received was £19,701,000 for Customs and £26,952,000 for Excise, being a total of £46,653,000, or £138,000 over my Estimate. Under the head of Customs, there is nothing which calls for special remark in the Revenue of last year; but there are one or two items in the Excise Revenue as to which I may give an explanation to the Committee. In my Statement last year, I referred to the Hop Famine in 1882 as having led me to be cautious in framing the Estimate of the Beer receipt, that of 1882-3 having fallen short of that of 1881-2 by £131,000. But when I spoke we had no indication of the hop crop of 1883. That crop, however, was a very fair one. The price of hops, which had been in March, 1882, £7 5s. a cwt., rose in March, 1883, to no less than £26 a cwt. The price, however, fell in the autumn, and last month hops were about £9 10s. a cwt. The result was that the Beer Revenue greatly improved, the receipt being £238,000 more than my Estimate, and, in fact, within £50,000 of the receipt of 1881-2. The total receipt for beer was £8,531,000 in 1881-2; it fell to £8,400,000 in 1882-3; and in 1883-4 it was £8,488,000; whereas I had only estimated it at £8,250,000. So much for the item of beer.

The second item to which I ought to draw the attention of the Committee is the Railway Duty. The Railway Duty, if no change had been made in it last year, would have been estimated at £800,000; and I expected that, in consequence of the change, we should lose in the receipt of the year £135,000, bringing the net Estimate to £665,000. But, in point of fact, we have received £747,000, the excess being mainly, though not exclusively, due to a large payment by a particular Railway Company of arrears spread over several years.

The third item to which I wish to draw the attention of the Committee is the receipt from the Game Licences. One of the minor changes made in the Budget of last year was the introduction of a third rate of Game Licence in addition to the £3 and the £2 licences for a whole, or a half season. I proposed to Parliament, and the House approved, a licence of £1, which would be available for 14 days. I am happy to say that this small change has turned out most satisfactorily. The £3 licences were not affected by it. About 4,000 £1 licences have been taken out, and they more than covered the diminution of the £2 licences. The Revenue gained in all £2,600. The number of licences was 3,300 more than in the season of the year before; and I am happy to congratulate some hon. Friends of mine, whom I see sitting opposite, on having availed themselves of this provision, granted for the first time last year.

I now pass to the receipt from Stamps. The Revenue of 1882-3 represented a payment into the Exchequer on account of Stamps of £11,841,000. I estimated last year that the Stamp Revenue would be £11,510,000; and the actual Revenue was £11,620,000. I mentioned last year, in explaining to the House the basis of my Estimate, that what are properly called the Death Duties for 1882-3 had exceeded the Death Duties of the previous year by £300,000, and had exceeded the Estimates made by my Predecessor by £600,000. Keeping in view this great excess, and apprehending that it might be due to temporary causes, I felt bound to act with great caution in framing any Estimate for 1883-4 on the basis of the previous year's receipts. But to a great extent the special circumstances of 1882-3, which were given in explanation of that high receipt, recurred in 1883-4,—that is to say, there was a large number of estates the duty on which came into the account of the year. It may interest the Committee to know that, on 10 estates alone in the year 1883-4, no less a sum than £283,000 was received on account of Probate Duty—an amount which I believe is almost without parallel. The Death Duties, in fact, in 1883-4 reached as nearly as possible the same amount as in 1882-3; while the other Stamp Duties fell below the receipt of that year.

The Land Tax in 1882-3 produced £1,045,000. I estimated it at £1,040,000. The actual amount produced has been £1,070,000. The House Duty in 1882-3 was £1,755,000. I estimated it at £1,785,000. It has actually produced

£1,805,000. On these two heads of Revenue, no remark occurs which I need make to the Committee.

I next pass to the Income Tax. In 1882-3, the actual receipt on account of the Income Tax, at the rate, nominally, of 6½d., but not a full year's receipt, for some of it passed on to 1883-4, was £11,900,000. I estimated that the receipt for 1883-4, on the basis of 5d. in the pound, with the balance of the 6½d., would be £10,265,000. The actual receipt was £10,718,000, or £453,000 beyond the Estimate. I shall allude later in my Statement to this remarkable rise in the receipt from Income Tax; but, under the circumstances, I think no one can question the wisdom of the caution which we exercised last year. Now, these items constitute the whole of the Tax Revenue of last year. The Estimate was £71,114,000. The actual receipt was £71,866,000, as compared with the actual receipt in 1882-3 of £73,128,000. That higher receipt, as I have said, was mainly due to the additional 1½d. Income Tax.

I now pass to what is called the Non-Tax Revenue. The Post Office collected in 1882-3 £7,300,000, and I estimated that we should receive from it in 1883-4 £7,740,000, £340,000 of that sum being on account of the Parcel Post. We actually received £7,730,000. The Telegraphs in 1882-3 gave £1,710,000. I estimated for 1883-4 £1,750,000, and the actual amount received was £1,745,000. Crown Lands produced last year precisely what they produced the year before, and what I estimated—namely, £380,000. The Interest on Advances, which had been in 1882-3 £1,219,000, I estimated at £1,185,000, and it amounted to £1,196,000; and the Miscellaneous Revenue, which in 1882-3 had been £5,268,000, I estimated at £4,380,000, and it amounted to £4,288,000. Thus, altogether, the Non-Tax Revenue, as against £15,876,000 in 1882-3, and an Estimate for 1883-4 of £15,435,000, produced £15,339,000. To some points in reference to this Revenue I shall not refer now, but I shall deal with them when we come to the estimated Revenue for the present year 1884-5. The total Revenue, therefore, of last year, compared with the actual Revenue of 1882-3, which was £89,004,000, was estimated by me at £86,549,000, and was actually

I now proceed, Sir, to the Expenditure of last year. The permanent charge for the Debt was estimated at £28,954,000, and it actually came to £28,974,000. The Interest on Local Loans, which I estimated at £525,000, came to £478,000. The interest on the Suez Exchequer Bonds came to just what was estimated—namely, £200,000, and the other charges on the Consolidated Fund, which I estimated at £1,640,000, came to £1,590,000, so that the total charges on the Consolidated Fund, which I estimated at £31,319,000, were £31,241,000.

And now, Sir, I will go to what are called the "Voted Services," and it is necessary to make some comparison both with the original and the final Estimates, including the Supplementary Estimates. The original Army Estimate was £15,607,000, and including the Supplementary Estimate, mainly for the expedition to Suakin, it was £15,975,000. The actual expenditure was £15,910,000, as compared with £15,502,000 spent on the Army in 1882-3. On the Army Indian Home Charges the expenditure was originally estimated at £1,230,000, and the amount expended was exactly that sum. The charge for the previous year was £1,110,000. The original Navy Estimate was £10,757,000, and including the Supplementary Estimate, also for the expedition to Suakin, the total was £10,899,000. The actual expenditure was £10,729,000, as compared with an expenditure in 1882-3 of £10,409,000. We estimated last Session for a Vote in repayment to India on account of the Afghan War of £500,000. This Session I felt justified in asking the House to pay an additional £500,000 during the last financial year, and the whole of that £1,000,000 has been paid. The actual expenditure for 1882-3 under this head was, of course, only £500,000. We paid nothing last year on account of the original Egyptian Expedition, or on account of the small balances for the Transvaal Wars, which appeared in the Estimates for 1882-3. The amount of that expenditure in 1882-3 was £3,909,000. On account of the Civil Services, our original Estimates were £17,253,000, and including the Supplementary Estimates, they were £17,593,000, the expenditure in 1882-3 having been £17,336,000.

The actual expenditure, however, was only £17,181,000 in 1883-4; and I think that the Committee will not fail to notice the successful struggle for economy which these figures exhibit. For the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments the original Estimate was £2,775,000, the actual expenditure was £2,772,000, and the expenditure for the previous year had been £2,870,000. The original Estimate for the Post Office was £4,124,000, and including the Supplementary Estimates, the main part of which had reference to the Parcel Post, it was £4,565,000. The actual expenditure was £4,507,000, against an actual expenditure in 1882-3 of £3,828,000. The original Estimate for the Telegraphs was £1,518,000, and including the Supplementary Estimates, it was £1,718,000. The actual expenditure was £1,707,000, against an actual expenditure in 1882-3 of £1,510,000. For the Packet Service, the original Estimate was £706,000, and with the Supplementary Estimate it amounted to £724,000. The actual expenditure was £721,000, against an actual expenditure in the preceding year of £720,000.

And now I will compare the totals. The total Expenditure had been in 1882-3 £88,906,000. I estimated it originally at £85,789,000, and including the Supplementary Estimates, it stood at £87,819,000; but the actual Expenditure was only £86,999,000, and the Revenue having been £87,205,000, we have a surplus on the year 1883-4 of £206,000.

I will defer some remarks which I have to make on the Expenditure of last year until I deal with the Expenditure of the present year; but before passing from 1883-4, I think I ought to explain to the Committee the effect of the Debt operations of that year. The Committee will remember that last year we passed a very important Act dealing with the National Debt for 20 years. That Act provided that £70,000,000 of Funded Debt should be at once cancelled, and that Annuities amounting to £5,130,000 falling in in 1885 should also be cancelled, and that there should be substituted for them fresh Annuities. This operation has been carried out in its integrity. The result on the Debt, including the normal reduction in the year, is as follows. The Funded Debt, on the 31st of March, 1883, was £712,699,000. On the 31st of March last it was £640,631,000; so that the diminution in the Funded Debt has been £72,068,000. That has brought the total Funded Debt to a lower amount than it has ever been since 1811, and the interest on it is less than it has been since 1805. The Funded Debt now consists of the following denominations of Stock:—Consols, £345,302,000; Reduced Three-per-Cents, £83,491,000; New Three-per-Cents, £183,968,000; Two-and-a-Half-per-Cent Stock, £13,580,000; and all other denominations of the Debt, including the Debt to the Banks of England and Ireland, £14,290,000; in all, as I have just said, £640,631,000. The Unfunded Debt at the end of March, 1883, was £14,185,000, and it stood at the end of last March at £14,110,000. The value of Terminable Annuities at the end of 1882-3 was £27,571,000, and on March 31, 1884, it stood at £91,666,000. So that the total amount of Debt, which was at the end of March, 1883, £754,455,000, was on March 31, 1884, £746,407,000, making a net diminution of £8,048,000. This diminution is exclusive of £1,000,000 paid off in the year of the remaining liability to India for our contribution towards the cost of the Afghan War. Against this I must place the reduction of the balances, which were at the end of 1882-3 £6,973,000, and were at the end of 1883-4 £5,633,000. The reduction of the Debt in the four years from April, 1880, to the end of March, 1884, has been £25,198,000, besides the £4,500,000 paid off in respect of the Debt of £5,000,000 to India, and with balances increased by £2,349,000, making a total reduction, as nearly as possible, of £32,000,000 sterling.

And now, Sir Arthur Otway, I have finished my task of reviewing the finance of the year 1883-4, and I will proceed to the estimated Expenditure and Revenue of the financial year 1884-5, in which we now are. I ought, perhaps, to say, in connection with the Debt, that I have taken the occasion of the creation of a new series of Terminable Annuities to carry out still further a very valuable suggestion made by my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard), and that is to value them, not as they have hitherto been valued, as if Stock stood at 92·3, but as if Stock were at par.

It is upon that assumption that all the figures I give are based, both in regard to past years and to those of 1883-4. I think it will also be interesting to the Committee to know, in the same connection, that of the War Debt of £7,850,000, which we took over from our Predecessors in 1880, and of the promised contribution of £5,000,000 to India, making altogether £12,850,000, £11,000,000 have been paid off in four years, so that only £1,850,000 remain to be provided. We have also paid £6,860,000 out of our income for the whole of the Transvaal, the Egyptian, and the Suakin war expenditure. I have no other matter relating to the reduction of the National Debt to mention to the Committee.

I will now pass to the Estimates of Revenue and Expenditure for the current year, 1884-5. In the first place, I will deal with the estimated Expenditure. Before, however, giving the figures in detail, I must explain that, as the Committee will perhaps have observed from the Army Estimates, there no longer appears as a separate Estimate that for Indian Home Charges which was devised some years ago. For myself, I may say that I never quite understood why that Estimate, separate from the Army Estimates, was framed. But, however that may be, it was balanced by corresponding items of Miscellaneous Revenue, and in our view the time has now come for its disappearance, and for the preparation of the Army Estimates in such a way as to show the actual net expenditure; the gross expenditure being given in one column, and credits of this character in another, the difference being the net amount the Committee is asked to vote. I shall have to refer to this again later, when I come to the Army Estimates; but I ought here to say that, in the comparisons I shall have to make, this item will be omitted from previous years, so that the comparisons will be in all respects fair. I will now take the Expenditure of the year under the different heads. The Permanent Charge of the Debt we take at £28,884,000, as against an actual expenditure last year of £28,974,000, being a reduction of £90,000. That is due to our having been able to pay, last year, out of our balances, the whole of the £2,000,000 which was first a loan, and then a grant to India on account of the Afghan War. The Interest on Loans for Local Purposes we take at £525,000, as against £478,000 in the previous year. The charge for the Suez Loan is the same—namely, £200,000, and the other Consolidated Fund charges amount to £1,495,000, as against £1,590,000 last year. I will not weary the Committee with the details of this reduction; but the last year's charge contained the grants to Lord Wolseley and Lord Alcester, of £30,000 and £25,000 respectively. The total Consolidated Fund charges are, therefore, this year £31,104,000, as against £31,241,000 last year. Passing to Voted Services, the charge for the Army is £15,931,000, against an actual charge for 1883-4, adjusted, as I have explained, with reference to the Indian Home expenditure, of £16,095,000. I will now explain to the Committee the augmentation which is necessitated by the new arrangement made for the receipt from India on account of the Non-Effective Services. I should weary the Committee were I to endeavour to explain, on the present occasion, the details of this most complicated matter. Speaking shortly, however, I may say that amended arrangements were made with India, first in 1861, and secondly in 1870, under the latter of which the charge becoming payable in each year for the first time on account of soldiers taking their pensions was capitalized on the basis of 4 per cent interest, and the amount of the capital sum received from India was paid into the Exchequer and appeared among the Miscellaneous Receipts. But the result of this arrangement was somewhat remarkable. The arrangement was eminently favourable to India, because it—I know not why—omitted all the charge for previous pensioners, and unfavourable to us, because it assumed that we could invest at 4 per cent, whereas we can only invest at 3 per cent. But, in point of fact, India has been for some time considerably in arrear to us on account of these payments. On the other hand, the Exchequer also gained unduly, the capitalized value of any one year's first-granted pensions not really representing the pension charge for that year. It was a rough-and-ready method; but it turned out in the end to produce very different results from those which had been anticipated. For instance, in 1873-4, the sum paid into the Exchequer exceeded the real charge on the year by £92,000, and in 1879-80 by £186,000. We are now making fresh arrangements, under which, in the first place, India will pay up the arrears, and the over-payment to the Exchequer in past years will be gradually wiped out, at a cost to present and future years. Of course, this is unfortunate for us at the present time; but it would be impossible to allow past over-payments to the Exchequer to be left unadjusted, however much we have to suffer for the undue gains of former years. I shall lay upon the Table a Treasury Minute, in which we explain exactly the details of this change. Next I come to the Navy Estimate, which is £10,812,000, against £10,729,000 in 1883-4. The Estimate for the grant to India in respect of the Afghan War is £250,000, against £1,000,000 which we paid last year—1883-4—and this leaves only £250,000 payable next year, instead of £500,000, which would have been payable but for the prepayment I have described. When that is paid, the whole amount of the contribution to India will, I am happy to say, have been wiped out. The Civil Service expenditure is estimated at £17,244,000, against £17,182,000 last year; the Customs and Inland Revenue charges at £2,734,000, against £2,772,000; the Post Office expenditure at £4,753,000, against £4,507,000; the Telegraph Service at £1,735,000, against £1,707,000; and the Packet Service at £731,000, against £721,000. The total Voted Services will thus be £54,188,000, against £54,713,000 last year; and the total Expenditure, omitting for both years the Indian Home Charges, is estimated at £85,292,000, against £85,954,000 last year.

Here I think I ought to pause, to make a few remarks upon the present condition of our Expenditure. Last year, I promised my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) that I would carefully inquire, during the Recess, not only into the present rate of Expenditure, but also into the movements of Expenditure for some years past. My inquiry is not yet completed, but it has gone a long way. With the assistance of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney), and the heads of the principal Departments, I have gone through the greater part of the Civil Expenditure; and in Committee of Supply on the Civil Service Estimates some results of what we have done will be explained in detail, and our future prospects of economy will also be discussed. But I have made a comparison, which will interest the Committee, between the actual Expenditure of 1873-4—a year which can provoke no political feeling, as it was the last year of the former Administration of the present Prime Minister—and the Estimates which we are now submitting; and the figures, I think, may be studied with advantage. The net Expenditure on account of the Civil Service and Revenue Departments, after deducting the Extra Receipts, Fee Stamps, &c., was, in 1873-4, £16,442,000; and the net Expenditure proposed in these Estimates is £24,675,000, showing an increase of £8,233,000, or rather more than 50 per cent upon the former Expenditure. Now, I have analyzed this Expenditure as to its main, or, I may say, as to all its sources and branches, and I find this to be the result. Local Subventions, including the charge for the Police, have increased by £2,950,000; Public Education has increased by £2,367,000; the charge for the Post Office and the Telegraphs, including Post Office Buildings, has increased by £2,665,000; and these, together, give a total of £7,982,000. There remains, then, a balance of £251,000 to be accounted for. But there are some charges which, I think, stand out from the normal Expenditure when dealing with its increase. For instance, the collection of £5,700,000 additional Revenue has involved an additional charge of £83,000, after all only $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent on the Revenue collected. Parliament determined that the Surveys of the United Kingdom should be expedited, and this accounts for £112,000. The additional charge for the British Museum and Art Galleries this year amounts to £43,000; the recent arrangement as to the Friendly Societies' deficiency involves a charge of £48,000; Cyprus costs us £30,000; and the Irish Land Commission, although much heavier last year, is estimated to cost this year £87,000. If you add these figures together, you will find that they come to £8,385,000, against a total increase of £8,233,000; so that all the other Civil Services, in spite of large demands in some directions, show an aggregate saving of £152,000. This is no argument whatever against economy. On the contrary, I hope, and with some foundation, that we may be able to make even further savings than those we have succeeded in effecting by our investigations this year; but I think that the figures I have given shows a greater anxiety for economy on the part of the Public Departments than is commonly allowed. Even in the presence of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, I ought to say that in this matter to no one is more gratitude due than to him. He has worked hard and successfully; for the last year's Civil Expenditure, as I said before, in spite of large Supplementary Estimates, fell short of the original Estimates by £75,000, and my hon. Friend has shown the greatest zeal for the public in preparing the Civil Estimates of the present year.

I now pass to the Estimates of Revenue, and I must make, in the first place, a general remark. The present condition of the country is such that it is most difficult to forecast the Revenue with accuracy. We have to deal in this matter with very conflicting considerations. On the one hand, in many branches trade is still depressed, and, perhaps, may be still more depressed; profits generally are low, and incomes derived from land, whether by owners or farmers, are still in an unsatisfactory state. When I look to such indications as railway receipts, they do not give evidence of increase of prosperity, but possibly the reverse. On the other hand, I am bound to say that I think a careful study of the information we possess shows that the artisans and labourers of the country are doing well. Bread and the common articles of consumption are at a very low price, which tells much in their favour. The result, which is almost an infallible test, is that pauperism is steadily decreasing. I also notice as remarkable that, although there is much complaint among persons in easy circumstances, as well as among the recipients of still higher rates of income, there is a steady increase in the accumulations of the country, which is best evidenced by the growth of the Income Tax and of the House Duty. Putting these two considerations against each other, my Estimates of Revenue, although they cannot be called very sanguine, will not err on the side of undue caution; they will be fair Estimates, I hope neither timid nor exaggerated. I will now take each head of Revenue. The Customs produced in 1883-4 £19,701,000, and my Estimate for 1884-5 is £19,850,000; the Excise produced £26,952,000, and my Estimate is £26,800,000, this diminution being due to the loss of the rest of the £400,000 of Railway Duty. Stamps produced £11,620,000, and my Estimate now is £11,490,000; the Land Tax produced £1,070,000, and my Estimate is now £1,055,000; the House Duty produced £1,805,000, and my Estimate is £1,880,000; the Income Tax produced £10,718,000, and the Estimate at 5d., with nothing left of the additional 1½d., is £10,050,000. It will be seen that 1d. of Income Tax is estimated now to produce over £2,000,000. A penny of Income Tax produced, in 1880-1, £1,850,000; in 1881-2, £1,900,000; in 1882-3, £1,950,000; in 1883-4, £1,970,000; and this steady increase justifies our present Estimate. The total Tax Estimate this year is £71,125,000, against a receipt last year of £71,866,000. I now come to the Non-Tax Revenue. Crown Lands we estimate at £380,000, the same as last year. The Interest on Advances produced last year £1,196,000, and the Estimate for the present year is £1,180,000. Miscellaneous sources (excluding Indian Home Charges) produced £3,243,000, and the Estimate is £3,170,000. The Committee will notice that I have omitted the Post Office and Telegraphs from their proper place. I mention the Revenue from those sources last, because matters of much interest are connected with it. The Committee will remember that, in 1883-4, two great operations were commenced by the Post Office. One was the introduction of the Parcel Post from the 1st of August; and the other consisted of preparations for cheap telegrams, the cost of which, irrespective altogether of the annual loss arising from the lower rate, according to a Treasury Minute laid upon the Table, was estimated at £500,000, which we intended to spread over the financial year 1883-4 and the first six months of 1884-5. We estimated that the expense of the Parcel Post during the eight months of the year in which the service was in operation would be covered by the receipts, then taken at £340,000. But I am sorry to say that this expectation has not been entirely fulfilled. The Parcel Post receipts for the eight months of 1883-4 were only £155,000, as against the Estimate of £340,000. Now, when it was clear that the receipts would be so seriously deficient, my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Fawcett), without delay, undertook a vigorous attack upon the expenditure in connection with the Parcel Post, which had been based upon the original Estimates. In criticizing that expenditure, it must be remembered that the cost of the Parcel Post for the past year included about £150,000, which was initial or capital expenditure, and which will not recur in future years. Many economies are being proved by experience to be practicable which could not be effected in initiating a new service. We have every hope, therefore, that in due time the equilibrium between receipts and expenditure will be reached. We cannot hope, however, that it will be reached in the year 1884-5, in which, instead of £500,000 or more, as we had originally hoped to receive, the Parcel Post is only estimated to produce £240,000. It therefore becomes necessary for us to consider whether, under these circumstances, the reduction in the price of telegrams, which will also be very expensive, should commence as soon as the 1st of next October. If it is carried out then, further diminutions in the Post Office Revenue will of course take place, and the taxpayer will have to make them good. I may, perhaps, be allowed to remind the Committee, as a personal matter, that in the debate last year on the Motion to reduce immediately the price of telegrams, which I think was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), I urged that it would be wise for the House to pause, and not to insist on this costly reform until the result of the Parcel Post experiment was known. My warning, however, was not effectual; but I think I was justified by the events. The cost in this year's Budget, if the cheap telegrams commence on the 1st of October next, would be between £250,000 and £300,000; and this, as the Committee will soon see, I cannot afford. We propose, therefore, that the reduction in the price of telegrams shall take place on the 1st of August, 1885, and that the sum devoted to preparations shall be divided between this year and the beginning of the next financial year. The receipts for 1884-5 are therefore estimated as follows:—For the Post Office proper, with 12 months' Parcel Post, £7,900,000; and for the Telegraph Service, £1,800,000; making a total of £9,700,000, against the actual receipts for 1883-4 of £7,730,000 for the Post Office proper, including eight months' Parcel Post income, and of £1,745,000 for Telegraphs, or a total of £9,475,000. The improvement in the receipts will thus be £225,000. On the other side of the account the Committee will remember that there is an increase of charge, according to the figures already given, amounting to £284,000. Adding Post Office receipts to the other items of Non-Tax Revenue, the whole will be £14,480,000; and as the Tax Revenue is estimated at £71,125,000, the total Receipt of the year 1884-5 will be £85,555,000. The Expenditure, as I have already stated, is £85,292,000, and my surplus, therefore, is £263,000. Now, Sir Arthur Otway, it will be evident that I have nothing to give away in the shape of important remissions of taxation. I have received lately a good many proposals of this character, and there are, or were lately, on the Notice Paper about 11 others formulated by hon. Members. There are also proposals, I need not say, for more expenditure. All these are very interesting questions in themselves; but, clearly, the present is not the time to discuss them. I ought, however, perhaps, to refer to one proposal in another direction which I have carefully studied since last Session—I mean the final settlement of what are popularly called the Death Duties. A final settlement in that matter ought to have two characteristics. It ought to give us some additional Revenue, and it ought, undoubtedly, to give us great additional simplicity. The present is not the time to indicate how much additional Revenue we might receive; but I have no doubt whatever as to the second point—I mean that the final adjustment must impose a heavier proportional charge than now on real compared with personal property, and must include property in mortmain. Now, I am bound to say that I do not think the time has come for this. The time is approaching, however, when, under a general Local Government Bill, relief will have to be given to the payers of local burdens; and this relief, whatever its amount may be, will accrue mainly to owners of land and houses—that is to say, to real property. It seems to me that that should be the occasion for adjusting and finally settling the Death Duties. I have given considerable attention to this matter, and the problem, to my mind, is not one very difficult to solve. While dismissing for the present this large question, I have one or two minor changes to propose, both being reliefs to the payers of the Carriage Tax. We have received a great many complaints to the effect that the sum of £2 2s. a-year charged on licensed hackney carriages with four wheels is excessive. The complaints have come not only from London, but also from watering-places, from Scotland, and elsewhere, especially where the season is exceedingly short. I have taken some pains to examine those complaints, and I think that they are not without foundation. We propose, therefore, that where the fares of carriages for hire paying £2 2s. are fixed by law, or by local regulation, the duty shall be the same as that for two-wheel carriages—that is to say, 15s. And we also propose that the owners of all carriages which are used for the first time during the later months of the year—after September 30—shall be treated as “beginners” are in some other licensed trades, and shall only pay half duty. The loss from these two changes will be £22,000. Deducting this from my original surplus of £263,000, I am left with a final surplus of £241,000. I am bound to say that, considering the possibility of other claims arising, this is not too large a surplus.

Well, Sir, this concludes my review of the past and my anticipations of the present year. But before concluding my Statement, I must explain to the Committee two important financial operations which we propose to undertake during the present year. The first relates to the Gold Coinage, and the second to the Interest on the National Debt. The first question in regard to the Gold Coinage is one of great importance. Since the late Mr. Jevons's paper on the subject in 1868 was published, the condition of our Gold Coinage has more and more occupied the attention of bankers, of the Press, and, indeed, of the general public. As I shall show, more than half of our existing gold coins have ceased to be even a legal tender. Nor is this wonderful, for nothing has been done for more than 40 years to correct the gradually declining condition of the coinage. I will explain in a few words the actual law. A sovereign, which is supposed to weigh 123½ grains, becomes light, and is no longer a coin of the Realm, when it weighs less than 122½ grains. If I go into a shop and tender such coin for a purchase, the shopkeeper may either refuse it before he takes it in his hand under the 4th section of the Act of 1870; or, if he takes it in his hand, then, under the 7th section of that Act, he is bound then and there to break it up, and charge me the loss. For this purpose, both he and I are supposed to have—I carrying them with me in my pocket—scales with proper gold weights, and instruments for breaking up coin; and if we either tender light coin or fail to break it up, then we are both guilty of a misdemeanour punishable by fine and imprisonment. Similarly, at a railway station, suppose I take a ticket and get gold in exchange for a note, the law presumes that both the railway clerk and I have scales, and a coin-breaking instrument, and the same penalties attach for either tendering or receiving light coin or refusing to break it up. That is the principle of the law under the 4th and 7th sections of the Act of 1870. I said just now that more than half the present Gold Coinage was light. Of this the testimony is so concurrent that there can be little doubt about it. But the quantity of gold coin current in this country is much more uncertain. Apparently, since the restoration of the Gold Coinage in 1817 more than £300,000,000 worth of sovereigns and half-sovereigns have been put in circulation here and at the branch Mints, while not more than £50,000,000 are known to have been withdrawn. But by the best computation of bankers, and others who have paid attention to this extremely difficult subject, there remain at the present time in the United Kingdom about £90,000,000 in whole sovereigns, and £20,000,000 in half-sovereigns, of which 55 per cent are light, and are therefore not a legal tender. Of the sovereigns about 50,000,000 are, on the average, 2½d. light, and of the half-sovereigns 11,000,000 are 2½d. light. The deficiency in the case of the sovereigns is £510,000, and in the case of the half-sovereigns £200,000, or, in all, £710,000; besides the wear down to the point of legal currency—namely, the difference between 123½ grains and 122½ grains. This appeared to me so serious that for some months I have given the subject my most careful consideration, and I have been consulting the best authorities as to remedies; and I am bound to say that though there is not any great difference of opinion as to the evil, there is a great difference in the suggestions for remedying it. The first recommendation is to leave matters alone. But that is evidently impossible, as the evil would only get worse; and the result would be, in the end, to bring serious discredit on our coin as an instrument of exchange. Then it has been proposed to put the law into operation, as in 1842—that everyone should be obliged to weigh his gold coins, and that the Mint, through the Bank of England, should give the fixed price of £3 17s. 10½d. an ounce for light gold, instead of for bullion only. I think that, if weighing gold were to become universal, there would be a great inconvenience to the public, and that it would produce far greater discontent than it did in 1842. It was found to be very inconvenient then; it would be tenfold more inconvenient now. Then it has been proposed to charge this £710,000 immediate loss and the cost of re-coining on the taxpayers to all time; and this, I may say, would probably at first involve an addition to the Income Tax. I am not prepared to adopt this course. It has also been proposed, practically, to remove the sovereign from circulation by issuing £1 notes, charging the cost of renewing the half-sovereign on the profits of issue. This is a serious question. I think the issue of £1 notes should depend on other considerations, and I am not prepared to mix up the two questions together. My noble Friend and Predecessor (Viscount Sherbrooke) had a proposal for diminishing the weight of the sovereign; but, to my mind, that would be open to grave objections. Then it has been proposed by competent authority to keep up the weight, but to impose a mintage charge sufficient to maintain the coinage in a sound condition. This question was very carefully examined by Mr. Graham, the late Master of the Mint, and Colonel Smith, the Master of the Calcutta Mint, some years ago, and their Report shows that this mintage charge must be 1½ per cent, or 1s. 4d. an ounce. But in that case it would be impossible to maintain the price of £3 17s. 9d. an ounce, at which, under the provisions of the Bank Act, the Bank of England is bound to purchase all gold brought to it. I am not, therefore, prepared to propose a mintage charge of 1s. 4d. an ounce. Finally, I have considered a proposal which has great authority for it—namely, to enforce the present law, sharing the loss between the taxpayer and the last holder. But that would have all the inconveniences of the present law, without relieving the public from charge, and I am not able to adopt it. None of these plans I think will commend themselves to the Committee. There is, however, another remedy, which has not been recently very prominently before the public, but which finds favour with high financial authorities, both present and past. I have laid great stress on the importance of making no change as to the sovereign. Its currency should be always preserved in a sound condition, and its weight should not be altered; and I attach some, but not paramount, importance to its being minted without charge. The sovereign is really an international coin, largely used in Exchange operations, and known to the greater part of the civilized world. But there is another gold coin, governed apparently by the same law, but of an entirely different character—I mean the half-sovereign. This is not an international, but a purely domestic coin. I have made careful inquiries during the last few months, and I can find no instance of half-sovereigns being sent from this country in any considerable quantities as remittances or for Exchange purposes. On the other hand, while it is a domestic coin, it is a very expensive coin to maintain. From the figures I have obtained as to the average deficiency in sovereigns and half-sovereigns, I find that its wear and tear is double that of the sovereign, and that it becomes light in half the time of the latter. It is with this coin that we propose to maintain the condition of the sovereign. My plan, therefore, is to issue, instead of half-sovereigns, as now, 10-shilling pieces of gold, containing only nine-tenths of the present amount of gold. Thus, the 10-shilling pieces would have the same relation to the sovereign as the crown and half-crown, and would be a token coin, as they are. Just as the crown is worth a quarter of a sovereign, so the 10-shilling piece would be worth half-a-sovereign, neither the one nor the other having, with respect to the metal contained, the full intrinsic value attributed to it. Of course, it would be necessary to restrict the extent to which the new 10-shilling piece would be a legal tender. Silver coin is only a legal tender up to 40s.; 10-shilling pieces should probably be a legal tender for payments up to £5. Arrangements will, however, be made with the Bank of England for the receipt from bankers of redundant 10-shilling pieces, just as redundant silver is received now. The change in the half-sovereign will enable us to withdraw, by degrees, from circulation the whole of the present light coinage, substituting coins of full weight, without either inconvenience to the public or charge to the taxpayer. In other words, we shall be able to rehabilitate the sovereign, the character of which, both as an instrument of exchange and circulation, should be most jealously preserved. Not only this, but we shall be able to maintain its integrity for the future without any cost to the taxpayer. I will now explain the mode of operation. In the first place, we shall take steps gradually to withdraw, by arrangement with the Bank of England and the private banks, the whole of the half-sovereigns now in circulation, the Mint issuing as they come in the new 10-shilling pieces. Similarly we shall withdraw, and finally call in by proclamation, sovereigns of Reigns prior to that of the Queen. When these two operations are approaching completion, towards the end of 1885, we shall commence withdrawing the light sovereigns of the present Reign, issuing as rapidly as possible new sovereigns in exchange. The Committee will observe that this operation, if carried out without any qualification, might operate as an incentive to sweating or some similar fraud; and we therefore propose that no sovereign of any date which has obviously been tampered with, or which shall be light by as much as 6d., shall be received except as bullion, and that no sovereign of less than 10 years' currency shall be exchanged at all. All the half-sovereigns will be exchanged, except such as have been tampered with or are light by as much as 4d. When the whole of the present light coins have been got in, and the coinage has become normal, the same process will be continued with the sovereign. Under this plan, bankers would have no temptation to retain or re-issue coin which has become light by fair wear and tear. This coin would, in the ordinary case, find its way to the Mint through the Bank of England. I may mention here that we do not propose to give Gold Coinage circulating abroad this privilege of exchange. All such coin passing through the Custom House would be sent, as the great majority of it is now sent, to the Bank of England to be weighed and dealt with according to the present law.

The Committee will like now to know something of the financial result of this operation. I must repeat what I said before, that we have a very imperfect knowledge of the amount of gold coin in circulation. Taking, however, the calculations of the best authorities, which I have already explained, we estimate that £20,000,000 in half-sovereigns, now in circulation, will be withdrawn and replaced by the new 10-shilling pieces, and that for the next 20 years £250,000 worth will be issued annually. On the re-issue the gross profit would be £2,500,000. Against this have to be set, first, £200,000, the deficiency on the existing half-sovereigns which are below legal tender, and which would have to be withdrawn; and, secondly, perhaps, £20,000, the deficiency on those within legal tender weight, which will also be withdrawn. The loss on the sovereigns which are now light I have already estimated at £510,000. The loss on other sovereigns withdrawn during the next 20 years I take at £320,000. The cost of re-coinage I take at £70,000. Adding £50,000 for contingencies, the total charges will be £1,170,000, leaving a balance of £1,330,000, besides accumulated interest. This, in our judgment, will be sufficient to keep the Gold Coinage for the future in a satisfactory condition at a cost of above £40,000 a-year. We propose that these operations should be altogether outside the Consolidated Fund, and that the receipts should be paid into, and the charges defrayed from, a fund to be called the Gold Coinage Fund in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners.

Having explained the first part of my proposals, I now pass to the second important financial operation we propose to undertake—that is to say, in connection with the Interest on the National Debt. The Committee will remember the Act passed last year, in furtherance of the Act of 1876, under which arrangements were made for reducing a very large amount of Debt in the next 20 years by the method of Terminable Annuities. In asking Parliament to sanction that proposal, we not only had in view the mere reduction of the capital of the Debt upon a self-acting system, but we contemplated also that it would render more easy, at an early date, the reduction of interest on the three categories of Three per Cents, the aggregate amount of which is over £600,000,000. The time has now, in our opinion, arrived for taking the first steps in this most important operation. The Money Market seems to be prepared for it; for I notice that the Two-and-a-half per Cent Stock, which stood at 86 two years ago, with Consols at 101½, is now nearly at 91, with only a fractional increase in the latter, a rise of 5 per cent; and I am aware that there is a steady increase in the investments by large Companies in Two-and-a-half per Cent Stock, indicating their belief that it will become the Stock of the future. I will now explain to the Committee what we propose to do. In the first place, let me refer the Committee to the conditions under which the Three per Cent Stocks may be paid off. There are three classes—Consols, New Three per Cents, and Reduced Three per Cents—all of which are now liable to be redeemed; but the conditions are not the same. In the case of Consols and Reduced, the terms of the Act of 1870 are that, at one year's notice, they may be paid off, in quantities or parcels of not less than £500,000. In the case of the New Three per Cents no notice is necessary; but though the matter is not beyond doubt, it may be contended that the whole must be paid off at one time. Omitting, therefore, for the moment the New Three per Cents, we are enabled gradually to pay off the rest of the Three per Cent Debt (exceeding £400,000,000), however unwilling the holders may be, by giving, from time to time, a year's notice to the possessors of manageable amounts, that they will then receive £100 in cash for £100 Stock, unless they agree to accept at once some offer in a Stock of lower denomination; and as both Stocks are now, and have been for some time, at a premium, and, but for the apprehension of their being paid off would probably be at a higher premium, this compulsory process might be safely commenced. I am, however, desirous to make our first step in this matter one of agreement rather than of compulsion; and what we now propose is to constitute a Two-and-three-quarter per Cent Stock, with quarterly dividends, not liable to redemption before 1905, and to ask Parliament to authorize the offer to the holders of any of the three denominations of the Three per Cent Stocks, such amount of that Stock not exceeding £102 for each £100, as the Treasury may determine; or, at the option of the fundholder, such amount of Two-and-a-half per Cent Stock not exceeding £108 for each £100, as the Treasury may similarly fix. A reasonable period would be named by the Treasury, within which the holders would have to elect to exercise either of these options. The Committee will observe that, by conversion into Stocks on which the Dividends are payable quarterly, all the holders will get the benefit of a quarter's payment for ever in advance.

It is necessary that I should now explain what would be the effect of any reduction of interest under this scheme, on the permanent charge of £28,000,000 a-year now appropriated to the service of the Debt. In our opinion, the net benefit of this reduction ought to go to the taxpayer—that is to say, the charge for the Debt should be reduced to that extent. I ought, however, to explain what I mean by net benefit. If the conversion either into Two-and-three-quarter per Cents or Two-and-a-half per Cents should lead to an increase in the nominal capital of the Debt, provision for the extinction of that increase should be made, out of the saving in interest, before the benefit is gained by the taxpayer. I will illustrate this by assuming that £1,000,000 of Three per Cents are converted into £1,020,000 of Two-and-three-quarter per Cents. I do not exclude obtaining a better price; but I base my illustrations on the extreme prices to which I am asking the Committee to go. The gross saving then, in interest, would be £1,950 a-year. But from that would have to be deducted £200 a-year as a Sinking Fund, to extinguish, in 50 years, the premium of £20,000; so that the net reduction in the charge for the Debt would be £1,750 a-year. Similarly, conversion into Two-and-a-half per Cents, at the extreme price of 108, would result in a saving, on the interest of each £1,000,000 converted, of £2,200 a-year. The Committee will observe that the offer in Two-and-a-half per Cents will be apparently not so good for the fundholder as that in the Two-and-three-quarter per Cents; but, on the other hand, the latter will be liable to be again redeemed in 1905, and, besides, it is not, as yet, a Stock known to the Market. It is impossible to estimate the extent to which either of these offers may be accepted; but the Committee will remember that there is behind them the compulsory process which we are satisfied that we could, without practical difficulty, apply gradually to Consols and Reduced Three per Cents, whatever the case of the New Three per Cents may be. But I repeat that we are not desirous to apply our compulsory powers if we can obtain the same ends by voluntary agreement.

I have now, Sir, concluded my explanation of the second of the two proposals which we make to the Committee in connection with the financial operations of this year, and it only remains to me to thank the Committee for having listened so patiently to an inordinately long Statement, containing a great number of figures. I trust that Statement has been as clear as I desired to make it, and that the kind attention accorded to it may be taken as a good augury for the success of the proposals which I have laid before the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the year commencing on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four, in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act of the sixteenth and seventeenth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-four, the following Duties of Income Tax (that is to say):

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of Property, Profits,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and Gains chargeable under Schedules (A), (C), (D), or (E) of the said Act, the Duty of Five Pence;

And for every Twenty Shillings of the annual value of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Horitages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act,—

In England, the Duty of Two Pence Halfpenny;

In Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Duty of One Penny Three Farthings;

Subject to the provisions contained in section one hundred and sixty-three of the Act of the fifth and sixth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-five, for the exemption of persons whose income is less than One Hundred and Fifty Pounds, and in section eight of 'The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876,' for the relief of persons whose income is less than Four Hundred Pounds."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. WILLS said, hon. Members knew that every Chancellor of the Exchequer had a task of great difficulty in distributing the surplus at the end of the financial year, for which there were always many applications. The right hon. Gentleman had, no doubt, on the present occasion, done his best, and, in his (Mr. Wills's) opinion, done it with success; nevertheless, he must not be surprised that there should exist a feeling, he would not say of dissatisfaction, but of disappointment, with regard to the matter of distribution. He was aware that the generosity of the right hon. Gentleman was largely in excess of the means at his disposal; and there were various interests which he was sure he would have conciliated and relieved if it had been in his power to do so. But there was one interest which particularly felt the difficulty of the right hon. Gentleman's position, and that was the tobacco trade. Now, on more than one occasion the Committee had permitted him to point out the conditions of that interest, which was of great value to him in the matter of Revenue, and of importance to the country, on account of the large consumption of tobacco. An injury was done to the trade in 1878, when the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) was Chancellor of the Exchequer, by the imposition of 4d. per lb. additional duty upon tobacco, from which he was sorry to say the trade had never recovered. It was not the upper classes so much as the lower who were affected by this; it was essentially a poor man's question, and a poor man's tax. It was all very well to speak of tobacco as a luxury of the poor man; but it was no less true that it was for him an absolute necessity of life. If he spent 3*d.* on tobacco, 2½*d.* of that went to the Revenue. If he might be permitted to point out to the Committee how unfairly the tax affected the different qualities of tobacco, he believed it would be seen that a strong case was made out for future consideration. On the kinds of tobacco used by the working classes of the country the duty was about 700 per cent ad valorem on the price; on the finer growths of Virginia the duty was only about 300 per cent. On the higher classes, which included the tobaccos of Havannah and Turkey, the duty was from 100 down to 30 per cent; while upon the highest class cigars it was only 10 per cent. The result of this was that out of nearly £9,000,000 of duty, more than £6,500,000 were paid by the working classes of this country. He was quite sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have given relief to this interest had it been in his power to do so; and he need hardly say he regretted that it was not at present possible to give that relief. The right hon. Gentleman could not be surprised if a trade of such large importance, and suffering so cruelly, did year by year, on occasions like the present, take the opportunity of making its voice heard, in order to bring its claims before the Government and the country. He hoped that on some future occasion, when the elasticity of the Revenue had been to some extent restored—when, instead of the slow progress pointed out this year, they should have a brighter future of better seasons and restored trade, it might be in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to confer a boon upon the poorer classes in the country by reducing the duty upon this article of necessity.

MR. MACIVER said, he had felt very much in sympathy with the hon. Member who had just spoken, until he concluded his remarks rather unexpectedly after having only half stated his case, and leaving it to the Committee after arriving at what appeared to him to be a somewhat lame and impotent conclusion. He agreed entirely, and he believed all who heard it would agree, with what the hon. Member had said as to the grievous burden which the Tobacco Duty constituted on that class of the community which most used tobacco; but the hon. Member had suggested to the Committee no means whereby that burden might be removed; and he had, moreover, entirely omitted to point out that which was a very serious part of the question—namely, that about one-fourth of all the tobaccos used in the country was grown in their own Colonies and Dependencies. To tax the productions of their own Colonies and Dependencies, and particularly that portion of them which was most used by the working classes of the country, seemed to him to be a crying shame and injustice; and he thought the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken would have done well if he had made some suggestion as to the mode in which that injustice might be removed. To tax the productions of their Colonies was bad enough; but to tax the poorer classes of consumers at home for what was almost a necessity of life was even a greater injustice. That being his view of the matter, he would endeavour to supplement the statement of the hon. Member, and to suggest to the Committee that which, in his opinion, the Government ought to do in respect of the burden which fell upon the poorer classes of the community. It was quite true that, as matters then stood, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no surplus Revenue to give away; but it by no means followed that he might not have some means hereafter, which he could apply to the reduction of the duty on tobacco, and for the removal of the duty on Colonial tobacco entirely. But how could the Chancellor of the Exchequer raise the Revenue which would be required before he could make those remissions? He had no hesitation in saying that a considerable Revenue, quite enough to enable the right hon. Gentleman to abolish the duties on tobacco, tea, cocoa, and coffee produced in their own Colonies, and much more might be raised without disadvantage, but with great advantage to the country, by taxing foreign-manufactured goods imported into the country, which at present contributed nothing to the Revenue. Again, he thought that Revenue might be raised to a larger extent than at present upon foreign wines and spirits; and an additional reason for taxing them was that they came into competition with the liquors and spirits consumed in the United Kingdom. This question appeared to him to be even of more importance to Ireland than it was to England.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he would point out to the hon. Member that he should restrict his observations to the Resolution before the Committee. At present he was giving them a development beyond that Question, which was that a certain amount of Income Tax should be levied in the financial year.

MR. MAC IVER said, he had, of course, no intention to extend his observations beyond the scope of the Resolution. Not only had he followed precisely the line of the remarks of the hon. Member opposite, but his own remarks were made in special connection with the Income Tax; and, therefore, he thought that, from every point of view, he was perfectly in Order. His contention was that not only the duty on Colonial tobacco, tea, cocoa, and coffee should be abolished, but that the Income Tax might also be reduced to a considerable extent if those duties were replaced upon foreign imports.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the argument of the hon. Member was entirely beyond the Resolution before the Committee. The observations with regard to tobacco had been very much to the point; but the hon. Member was now entering on a large question of Colonial policy, which was clearly irrelevant to the Question.

MR. MAC IVER said, he thought his observations followed naturally upon the question with regard to tobacco raised by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Wills). He would, however, now put that aside, and address himself to the question of Income Tax, which he understood to be the specific subject before the Committee. He would, of course, follow the ruling of the Chairman, and he believed he should be in Order in showing that his proposals with reference to the substitution of taxation upon foreign-manufactured goods imported into this country ought to be adopted, rather than those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was frequently stated in the Press—and The Times was supposed to have advantages in speaking on this question, because it was known that Mr. Giffen was on the staff of that newspaper—that the importation of foreign-manufactured goods was very small indeed. That was declared by The Times four days ago; and if it were really the truth, any scheme which he desired to present in the way of taxing those imports would, of course, fall to the ground. He believed the Committee would perceive at once that the whole force of his argument depended on the question as to whether the importation of foreign-manufactured goods was large or small.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the observations of the hon. Member with regard to manufactured goods were clearly not within the scope of the Resolution before the Committee.

MR. MAC IVER said, he bowed to the decision of the Chairman. At the same time, he would, in concluding his remarks, respectfully protest that his wish was to show that foreign-manufactured goods should be taxed to provide to some extent a substitute for the Income Tax. [An hon. MEMBER below the Gangway: The Clôture.]

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE congratulated the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the able manner in which he had laid his Statement before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman had marked out what were, undoubtedly, two very bold plans. One of these had relation to the National Debt; and he had no doubt that having taken every means in his power to obtain information upon the subject, the right hon. Gentleman would be able to carry out the reduction of the Debt in the manner proposed. He believed, also, that the proposal would be a relief to the Money Market, because everyone would feel that at the present price Consols were not a secure investment.

MR. WARTON rose to Order. He wished to know whether Consols were included with the subjects permitted to be referred to in connection with the Resolution before the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he was waiting to hear the conclusion of the hon. Member's sentence.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he presumed the Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was before the Committee at that moment. It was always usual that questions brought forward in the Budget should be subject to comment in that House when the 1st Resolution was before it. It would be satisfactory to everyone to learn the extent to which the reduction of the National Debt had taken place up to the present time; but there was another question which, to his mind, was of as great importance, and that was the question relating to the coinage. On that question he could not coincide with the opinions expressed by the right hon. Gentleman. When Mr. Lowe was Chancellor of the Exchequer the question was brought forward of taking 3*d.* out of each sovereign, and it was said that no one would find it out. The reduction was to be made as a mintage charge, which was defended on the ground that the sovereign was a manufactured article, and there was to be some arrangement by which the Bank of England on demand was to give bullion in exchange for notes, which might be sent abroad, while the gold coin was to remain at home. But when that scheme was examined it was found that there would be a loss on every transaction. It was, of course, an impossibility that 3*d.* should be taken out of every sovereign, and no one would lose by it. Again, the second proposal with regard to the coinage, although it only related to the half-sovereign, was open to the same objection. It appeared that the whole of the Gold Coinage of the country, from long use and frequent passing from hand to hand, had become more or less light, a fact which, in his opinion, was largely due to the considerably higher wages paid to the labouring classes since this question was last taken in hand 40 years ago. During the period which had elapsed, artisans especially had received a much larger proportion of wages in gold than was the case formerly; and that had, no doubt, caused much greater wear and tear of the Gold Coinage than took place when it circulated almost entirely amongst the higher classes of society. It was calculated that the total quantity of sovereigns and half-sovereigns in existence were worth at that moment £710,000 less than the value which they represented as current coin of the Realm. They had not been troubled for 40 years with the weighing of sovereigns and half-sovereigns. The custom had ceased amongst traders, at the Post Office, the Savings' Banks, all Joint Stock and Private Banks, Railway Stations, and in other public Establishments, with the exception of the Bank of England and Somerset House, where the custom still obtains of cutting each light sovereign or half-sovereign into two pieces. He believed that had the custom continued of cutting or refusing the light gold, the loss and inconvenience to the public would have been far greater than was represented by the sum of £710,000, the amount to which the gold coin had depreciated during the last 40 years. Well, that money, although it had slipped away and had gone no one knew where, was as much lost to the country as if the Government had put 710,000 sovereigns on board a vessel which had gone down in the ocean. And if that had actually taken place, what would be said if the Government attempted to lessen their responsibility with regard to it? Therefore, he said that the simplest, the cheapest, and only satisfactory way of dealing with the question of coinage was for the State to pay the money lost by wear and tear. It was the cheapest way, because to do otherwise would be to shake faith in the half-sovereign at home and abroad. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that these coins were well known in every part of the world, and that they were taken in exchange for goods according to their current value; but under the plan proposed two half-sovereigns would not be worth a sovereign. The half-sovereign would only be a token. Their silver coins were tokens; but no person was bound to take more than 40*s.* in silver. It appeared that there were in circulation £11,000,000 in half-sovereigns. He presumed that these were to be called in, and that 10*s.* token gold pieces of the intrinsic value of 9*s.* only were to be issued to represent that sum of £11,000,000. But the result would be that, although these might pass current throughout this country, they could only be calculated at the Bank as so much weight of gold. After all, this depreciation of £710,000 which had taken place in 40 years was little more than £17,000 a-year, a comparatively small sum when it was remembered that they had got rid of all the inconvenience and dissatisfaction caused by having to use scales and weights to ascertain whether a sovereign was light or not. But this amount of £710,000 need not be paid by a tax placed upon the country at once. The simplest plan, he thought, would be to call in the light gold, and spread the cost of making good the deficiency over a number of years, he cared not how many, by way of Annuity. He was satisfied that the greatest difficulty would arise from dealing with the matter in the way indicated by the right hon. Gentleman. Put it in any form they pleased, they could not take 1*s.* of gold out of a half-sovereign without inflicting a loss upon the community. It was said that by the process proposed a gain would be made out of the community for the benefit of the State amounting to £2,500,000 in 20 years. If this scheme were correct in principle, why not take 2*s.* out of the half-sovereign and realize £5,000,000? In the same breath it was said that no one was to lose; but how could that possibly be the case? They were aware that Foreign Governments had endeavoured to grapple with the state of things present to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer by means of paper money; they were aware that in consequence of the large issue of paper money in Russia at the present moment the paper rouble had considerably decreased in value. Unquestionably, if 1*s.* worth of gold was taken out of the half-sovereign, the half-sovereign would be so much decreased in value. It must be remembered that what was so proposed would not affect some classes of the community to any very large extent. Those classes, for instance, who paid and received money by means of cheques rarely had much coin in their pockets. The retail traders of the country received half-sovereigns in large numbers; and it was well known that the working classes were very frequently possessed of half-sovereigns, so that it was upon those people that the loss which must inevitably accrue would fall. And then it was said that the Bank of England were quite prepared to take any number of the new 10*s.* pieces; but he could hardly credit that such was the case.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Any amount of them.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE, continuing, said, that that would considerably aid the matter; but, nevertheless, he could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was in this matter proceeding upon a very wrong principle, and that he was setting a very bad example to other countries. As he (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) opposed the proposal to take 3*d.* out of each sovereign, which was ingeniously and elaborately placed before the House by Mr. Lowe when that right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he felt bound now to oppose the proposal to reduce the intrinsic value of the half-sovereigns—to reduce them, in fact, to tokens; and he believed that that was the first time that any country whatever had attempted to substitute gold tokens for gold coins. He was quite sure that it was the first time that any Chancellor of the Exchequer had ventured to present such a scheme to a British House of Commons. Now, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward the question of the Death Duties, he (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) thought that the right hon. Gentleman was about to propose some final settlement of those duties; and he waited most anxiously to hear upon what basis the right hon. Gentleman was going to propose that those duties should be placed. It was most unfair and unjust that personal property should have to pay Probate Duty and Legacy Duty, while real property should be allowed to change hands without paying any Probate Duty, and only paying Succession Duty. Leasehold property was said to be personal property; so that if a man who had two houses, one freehold and the other leasehold, died, leaving the leasehold house to one son and the freehold house to another son, what would be the result? Why, that the one would have to pay Probate Duty as well as Succession Duty; while the other would pay Succession Duty, but no Probate Duty. The question of the Death Duties might be met, and he thought satisfactorily settled, without any great difficulty being encountered. Unfortunately, the alterations which had been made up to the present time in Probate and Legacy Duties had had the effect of making the duties payable in respect of freehold property lighter, while the duties paid in regard to leasehold property had been made heavier. He was pleased the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had resolved to carry out what had long been desired—namely, a reduction of the tax upon locomotion represented by four-wheel cabs. When he (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) brought the question of the Hackney Carriage Duties, the Mileage Duties, and the Post Horse Duties, before the House, in 1866 and 1867,

there was an annual tax of something like £19 10s. upon every cab in London. Mr. Lowe, however, brought it down to its present figure. But it was quite clear that a tax of £2 2s. upon four-wheel cabs, and 15s. upon hansoms, was quite sufficient to cause a scarcity of the one and an abundance of the other. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had decided that, in future, 15s. should be the charge upon four-wheel as well as upon two-wheel conveyances. He did not desire to detain the Committee long; but as the House had so few opportunities of considering financial matters, there were one or two other questions which he wished to bring under the notice of hon. Members. There was, for instance, the question of the Land Tax. He thought that when they were dealing with other questions with respect to Consols the Land Tax ought to be looked into. There were 2,000 parishes in which the quota was under £10; of these 214 in which it was £1 but under £2; 122 above 10s. but under £1; 87 under 10s.; and 10 under 1s. In all these cases there were meetings of Commissioners and Clerks, Assessors and Collectors appointed. In the case of a redemption of the Land Tax, it was necessary, under present circumstances, to make a most elaborate calculation. The calculation was based upon the average price of Consols at the date of the contract, to which sum 10 per cent was added, and then 17½ per cent deducted, so that one could readily see that the process was no easy one. He was of opinion that the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to decide upon a certain number of years' purchase upon which the tax might be redeemed. He was not prepared to say how many years ought to be fixed upon; but he was satisfied that the method he suggested would be found the simplest and the best. In the case of land which was taken compulsorily by Railway Companies, by Corporations and other parties, he was of opinion that they ought to be compelled to redeem the tax in a certain time. He had so often brought that question of the House Tax before the House that it was not his intention to go into that question at any length now. He had hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have seen his way to have proposed some reduction of the tax. There were many people paying 9d. when, in reality, they ought not to be called upon to pay more than 6d. Hotels, for instance, were only required to pay 6d. But it must be remembered that there were a large number of private hotels and lodging-houses; and he could not understand for a moment why the keepers of the latter establishments should be required to pay more than 6d. if an hotel only paid 6d. Then, again, professional men—doctors, for instance, who had a small surgery adjoining their house—were called upon to pay 9d., while the shopkeeper only paid 6d. Artists' studios and schools were charged 9d. It appeared to him that the keeping of a school was a business; and, therefore, the tax in respect of a school ought not to be larger than that paid by an ordinary shopkeeper. He was pleased that, on a former occasion, it was stated that when the question of the housing of the working classes came to be dealt with it would, no doubt, be found possible to propose some relief. There was a very important question, however, with respect to the House Tax which ought to be seriously taken into account. By a recent decision of the House of Lords, the Water Companies were only permitted to charge their rates upon the annual value of property. Now, he was unable to conceive why the principle of charging in respect to annual value should not apply to the House Tax. Of late years the House Tax had been worked up not upon the annual value, but upon the gross rental. This was a matter which ought to engage the serious attention of the Treasury; and he hoped that before long the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary to the Treasury would turn their attention to it.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had presented the Committee with a very interesting and a very clearly stated Budget, and he had shown how accurately and carefully the Estimates of the Revenue had been made. Indeed, he (Mr. Hubbard) could hardly say that he found, in the course of the Budget proper, anything upon which he need comment except in way of approval, unless he were to express regret that the authorities of the Treasury had not yet seen their way to announce a re-adjustment of the operation of the Income Tax. He would pass, however, to the new features which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had promulgated that day with regard to the coinage and the reduction of the National Debt. As far as his memory served him, he believed the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was perfectly correct in his statement of the amount of coinage in circulation, and the proportion which might be lighter than the law allowed. The present condition of the Gold Coinage of the country arose from the effect of wear through a great series of years. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the state of the coinage had been almost neglected. Now, the law required that all Her Majesty's subjects should not only not re-issue gold coins which were light, but that they should deface by cutting them, so that they could not pass again. The right hon. Gentleman had explained that the requirements of the Act were impracticable; that no one could be supposed to carry about scissors to cut and scales to weigh any gold coins that he might receive. But all the coinage of the country within a not very long period passed through the hands of a very powerful and influential community called Bankers. There was the Bank of England at the head of banking affairs, and in the country there were established a very large number of Joint Stock Banks and Private Banks. Well, what had been the action of the different banking communities upon the gold which came into their hands? Both Mr. Martin and Mr. Palgrave, who were admitted authorities upon matters of currency, had stated that for a long time bankers had refrained from sending gold coins into the Bank of England, because they would be clipped and the bankers would be charged with the deficit. Now, the operation of that action upon the part of the bankers had, undoubtedly and inevitably, led to the result that they were overlaid with light gold coin; and, being so, they now asked the Government to take it off their hands. The Committee would see that if every bank in the country had done what the Bank of England had done there would be now no accumulation of light gold at all. And he might remark, for the information of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that if all Her Majesty's officials had pursued the same course there would be less light gold coin in circulation than there was at the present time. The Postmasters in some very important towns in the North of England had absolutely removed their banking accounts from the Bank of England because the Bank of England was in the habit of clipping their gold; while country banks, to which those officials had removed their accounts, received the coin without debasement. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, must assume some portion of the blame for the consequences of the general neglect or disobedience of Her Majesty's Proclamation. He insisted upon this—that if Her Majesty's Proclamation had been carried out, not by every individual, but by those powerful and influential communities whose business it was to receive and issue coin, none of the difficulty which was now complained of would exist at all. That being the case, then came the question who was to bear the loss which accrued from light gold coin? In the first place, hon. Gentlemen must recollect that no one complained at the present moment except the bankers. There was no external difficulty or complaint at all. The difficulty was simply in the tills of the bankers, who had got more light gold coin than they knew what to do with. Let hon. Members consider what was to be done with light gold coin. He did not deny that it should be called in; but then, said the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—"There are so many ways of dealing with it—who is to bear the loss?" and he (Mr. Hubbard) thought he heard the right hon. Gentleman say that he would not accept the entire loss upon the part of the Treasury.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I said on the part of the taxpayer.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD said, that the taxpayer and the Treasury were one and the same thing; they all knew perfectly well that the Treasury, in matters of that kind, represented the taxpayer. He was very glad that the right hon. Gentleman disclaimed, on the part of the taxpayer or the Treasury, any intention to bear the entire loss which had accrued from the light gold coin in circulation. Then it came to be a question of degree. If the right hon. Gentleman would not bear the entire loss, how was it to be divided? The right hon. Gentleman had enumerated several plans. He enumerated one which he said was inadmissible, and that was that the loss should be divided between the taxpayer or the Exchequer and the last holder, who, in most cases, would inevitably be the banker, because it was the banker who sent the coin in. He would like to know why the right hon. Gentleman considered that it would be inequitable to share the loss with the bankers? He (Mr. Hubbard) believed that it would be equitable and practicable, and he did so for this reason. If the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take upon himself a certain portion of loss he would exclude from his own acceptance the extremely light pieces; the very light pieces would not come in at all. The bankers would send in all coin which was just under legal weight; but they would not send in the very light pieces; these they would put again into circulation. Therefore, he (Mr. Hubbard) considered that the plan, which, he understood, the right hon. Gentleman would not adopt, was one which would clear the commercial regions of the light gold coin. He objected to the plan of throwing the loss wholly upon the last holder; but he thought that the plan of dividing the loss would be the best and most equitable. If the Exchequer were to say they would share the loss with the last holder of the light coin, then there would be no motive for keeping it back, particularly if the Exchequer attached to their Proclamation the condition that they would only receive the light coin up to a certain date, and that after that light coin would be treated as bullion. Now, as to the particular means which the right hon. Gentleman proposed, and which he (Mr. Hubbard) confessed filled his mind with apprehension. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to debase the currency. He had said that a gold sovereign was an international coin. Well, two half-sovereigns now made one sovereign; but under the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer two half-sovereigns would make a whole sovereign no longer. A half-sovereign would be a half-sovereign no longer, but would be degraded into the position of a token. As a matter of fact, there was a point of interest in this matter of a Constitutional character. At the present moment all gold coin was a legal tender, and the Bank of England were bound to accept gold coin. Let this proposition be carried out, and they would destroy the properties of the gold coin. He should be charmed and delighted to find he was mistaken. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head in dissent; but he (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) ventured to say that hitherto the half-sovereign had been regarded as an integral part of the Gold Coinage of this country; but now it was proposed to depose it from its position, and to make it a mere token. They could not pay their debts in tokens. It was indispensable that the integrity of the Gold Coinage of the country, half-sovereigns as well as sovereigns, should be maintained. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was not an original one; it was proposed by Mr. Lowe, a highly inventive and imaginative person, so far as financial matters were concerned. Mr. Lowe proposed to take a grain of gold out of the sovereign, and to turn the half-sovereign into a mere token. He (Mr. Hubbard) would very much like the right hon. Gentleman to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence which passed on that occasion between the Bank of England and Mr. Lowe. He (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) was at that time a Director of the Bank; and if his memory served him, a decided disapproval was expressed on the part of the Bank of the proposal to turn the half-sovereign into a token. Only that morning he was looking over the Report and Evidence of the International Coinage Commission, and he happened to open the book at the evidence given by Sir John Herschell, who was then Master of the Mint. Sir John Herschell was asked—"Would you approve of converting the half-sovereign into a token?" to which he replied—"Certainly not; it would make the coinage a totally different thing." In fact, Sir John Herschell expressed the strongest disapproval of any attempt such as that which was now being proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman might by this action be able to realize £1,000,000 or £2,000,000; but it must be remembered that when they once began to tamper with the coinage there was no knowing where they would end. As he had said previously, it was merely a matter of degree; and he asked if they took 1s. out of 10s. now, why should they not, on some future occasion, take 2s. out? It must also be borne in mind that they would very likely create a new industry; for there was very little doubt that many men would be found, say in places like Birmingham, who would seek to obtain a living by the making of illegal half-sovereigns. On the different grounds which had been stated, he trusted that the Committee would be dissuaded from sanctioning the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman. Why should this degradation of the coinage take place for the sake of £1,000,000 profit at once, and for the sake of the interest on that profit in future years paying the expenses of the deficiency in the coinage? He knew of no precedent in the world for debasing the Gold Coinage in the way suggested. He would pass from the gold currency to another very important subject, and that was the interest on the National Debt. The right hon. Gentleman had applied himself, with very great energy and success, to insuring a rapid redemption of the National Debt. He (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) thought the arrangement which the right hon. Gentleman proposed last year for the redemption of £7,000,000 or £8,000,000 of Debt went quite far enough. It must be remembered that when they had redeemed £10,000,000 of Debt they had also diminished the charge of the Debt by way of interest; and the operation adopted last year was one thoroughly sound in principle, for it involved a sacrifice on the part of the taxpayer. It was by economy in management, and by self-denial, that they ought to obtain a reduction of the national obligations; that was the legitimate way of reducing the interest on the National Debt. But as to the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman had made that day, he (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) was ashamed of it; and although the right hon. Gentleman said it would save this, and that, and the other, it would save nothing at all, and he trusted it would never pass. His right hon. Friend the Prime Minister tried a similar process in the year 1853; but with what result? The amount of the National Debt was something like £800,000,000; and his right hon. Friend made a proposal which would have given a quarter per cent less interest to those who accepted the Two-and-a-half per Cent Stock in exchange for Three per Cents. The loss was so obvious that no wonder the scheme, in its result, fell far short of what the Prime Minister had anticipated. As a matter of fact, out of £350,000,000 of Consols only £1,000,000 was exchanged for Two-and-a-half per Cents, and the whole amount of 2½ percent thus created only reached £3,000,000. He wondered so much was sent in. Who could have sent it in? Why, there were just three classes of people who could have done so. In the first place, trustees, who always seemed to consider themselves bound to save themselves from risk by complying with any demands of the Government. In the next place stood patriots, who did not mind throwing away their property, and lastly there were idiots, who did not know what they were doing. The £3,000,000 of Two-and-a-Half per Cents made by his right hon. Friend had increased, under different operations of the Treasury itself, to £10,000,000; and it was true that they stood at a comparatively high price. Now, then, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer took the rise in value as evidence of success. At the time he did that, however, he played upon two strings. He told the Committee he had compulsory power to enforce it; and then, fearing that that might appear too despotic and harsh, he said—"Oh! I am going to give them what will be a full equivalent." He (Mr. Hubbard) asked, in common honesty and honour, that the Government would not couple with their proposition the threat that they had compulsory power. It would be, in his opinion, a most unbecoming thing to do; and he did not think that the threat was one which was consistent with the rights of property, and certainly it was one which ought not to proceed from the Finance Minister of this country. Either the exchange proposed was one which would leave the Stockholders in as good a position as they were now, or it would not. If the former was the case, then the Exchequer could gain nothing; if the Stockholders were left in a worse position, then the Exchequer would gain at the expense of the public. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the conditions under which the different Stock was raised. It was quite true that there were three main Stocks. There were £395,000,000 of Consols, £140,000,000 of New Three per Cents, and £90,000,000 of Reduced. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not meddle with the New Three per Cents, as they could only be dealt with in their entirety; but he proposed to deal with Consols and Reduced, and to pay them off in quarterly parcels of not less than £500,000. But the Act of Parliament, with regard to Consolidated Stock, distinctly stated that it should be subject to discharge upon 12 months notice, and that repayment of them should take place in sums of £500,000. He should be exceedingly surprised if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could find upon the Statute Book of this country any Act of Parliament under which he could make an individual take Two-and-a-half per Cent Stock for Three per Cent, or be obliged to receive cash in payment for the Stock which he owned, unless the Exchequer was prepared to give notice of redemption of the entire Joint Stock of Annuities of which he held a share. Such was the position in which the Committee were placed; and he ventured to believe that they would find that the offer which did not succeed when proposed by the Prime Minister would not succeed now, however ingenious the present Chancellor of the Exchequer might be. He (Mr. Hubbard) was sorry to have to express his disapproval of the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he was sure they were dictated by a desire to serve the best interests of the country. He believed that both of them were discreditable to the country; and he hoped, therefore, they would be rejected.

Mr. FRANCIS BUXTON congratulated his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the clearness of his Financial Statement, and upon the marvellous accuracy with which the receipts of the year had met the Estimates of last year. His special object, however, in rising was to comment upon the remarks made by his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) on the proposed alterations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the Gold Coinage. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) had prophesied what the result would be of the proposed alteration, and he had depicted the evils which would result from what he called a debased coinage. But what was it but a very debased coinage that they had now? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that there were in circulation in the country 90,000,000 sovereigns and 20,000,000 half-sovereigns, and that of those 55 per cent were light in weight, and, therefore, not a legal tender. If by any alteration that could be counteracted, and the 90,000,000 sovereigns could be issued full weight, and the 20,000,000 half-sovereigns could be issued at a known value from the Treasury, it must be of the greatest benefit to the country. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) had said that bankers, or the last holders, should be made to bear, at least, part of the loss which would accrue; and he spoke of the dislike of bankers, under present conditions, to pay into the Bank of England light gold. The result of this dislike was that light coin was re-issued constantly, and was thereby constantly losing in weight. Now, under the proposed alterations, bankers would be able to go at any time to the Bank of England; and, of course, they would not hesitate to go, and pay in their light coin and receive the full weight of gold. Gold coin was very soon reduced in value. He (Mr. Francis Buxton) had the honour of being a partner in a bank in the City, situate not more than 80 yards from the Bank of England. His firm had got gold from the Bank of England, and carried it to their own bank, where they had kept it some months undisturbed; they had then taken it back to the Bank of England, and had been charged a certain amount for light gold. Now, there had only been one movement, yet the friction had caused the loss in weight. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be enabled to carry out the proposals he had made, because he believed they would be of the greatest advantage to the country. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) thought the bankers were those who were chiefly to blame in having broken through the letter of the law up to this time. He (Mr. Francis Buxton) thought everyone would admit that the present law was impracticable and quite impossible to carry out in practice. The 7th clause of the Coinage Act provided that where any gold coin was below the current weight a person should cut or deface any such coin tendered to him in payment, and the person tendering the same should bear the loss. Now, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown that night, such a system, if carried into practice, would altogether put an end to transactions of any kind in money. It would be quite impossible for everyone to carry with him a pair of scales to weigh any gold coin tendered to him. To begin with, a person would never find a gold coin of full weight, so that it would be easily seen that a complete stop would be put to the financial transactions of the country if the 7th clause were to be carried out in every instance. It was clear that bankers were not the only persons subject to blame. Every man in the country was equally blameable. After all, what the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to do with the half-sovereign was nothing more than was done already with other coins. The silver coinage of the country already contained very much less silver than it was supposed to contain. Sovereigns themselves had a certain amount of alloy in them. Indeed, every coin must contain a certain amount of alloy. As a matter of fact, silver coins were issued as tokens, and not as coins. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed that half-sovereigns should, in future, be taken as tokens; that they should be conveyed from hand to hand as of the value of 10s.; but that they should only be a legal tender up to the amount of £5. Silver was now a legal tender to the amount of 40s., and bronze coins to the amount of 1s. He would like to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any difficulty would occur as to gold coined in the Mint of Calcutta or in any of the Colonies? A good deal of Australian gold was now in this country, and he was very anxious to know whether any difficulty would result on this account? As to the issue of Two-and-a-half per Cents, he very much hoped that the right hon. Gentleman might succeed in any step which would lead to so grand a result as the reduction of the interest of the National Debt of this country. He believed the credit of this country stood so high at that moment that no better moment could be chosen for such a step. He understood his right hon. Friend (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) to mention the amount of Two-and-a-half per Cents now in the Market as £10,000,000; but he was under the impression that the Chancellor of the Exchequer said they stood at £13,800,000. Possibly the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he replied, would inform the Committee how the present amount compared with the amount which was in the Market in 1878 and in 1881, in order to show how the Two-and-a-half per Cents had increased in the last five years. He (Mr. Francis Buxton) believed they would be found to have been largely increased, and that the present amount would show how very much the Market appreciated the value of that Stock. The Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to one item in his Revenue side as to which he would like to ask him one question. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the amount estimated to be received from the Railway Passenger Duty before the alteration of last year was £800,000 in round figures. The actual amount estimated to be received last year after the proposed alteration was £665,000; but the right hon. Gentleman had actually £745,000. There was thus a very decided increase over the Estimate. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that this was partly caused by some one large sum; but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would inform the Committee whether the increase had occurred from any diminution in the proposed alteration of last year—he meant any diminution of the number of exemptions claimed by the various Railway Companies? He believed that one of the proposals of last year was that fares of 1d. a-mile and less should be exempted altogether from the Passenger Duty; but that railway fares in what might be called urban districts should be subject to a tax of 2 per cent, instead of 5 per cent as hitherto. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would say whether the urban districts had been extended, or whether it was on account of such urban districts not having been defined that this large increase over the Estimate had occurred? He repeated his congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the result of the year; and he hoped that the Estimates of this year would prove as satisfactory as those of the financial year which had just closed.

MR. GORST said, he rose to make complaint about another part of the Budget, and to express disappointment and dissatisfaction, which he was sure everyone would feel, at the announcement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the boon of 6*d.* telegrams, which it was promised last year should be given this year, was not to be given to the public until 1885. This was another instance of the great regard Her Majesty's Government paid to the opinion of the House of Commons. They had had two or three instances that Session. Some people imagined that this peculiar idiosyncrasy of the Government had only been exhibited that Session; but, as a matter of fact, it began last year. As long ago as the 29th of March last year the hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) gave expression to the feeling of the majority of the House in a Resolution which he succeeded in inducing the House to adopt, against the advice of Her Majesty's Government, upon the subject of 6*d.* telegrams. At first the Chancellor of the Exchequer was disposed to bow to the views of the House. He exhibited some kind of deference towards the feeling of the House, because, in the course of the Budget Speech which he made on the 5th of April last year, less than one week after the Resolution of the House, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"After the Resolution of the 29th of March, I do not think it would be respectful on my part to put out of question the reduction in the minimum price of telegrams. As I promised, I have already commenced a careful inquiry into the estimates made by the Post Office as to the cost under several plans of the reduction to the minimum charge of 6*d.* I cannot, at this moment, anticipate the result of that inquiry; but I propose to set aside £170,000 out of my balance to enable me, if possible, to carry out the change in the course of the present year."—(3 Hansard, [277] 1533.)

Towards the end of last year, however, the anticipations of the House of Commons were very much damped by an answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Fawcett) to the effect that the reduction in the minimum charge for telegrams would come into operation in October, 1884. The public was far more interested in the reduction in the charge for telegrams than even in the reduction of the National Debt; and they had been confidently expecting that the reduction would take place in the course of the present year, in accordance with the promise of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, the right hon. Gentleman threw a damper upon all their anticipations by coolly announcing to the House of Commons that the Government would not make the promised reduction. It was not because the Post Office could not afford to meet the reduction, but simply because the anticipations with respect to the Parcel Post had not been fully realized; to make the loss on the institution of the Parcel Post less than it otherwise would be, the Government were going to confiscate the money set aside for the reduction in the price of telegrams. He was sure that when the announcement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was read to-morrow by the people of the Three Kingdoms, they would feel a bitter disappointment and a considerable amount of indignation at the cool manner in which they had been treated by the Government. If the institution of the Parcel Post had not been as profitable an affair as it was expected, let the Government admit they made a miscalculation. Why the unfortunate people had to be robbed of 6*d.* telegrams in order to make good the deficiency in the Government calculations he could not imagine. The people would receive the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with great disappointment. He (Mr. Gorst) could not help feeling that by the way the right hon. Gentleman had dealt with this matter he was guilty of trifling with the House of Commons.

Mr. ANDERSON said, that after the admirable and clear statement they had had that night from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he only wished to make a very few remarks upon the Budget proposals. It was unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman could not do more for them than he expected to do; but with a surplus of £253,000 it was not possible to do a great deal. The right hon. Gentleman proposed a small relief in the shape of a reduction of the Carriage Duty. Unfortunately, the reduction was not large enough to do much good. The objection to the Carriage Duty was that it acted as a restraint of trade. There were a large number of artisans engaged in the making of carriages, and in making articles connected with carriages. There was, therefore, a large number of the industrial classes to whom the reduction of the duty would act as a very great boon. However, they must be content with what they had got. He regretted the right hon. Gentleman did not see his way to do away with the duty on Marine Insurance, to which he had several times called attention. That also was a tax which acted in restraint of trade, and therefore they ought to get quit of it. He understood that in some kinds of insurance, such as bullion to and from the Continent, where the value was very high and the premium low, this tax threw the business entirely into the hands of foreign underwriters; and Lloyds had often vainly appealed for its abolition. The proposals with regard to the gold coinage were the distinguishing features of the Budget, and no doubt they would be most generally attacked. Many years ago they were told there was an estimated loss of £500,000 upon light gold coins, and now it turned out the loss was not less than £710,000. The question was, who was to pay for the loss? One of the courses which the right hon. Gentleman said was inadmissible was to put the loss on the taxpayer. In that opinion he entirely agreed, because the taxpayers included Scotland, and as Scotland did not contribute to the wearing of the gold in the pockets of the people it would be most unfair to take taxation from Scotland for such a purpose. On that ground he was very glad that the right hon. Gentleman did not propose to throw the loss on the taxpayers of the country. The right hon. Gentleman had also said that he would not institute an issue of £1 notes, and in that he thought the right hon. Gentleman was quite wrong, because that would be the easiest and simplest way of paying for it. He was not alone in England in advocating £1 notes, for there had been at least two London bankers in that House who admitted that it would be expedient to have £1 notes. The hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) had, on one occasion, said he thought it might be expedient to go to the length of £30,000,000 of notes to supersede gold. Supposing they took even 2 per cent of £30,000,000, that would give £600,000 a-year saved, and the loss on gold would be quickly paid for. Even half of that would be enough. All they advocated was that people should have the option of getting £1 notes if they wanted them. Nobody thought of forcing them; but for 60 years past the people of England had not had an opportunity of getting these notes. Was it to be believed that the people of England would not take them if they could get them, when the people of Scotland and Ireland preferred them? It was only necessary to lay the offer before them, and before long they would take to the idea, and the system would become very remunerative. With regard to what the hon. Member for Andover (Mr. Francis Buxton) had said about the way in which gold coins were weighed, in Scotland the bankers generally obtained boxes of gold ready for issue at harvest time, that being the time when gold was expected to be wanted in Scotland. The bankers got the boxes of gold from the Bank of England, and kept it unpacked in their cellars. Then, perhaps, the need never came, and they were sent back to London, and though the boxes had never been opened at all, still a charge was made for light weight. Nobody supposed that the Bank of England was guilty of fraud in charging for that light gold; it simply meant that this article, gold, was so soft that it wore away in such a manner that it was not suitable for circulation at all. Now, the right hon. Gentleman, referring to the suggestion of a mintage charge on the gold, said he would not make a charge for mintage, but he thought a small charge for mintage would be proper and appropriate; and one reason he had was that their sovereigns were exported. Some authorities had spoken of that as a great advantage; but he thought they should put some check on this exportation, and that all such transactions ought to be in bullion. Why should they be at the expense of coining their gold for exportation? Why should they be put to that expense to export their sovereigns for foreign manufacturers to melt them down for manufacturing purposes? It was the same in this country. When their manufacturers wanted gold they took their sovereigns, and the Mint not only charged nothing for mintage, but gave them the alloy into the bargain. In his opinion, there should be more alloy used than 1-12th, so as to reduce the liability to friction; and there should also be a charge for mintage, to prevent the export of their gold, and in order that the Mint should not have so much needless work to do.

Then with regard to the reduction of the half-sovereign, that was a most important matter, for the half-sovereign was almost the only coin of gold used in Scotland. A considerable amount of half-sovereigns were used in Scotland as change; and he should not like to see them discredited, as they might be if it was supposed that they were only worth 9s. He would rather have an issue of a 10s. note, which should be entirely a symbolical currency to take the place of change, than a coin which pretended to be worth 10s. when it was only worth 9s. If it was to become a mere token, he did not see why it should not be just as well reduced to 8s., or 7s., or 6s., or 5s., or any other amount, as to 9s. Besides, the reduction would offer an immense premium to manufacturers, now that they knew it only cost 4d. a pound to coin gold; and there would be a profit of nearly 10 per cent on turning sovereigns into half-sovereigns. A new industry would spring up—he would not say in Birmingham, but abroad—of melting sovereigns down to half-sovereigns, and making a profit on the operation. That would be a very tempting trade, and he did not know of any trade in these hard times in which so much profit could be made; and unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer could see some mode by which he could check this recoinage of their sovereigns into half-sovereigns, with a profit of perhaps 1s. 6d. on each, he did not think this scheme would answer. As to the Death Duties, they could not say anything as to that subject until they saw what the Chancellor of the Exchequer's plan was; but he was very glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman looked forward to proposing a scheme in the direction at least of bringing up the Succession Duty to the Legacy Duty. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of a "final" scheme; but he did not think there would be a settlement of that matter till the one was put absolutely on a level with the other. He was also pleased with the proposal to put a tax on lands in mortmain, for he was strongly of opinion, as he had been always, and had advocated in that House for 10 years past, that it should be impossible for anyone to put property into a Trust or a Corporation in such a way that it should be beyond the reach of being made to pay its fair share of taxation. That principle he was glad to see acknowledged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He very much approved also of the proposed issue of new Stocks, but he would have been content with increasing the Two-and-a-Half per Cent Stock, without being bothered by a Two-and-Three-Quarters per Cent Stock; for he did not think it was necessary to have the intermediate one at all. He thought the Two-and-a-Half per Cent Stock would become very attractive to Trustees and others who wished to invest; and the fact that so large an amount was now held by the country in deposits with the Post Office Savings Banks, which only gave 2½ per cent, ought to be very encouraging in the direction of having a conversion of Three per Cents into Two-and-a-Half per Cent Stock.

MR. PELL said, he had listened with great attention to the debate; but the question of the debasement of the coinage was one upon which he did not feel himself competent to speak. But he knew that having one half-sovereign in his pocket when he entered the House he had disposed of that in the course of the evening, and had so had an opportunity of giving practical effect to the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He got his change in silver, he admitted; but what he was going to say was that it was marvellous how much strict attention was given on nights when Financial Statements were made—which, after all, were of small importance—and how little opportunity during the remainder of the year Members had of discussing matters which, to his mind, were of far greater importance. He referred, he need hardly say, to the question of Local Taxation. He and others had not expected that much would come from the Budget in relief of local taxpayers; but there appeared to have been a passage interpolated in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which bore on the subject, and it was that particular passage in the speech to which he wished to draw the attention of the Committee, and which justified him in making some remarks. He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that he had in his mind an idea that at some future time—how far distant no man could tell—there might be an opportunity afforded of giving some relief to local charges by a rearrangement of the Death Duties? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] He saw that the Chancellor of the Exchequer shook his head; but that was what he understood the right hon. Gentleman to mean—of course, the right hon. Gentleman took care not to be very precise—namely, that there would be some re-arrangement, such as had long been suggested, by which they would be imposed—and very properly he thought—on lands in mortmain; and that out of the increased fund at the disposal of the Exchequer some relief might be afforded to local taxpayers. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer still shook his head at that interpretation of his statement.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): What I said was that I did not think the change I described in the Death Duties ought to be made until we had settled the question of the relief of local burdens; but I said nothing about the question of that relief being postponed for a long time, or at all.

MR. PELL said, he thought the mention of the subject in that way meant a postponement for an indefinite period. The first postponement of relief was to be until the Local Government Bill was brought in; and now that Bill itself was to be postponed and complicated.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am trying to put the hon. Member right. I said just the opposite.

MR. PELL accepted the correction; but now the two things were to be brought forward at the same time; and if they were to be made dependent on each other, then he thought the whole scheme became more complicated, and the Government measure would be further postponed. He was obliged to take what little opportunity he could get of calling the attention of the Committee to this matter. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to an increased charge on the Exchequer by way of subventions, and he stated that within 10 years there had been an increase of £2,950,000, or something of that kind; and when he gave utterance to his proposition it was received with murmurs from the other side of the House, as if hon. Gentlemen thought these subventions a terrible thing. Nobody had ever argued out boldly the question whether these subventions were extravagant or not; and he must say that, for his own part, he did not approve of that bye-way of casting a censure on a system which, after all, had not been proved to be productive of extravagance; and he should have been better pleased if, instead of hearing hon. Members expressing dissatisfaction, they had expressed satisfaction at the postponement of the reduction in the charge for telegrams. He agreed with hon. Members in expressing dissatisfaction with the Government for not keeping their promise; but nothing had gratified him more than the assurance that that torment, the 6d. telegram, would be kept off for some time. It was all very well for hon. Members in town communities; but a countryman who had indolent friends richer than himself would be continually getting 6d. telegrams which might cost him 3s. 6d. He was very glad, indeed, that that scheme was postponed. He would not now raise a debate on local taxation; but he should do so at some future time that Session, because he did not think the House of Commons had been fairly treated on that subject. But as they were now debating the Financial Statement, and as he had been systematically deprived of the promised Local Budget which was expected to be presented about the same time as the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Statement, he must take this opportunity of saying that, however unpalatable it might have been to the right hon. Gentleman to do it, he ought to have made some proposition which would have relieved the owners and occupiers of real property in towns even more than in the country from the injustice which admittedly was done to them. Whether that might be done by means of subventions he could not say; he did not think it could; but he should have been very pleased to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer say he would accept the whole charge of the police and pauper lunatics, because he was perfectly certain that that would result in absolute economy.

MR. MONK said, the Committee had received a most interesting and able Financial Statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, some of the features of which had commended themselves to the acceptance of the Committee. He referred especially to the Death

Duties being extended to property in mortmain, and to the proposal to reduce the interest on the National Debt; though he must say, with regard to the latter, that it seemed to him a debatable question whether the Two-and-Three-Quarters per Cent Stock, which it was proposed to issue, should be liable to redemption so soon as 1905. That, however, was a question which would be discussed at a future stage, when the Bill for that purpose was brought forward; but he rose principally to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He must express his regret and surprise that the right hon. Gentleman, in his Financial Statement, had not alluded in any way to a probable prospective reduction of the Wine Duties. He was astonished at that omission, because, a few months ago, he and other hon. Members were led to congratulate themselves on an Agreement or Protocol having been entered into between our Minister at Madrid and the Spanish Government, to the effect that Her Majesty's Government would propose to the House of Commons a reduction of the Wine Duties on certain conditions—namely, that a Treaty of Commerce granting the most-favoured-nation treatment to this country should be also proposed for the acceptance of the Cortes. He was aware that since that time there had been a change of the Government in Spain; and we could not, perhaps, now tell whether the present Government would propose the adoption of such a measure to the Cortes when it met in June next; but the question he wished to put to his right hon. Friend was this. The right hon. Gentleman was perfectly well aware that in 1880 the Prime Minister, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed that the Crown should have power, by Order in Council, to propose a reduction in the Wine Duties, contingent upon certain conditions being acceded to by the wine-growing countries. Certainly, the present state of the Wine Duties did cause great disturbance in that trade, and caused certain material loss to wine merchants; and he wished to put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not desirable that he should take some such step as that which was taken by the Prime Minister in 1880? He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that this was a matter upon which the whole commercial community felt very strongly; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give some assurance that the matter was under consideration, and would not be neglected during the present financial year.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope I may be allowed to express my strong sense of the extreme fairness and clearness of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was entirely free from Party spirit; and it is always pleasant to be able to reciprocate that spirit. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the present condition of the country, and said the increase in the accumulations of the country was the ground upon which his Estimates of the Revenue of the year were founded. He remarked that the condition of trade in many parts of the country was, undoubtedly, unsatisfactory; that profits were small; and that the Railway Returns, which are very accurate as an indication of the condition of the manufactures and productions of the country, had shown symptoms of weakness in the last few months, and certainly had indicated a lessened volume of trade; while, at the same time, there was a considerable diminution of profits. I should be extremely sorry to express any very grave doubts as to the realization of the Estimates which the right hon. Gentleman has made; but it does appear to me that both in Customs and in Excise he has gone at least as far as the conditions of trade, which certainly influence Customs and Excise, would warrant or justify. The right hon. Gentleman, in his allusions to the burden which is imposed on the country by the Budget, referred to the Expenditure in the year 1873-4, as compared with the present Expenditure. I do not wish to go back as far as 1873-4, but I will go back to 1880-1; and I wish to place before the Committee some figures which show, at least, that the condition of taxation in this country is very serious—it may be necessary taxation—having regard to the stagnation, to say no less, in the trade of the country at large. In 1880 the Imperial charge was, roughly speaking, £82,000,000, and the local charge was £26,000,000. I prefer to put the two things together, because if the local charge falls upon property it falls on the individuals who are concerned in the trade of the country to a large extent, and who also pay the Imperial taxes; and it is a charge on the resources of the country. That would give a total, in 1880, of £108,000,000. In 1883 that had grown to £115,000,000, being an Imperial charge of £86,000,000, and a local charge of £29,000,000. This year, according to the best estimate I can make, the Imperial charge is £85,250,000; and you have to add to that £2,000,000 of Exchequer receipts, which are now taken in reduction of Expenditure, and which were Revenue in 1880, and that makes the total £87,250,000. You have also a local expenditure, if it has gone on increasing since 1882—when the last Return was laid on the Table—at the same rate as it increased during the preceding five years, of £30,000,000. Thus, then, you find that in four years the Expenditure of the country for the purposes of Government—and you cannot separate the local expenditure from the Imperial—has increased £9,250,000. I think that is a very serious condition of things indeed, and one requiring from the Government—from any Government, because I do not say this in any Party spirit—the most grave consideration. I say that an Expenditure which is growing year by year at the rate of £2,000,000 annually requires the gravest consideration from any Government, I do not care what Government it is. But I have not said all that I have to say with respect to our financial condition. If we are paying off the Imperial Debt we are piling up the local debt. It would be a delusion on our part to suppose that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been able to reduce the total indebtedness of the country by £8,000,000 during the past year. He has done nothing of the sort. If the rates have gone up the debt has increased in even greater proportion—that is to say, the local debt of the country. In 1879-80 the local rates were £26,000,000; but the new loans were £14,000,000, and the total expenditure for local taxation was £52,750,000. In 1882 the rates had gone up, as I have said, to £28,000,000; and the debt had increased from £137,000,000, in 1880, to £151,750,000. In two years we had put on £14,750,000 of debt. I have no doubt that that debt has been increasing in the same proportion, and that instead of being £151,750,000, it is now £165,000,000. That is a condition of affairs which I commend to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. What is our ability to bear this taxation? The Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that the accumulations of the country were going on, and based that statement upon the Income Tax. He went on to show that the Income Tax now yields something more than £2,000,000 on the 1d., whilst a year or two ago it only yielded £1,950,000, and a year or two before that only £1,900,000. That may be due, probably, to the increased efficiency of the officers engaged in the collection. I have no doubt that those acquainted with the state of affairs in the City will bear out the statement to which I have referred, and have no personal knowledge of—namely, that there is a great deal more energy and care exercised in the collection of the Income Tax, and in tracing its sources, than was formerly the case. With reference to this assumption, that the accumulations of the country are going on rapidly, I think, some years ago, they were estimated to be something like £235,000,000 a-year. I have had a calculation made for me under the direction of an extremely intelligent officer, Mr. Burdett, the Secretary of the Share and Loan Department of the Stock Exchange, of the value of the securities quoted in The London Daily Stock and Share List on the 1st of March, 1883, and of the same securities on the 1st of March, 1884, adding, of course, in every case, any new issue of Stock which may have been made in the interval. The object I had in view was to compare like with like, and, at the same time, not to confine myself to any estimate I might form of a particular Stock, or a particular class of Stock, for I conceived that the result that would be obtained in that way would be fallacious, and open to the charge that the statistics had been collected with more or less partiality. I took, therefore, the whole of the Stocks quoted in The London Daily Stock and Share List, and dealt with on the London Stock Exchange. The result was that I found that on the 1st of March, 1883, the nominal or part value of these securities was £5,056,000,000; and on the 1st of March, 1884, it was £5,211,000,000, showing that during the year there had been an issue, or additional capital invested in Stocks, shares, and bonds, of £155,000,000, assuming in every case par as the basis. The market value of this £5,058,000,000 on the 1st of March, 1883, was £4,907,000,000; and the market value of the £5,211,000,000 on the 1st of March, 1884, including the addition of the £155,000,000, was only £4,901,000,000, showing a decrease in the value of the whole property of £6,000,000, or an apparent loss in the year of £161,000,000. Now, there were 31 classes of securities in the official list, and the only exceptions to the general loss in value were gas securities, which improved nearly 9 per cent in the year, and English Railway Guaranteed Stocks and foreign railway obligations, which show a slightly increased value. These figures, therefore, show that the whole of the issue, the new issue during the year, appears to have been lost, and something like 0·27 in addition. I do not wish to lay too much stress upon these facts; but they are an illustration of what has been going on during the past year. They certainly seem to show that a great many people were poorer than they were last year; that there was less capital seeking investment; and that, in consequence of that fact, the investments themselves tended to become less valuable; and the fact which I have stated here, that the loss is spread over the whole of the property that is dealt with on the Stock Exchange, with a very few easily explained exceptions, goes far, indeed, to disprove the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to accumulations. There is another class of property in the country on which there has been a great loss. Everybody who is acquainted with the North of England knows that shipbuilding yards are idle, and that ships have greatly depreciated in value. The woollen trade is prosperous; the steam coal trade in the West of England is prosperous, I believe; but, taking trade all round, the complaint in connection with all businesses is that there never was a period when profits were so small, and in which there was so much difficulty to keep things going. But the point of this statement which I have made is the bad omen it affords, in one respect, as to the future. If it is a fact that investments and industrial undertakings during the past year have, to a very large degree, resulted in a loss of capital embarked in them, and if they have not increased in value to the amount of the capital embarked in them, then there will be a very great indisposition, during the coming year, to embark in enterprises that involve a certain amount of speculation and a certain amount of risk. I think, therefore, that profits having been small, and trade having been depressed, the tendency and danger which we have to fear is that employment will become less, and that, therefore, the interests of the country may be much more seriously affected than we suppose at this moment. I trust that may not be the case. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that for workmen and labourers—for the working classes generally—times are good, because prices are low; but if we are reaching that period when work will become scarce, or when the inducements to offer work will disappear, then we are reaching a period which may be one of considerable anxiety. But, Sir, there is another interest to which the right hon. Gentleman referred at some length, and with some helpfulness. I wish, myself, I could be as hopeful as he is. He spoke of the agricultural interests of the landlords and of the farmers.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I did not speak hopefully by any means of the farming interest. On the contrary, I said that the state of agriculture was unsatisfactory both for landowners and farmers.

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry I misrepresented the right hon. Gentleman. I can confirm the view he now expresses. In connection with this industry there has been a considerable and a serious loss of capital. No doubt there are a great many persons who rather rejoice at the losses that are sustained by landlords and farmers. ["No, no!"] Well, I hope I do not misrepresent the persons to whom I allude. I do not wish to do so. But I look on it as a distinct loss of capital and property to the country, for if a person who may possess, say, £10,000 invested in land finds that land depreciated to the extent of a quarter, a third, or half its value, as is frequently the case in many parts of England, his capacity for offering employment and entering into industrial enterprises is diminished. He was in many cases, probably, a mortgagee, and had not recovered the amount due to him on his property. The right hon.

Gentleman says he sees nothing at present to cheer the farmer or the landowner. I am very much inclined to agree with him. I fear that those who are on heavy lands in England have a very sad prospect before them. We must, I am afraid, accept a very large diminution, indeed, in the property of the country, as having been realized, and write off, instead of an accumulation, a considerable reduction of the available resources of the country. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman, I see, does not entirely agree with me. During the past few weeks I have had an opportunity of conferring with a great many gentlemen who have had large experience in dealing with, and in the management of, land; and I must say that, from all I have been able to gather, I believe what I have stated to be the case. We have here a condition of things which, in connection with a private enterprise, would be very serious indeed. If a gentleman were dealing with his own affairs, and he were threatened with serious loss in this or in that direction, he would naturally look around him to see how he could effect economies; and I want to know how, in this national affair, the Government are going to effect economies which appear to me to be essential and necessary? I consider these economies as essential in connection with local taxation as they are in connection with Imperial taxation. Some hon. Gentlemen complain that local taxation is relied upon on every occasion; but I speak as a city and a town Member, and I say that local taxation is more oppressive in the towns than in the country. I know a case in my own constituency in which lodgings provided for working men, of which the gross rental is £400, are subjected to local taxation to the amount of £62 a-year. There has been an increase in that local taxation of 15 per cent within the last two years; and the result is that the persons who are now carrying on this enterprise, without any profit or advantage to themselves, will be compelled to raise the rents in one of the poorest parts of the Metropolis in order to secure 3 per cent on their capital. These are very serious points. They must be met by a deliberate resolve to deal with the question. But it is not a political matter; and therefore, unfortunately, it is allowed to slip by. It is a very easy, and frequently a very popular thing, to increase expenditure. Hon. Gentlemen go down to the Treasury or Local Government Board and say this or that is necessary, and by dint of pressure they get what they want. The Treasury, rather than offend the supporters of Her Majesty's Government—and, as I said before, I am not speaking of the present Government especially, but of all Governments—give way to the theories of doctors, lawyers, and engineers, who force on expenditure for local or Imperial purposes. Thus, year by year, the charges become vastly in excess of the capacity of the country to pay. There is one point to which I wish to draw attention, because it is a very difficult case of expenditure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke in terms evidently of sorrowing apology of the practical financial failure of the Parcel Post system. Let me point out the figures to him. In 1881-2 the Estimate for the Post Office was £5,400,000, and the yield was £8,400,000, leaving a profit of £3,000,000. In the next year, 1882-3, the expenditure was £5,700,000, and the yield £8,800,000, or a profit of £3,100,000. In 1883-4 the estimated expenditure was £6,348,000, and the Revenue £8,980,000, so that the profit has sunk to £2,632,000. For the coming year the Estimate of expenditure is £7,200,000, and the Revenue £9,700,000, so that we are still going down. We are spending more money and are getting less profit. I have said it before, and I say it again, that the Government is the worst possible instrument by which you can carry on business. A Government must operate more expensively than anyone else, as they are subject to pressure and influences, and all sorts of difficulties which Corporations and private individuals have not to face in the conduct of their business. I do hope these figures will be a warning to Her Majesty's Government to embark as little as possible in business, and to hold as tight a hand as they can on these things. The right hon. Gentleman claims credit for the manner in which he has dealt with the Civil Service Estimates this year. Well, I think they show evidence this year that they have not been allowed to mount up; and in this matter I consider full credit is due to the Secretary to the Treasury for the assistance he has rendered. I have watched his exertions from this side of the Table, and I cannot but commend them, knowing myself how hard it is to resist the pressure brought to bear by hon. Members. The Government, after all, are responsible for the Expenditure of the country, and it is their duty to see that the whole of the cost of carrying on the affairs of the State are brought within such reasonable limit as the trade and commerce of the country justifies. We are now in a condition of considerable trial in the country; and it should be met as similar circumstances are met in connection with other concerns and in other places, by the exercise of the strictest economy and disregard of all pressure, and by a firm resolve that no right hon. or hon. Gentlemen, whether responsible or irresponsible, shall force them to incur charges which bring no adequate return to the country, and inflict unnecessary burdens on the taxpayers.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that in regard to a matter in which he took considerable interest, he wished to make the strongest protest against an observation which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He (Mr. Arnold) gathered from the cheers of the House, when the right hon. Gentleman made a statement in reply to the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) on the subject of the taxation of lands held in mortmain, that the whole House was anxious that such taxation should be imposed. But he demurred to the expression used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he said that the proper time for carrying out this necessary reform was when it pleased Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure dealing with local government. The words of the right hon. Gentleman on the subject were really a condemnation of the most illustrious of financiers, who had been sitting beside him during the greater part of the evening (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). For what was the fact? Why, the Prime Minister proposed dealing with the subject in 1853, again in 1859, again in 1863, and again in the year 1881. When the right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer he protested, in the strongest manner, against the exemption from taxation of lands held in mortmain, and declared that the exemption must be held as a grant. To whom was this grant made? Why, to wealthy Corporations, holding nearly 2,500,000 acres of the best property in the country—land worth not less than £12,000,000 sterling a-year. The tax that these Corporations ought to pay was in part levied from those wretched people, inhabiting the poorest houses, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had referred to as existing in his constituency, and in other crowded towns. This exemption was a tax levied upon the poorest and all sorts of taxpayers in the country; therefore, the proper time to carry out the reform was not when other measures were going to be introduced, but on the earliest possible opportunity. The right hon. Gentleman said, forsooth, that he proposed to deal with the subject when he dealt with the Death Duties as a whole. He (Mr. Arnold) could only tell the right hon. Gentleman that he would find it to be the fact that if he did not deal with the subject until he dealt with the Death Duties it would not be when the Government introduced a measure on local taxation. That was plain, for the reason given by the Prime Minister—which could not be answered—when he said that, owing to the fact that the great estates of this country were all settled estates, they could not fairly deal with the Succession Duty until they had reformed the tenure of land in reference to settled estates. He hoped the Government would propose a measure dealing with local taxation next year. This exemption was so unfair to the landed gentry of the country, who had to pay the taxes which these wealthy Corporations were exempt from, that it should not be allowed to exist a day longer; and he must express his very great regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not the boldness to propose this year the small but useful reform of taxing lands held in mortmain. Such a tax would produce him a sum sufficient to satisfy several of the claims they had heard of that night. Instead of dealing piecemeal with the Carriage Duty, for instance, such a tax would have enabled him to clear it off entirely, or it would have enabled him to get rid of the tax on silver plate, which the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) was so much interested in. At any rate, this exemption ought not to be continued one moment longer. Every moment it was continued the House was making a most unjust grant to a class of people in the country who were the least deserving of such consideration.

MR. CLARE READ said, he thought the Committee would entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) when he said that the middle classes of the country were passing through a period of great depression. But of all the middle classes, as the right hon. Gentleman had justly said, that connected with agriculture had suffered the most and longest. That class had found it necessary, in consequence of the reduction which had taken place in their incomes, to reduce their expenditure. It had been hoped and believed, when the present Government came into Office, that after their declarations of economy, they would have taken measures to reduce the Expenditure of the country. Instead of doing that, however, whilst they had made no remission of taxation, the usual enormous Revenue, or even a more enormous Revenue, was to be raised. The agriculturists had originally very small hopes of any assistance from the Government, and what little hope they had entertained had of late become sadly dimmed. They had no promise whatever of any further subsidy in aid of local taxation. He saw that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had given Notice of his intention to move the rejection of the Vote of £259,000 paid to Local Authorities in aid of repairs of disturnpiked roads. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not agree to that; but, at the same time, he wished to put one proposal before the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that, in those counties where the parochial system prevailed, instead of insisting that the Government grant should be given to the parishes, the whole sum apportioned to the county should be applied to the reduction of the county rate. He had mentioned this subject the other day, and he again referred to it in order to show the amount of injustice which prevailed in connection with the present system. Half the parishes in his county had main roads, and the other half had not; and, consequently, the parishes which had no main roads had, first of all, to contribute half the expenses of the main roads belonging to the other parishes, and then to contribute one-fourth in the shape of taxes allowed by the Government. In that way, the parishes having main roads received three-fourths of the cost, while the others had to pay this proportion and received nothing whatever. The burden was, therefore, augmented instead of equalized, and a considerable injustice done to those parishes which had no main roads. The other point he desired to refer to was that of the very large amount of Revenue derived from the Beer Duty. That matter, he thought, had entirely gone out of sight since the Prime Minister, some four years ago, was good enough to transfer the tax from malt to beer, which transfer was considered at the time to be a repeal of the Malt Tax. ["No, no!"] He repeated, that it was so considered; and it had been referred to very often as the greatest possible boon given by the Government to the farmers of the country. The farmers certainly did ask for a transference of the tax from raw to manufactured articles; but they certainly did not ask for any increase of the duty on beer. What had been the result? By the last Report of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, the net Revenue derived in 1872 from brewers' licences, maltsters' licences, and others, amounted to £7,213,000; in 1882 the present Beer Duty amounted to £8,530,000, the increase being £1,317,000. But that was not all. In the year 1872 there were brewed 28,000,000 barrels of beer, as against only 27,000,000 barrels brewed in 1882; so that the tax upon a gallon of beer which in 1872 was 1·79*d.*, was 2·14*d.* in 1882, the increase being $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a-gallon—a very considerable increase—which really meant that the farmers, instead of paying, as they did formerly, 21*s.* 8*d.* per quarter Malt Duty, had to pay much more. The Beer Duty was equivalent to a tax of something like 24*s.* or 25*s.* upon a quarter of barley. There was another point also which he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take into consideration, and that related to the licences paid by labourers for brewing. When that proposal was made by the Prime Minister he (Mr. Clare Read) had not the honour of a seat in the House; but he had written to the right hon.

Gentleman asking him whether it was not possible that the tax of 6s. should be collected in half-yearly instalments of 3s.; and he was told, in the most courteous terms, that although he had wished it to be done, he found that the Inland Revenue Commissioners were against him on that point. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer had tried the experiment with regard to game licences; why, then, should he not try it with regard to the licences which the labourers had to pay for brewing? The right hon. Gentleman had said that even- ing that in consequence of his reducing the game licence, so that by the payment of 20s. a man might have 14 days' sport, the result was that there had been no loss of revenue, but rather, as he (Mr. Read) believed, a small increase. And if a similar alteration were made in favour of the labourers, he apprehended that a greater number of them would brew than did so at present, and that would be a considerable boon to them. As a rule, they did not want to brew, except in haysel and harvest-time, and the cost of the licence was a considerable amount for a man to pay before he could brew at all. Before the labourer could touch a drop of beer brewed in his own cottage, he had to pay 6s. for a licence, 5s. for a bushel of malt, 1s. for hops, besides the cost of firing and the use of casks; in all about 13s., or about a week's wages, before he could brew any beer whatever. This was a heavy tax upon the labourer. Although this cottage brewing was considered by some as a trifling matter, it was a very general custom in the Eastern Counties, and he thought it had much in it to commend it to those Gentlemen who advocated temperance principles, for most of the labourers who brewed at home hardly ever entered a public-house.

DR. CAMERON said, he objected to the postponement of the arrangement under which the minimum charge for inland telegrams would be 6d., instead of 1s., as at present. After the Resolution embodying that proposal was carried last year, the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General would recollect that he (Dr. Cameron) had not taken the smallest step—he had asked no Question, nor in any way urged the right hon. Gentleman to deal precipitately in the matter. On the contrary, he had given the right hon. Gentleman and the Treasury full credit for wishing to introduce a system of 6d. telegrams in the most satisfactory manner, and thought it was better to let them take their own time for dealing with the matter in the best way. Having taken that course, he felt himself the more free to express his dissatisfaction at the postponement which had been announced. What reason had been given for that postponement? Why, that the Parcel Post had not paid. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had last year said—"The Post Office is engaged with the Parcel Post. We shall occupy ourselves with the arrangement with respect to the 6d. telegrams next year; but at present we shall confine ourselves to the Parcel Post." If he had said that, he should not have complained. The amount received on account of the Parcel Post had been, during the last year, £155,000; but what was the loss spoken of? The right hon. Gentleman had told the Committee that his estimated receipts under that head were £340,000 for the eight months during which the Parcel Post had been in operation, and that it had only produced £155,000, the deficiency being £185,000. But the right hon. Gentleman had also told the Committee that of that £185,000 the sum of £150,000 was in the shape of capital expended; preliminary expenses, as he (Dr. Cameron) presumed, of horses, carts, and other requisites. But would any man in that Assembly look upon that expenditure as loss? It was simply capital invested. He believed the right hon. Gentleman was incorrect in treating it as loss; and if that amount of £150,000 were deducted, there remained the bagatelle of £35,000 as representing the loss for eight months. His chief objection, then, lay to the extraordinary ground on which the postponement was to take place. Anyone accustomed to business must perceive that this result for the first eight months during which the Parcel Post had been in operation showed a very good beginning. The right hon. Gentleman, however, was frightened at that loss, and that, too, while he was making out of the Post Office a profit of £2,600,000 a-year. Of course, he had no objection to this large profit being derived from the Post Office; but he thought it was bad policy to postpone the arrangement for cheap telegrams simply because during the first eight months the trifling loss of £35,000 had been incurred in connection with the Parcel Post. All the departments of the Post Office ought, in his opinion, to be worked together; and it was as unfair to take the loss on the Parcel Post separately, and make it a reason for postponing the reduction in the cost of telegrams, as it would be to deal simply with the cost of the Money Order Department, and make it a reason for withdrawing Postal Orders because the Money Orders did not pay. The Department should be regarded as a whole; and it must be borne in mind that an increased number of telegrams must result in an increased number of letters, which would increase the Revenue of the Post Office. But there was another argument against postponement which deserved consideration from an economical point of view. The telegraph poles and wires were set up, and that involved as much expense, and the deterioration was as great, as if they were in full work. Then, there were the learners of telegraphy to be considered. The right hon. Gentleman had said he could not state how many learners were to be kept on; but, whatever the number might be, their wages would have to be paid for the nine months which were to elapse after next October before the system in question was to come into operation. How the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer could make out that the cost in this year's Budget, if the cheap telegrams commenced on the first of October next, would amount to between £250,000 and £300,000 he was utterly at a loss to understand. But if he included the sum expended on capital account, he emphatically protested against such a proceeding. The investments in plant and machinery, whether on account of the Parcel Post, or on account of the Postal system generally, were judicious investments; they were money sunk, from which profits was expected to be realized; and they were not to be put in the same category with money wasted on the Duke of Wellington's Statue, for instance, or money spent on the Egyptian War. The reduction in the price of telegrams would, of course, not show a profit at first; but it would do so in a very few years. The longer, then, the experiment was deferred the longer would it be before their telegraph system became remunerative. The Committee which considered the question of telegrams, seven years ago, was constituted on account of a movement on the part of the Treasury. It was proposed to increase the charge for telegrams sent from railway stations, for telegrams sent on Sundays, and for Press telegrams. But the Committee pointed out that the wires and the staff were only doing half work; that the superannuation allowances were going on, whether the staff did full work or not; and they said that the real way to make the Telegraph Service pay the country was to increase the facilities offered to the public; to extend the business of the Department by, at the proper time, reducing the charge for telegrams. That was the view taken of the matter by the Committee, and it was upon that recommendation that he (Dr. Cameron) brought in the Resolution of last year, which was agreed to by the House. It was then stated by the Postmaster General that there were 5,700 telegraph offices in the Kingdom, through which only 80,000 telegrams were transmitted daily, the average being 14 or 15 for each office. Now, a second class clerk would transmit twice that number of telegrams in an hour; so that throughout the whole Kingdom only one half hour's work was done in the course of the day. As a matter of fact, they had increased the staff of learners and the wires and poles to the tune of £180,000, and yet they found themselves with this beggarly lack of business. Having regard to the extent to which the telegraph system was worked, it was obviously important to take some measures that would stimulate it. During the earlier years, when the system was in the hands of the Post Office, the business went forward by leaps and bounds. It might be said that in 1872 the business was in fairly good working order. There were 15,000,000 telegrams sent per annum, and in 1882-3 the number had gone up to 33,000,000. But in 1882 the increase on the previous year was only 746,000, or less than half the increase of that year, while in 1883-4 it had fallen to 640,000. That showed that, having reached the limit of progress, the advance in the Department was getting less and less, and that if the existing staff were to be employed, the charges must be cut down—in other words, the step recommended by the House of Commons must be taken. He made these remarks, not because he found fault with the Treasury for wishing the experiment postponed; had they made up their minds to postpone it originally, he should have acquiesced in the arrangement; but he strongly dissented from the course which had been taken of going so far, and then stopping short; about as unsatisfactory a course as could be pursued—as unsatisfactory as that book in Hudibras, in which

“The story of the Cat and Fiddle
Is told, and breaks off in the middle.”

As, however, the step was to be postponed, he trusted the Government would make up their minds as to which system they would adopt, and that they would proceed in a more business-like manner than had been the case during the last eight months.

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, after the speeches which have been delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) and the hon. Member who has just sat down, I trust the Committee will allow me to make a few remarks in reply. I feel it somewhat difficult to steer a middle course between the two speeches to which I have referred, because the one takes just as gloomy a view as the other takes a rosy view of the Post Office business. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) not unnaturally expresses disappointment at the postponement of cheap telegrams until August next year. I can assure him that I should have been extremely glad if the position of the Post Office and the general finance of the country had allowed the introduction of the system at the date originally fixed—namely, the 1st of October in the present year; but anyone who listened to the Statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer must, I think, have come to the conclusion that, unless we are prepared to say that his estimate of the Revenue is unduly gloomy, he certainly has no margin available for the purpose. The only criticism I have heard on that estimate of Revenue is the suggestion thrown out that it erred on the side of being somewhat over-sanguine. That was the opinion which, although not actually expressed, was thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is left with a balance of £270,000; and if you reduced the price of telegrams on the 1st of October next, the consequent loss of Revenue would have taken absolutely the whole of that balance, and left my right hon. Friend with no balance at all. No doubt, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow is correct in saying that, so far as mere Revenue is concerned, the introduction of 6d. telegrams would not have involved such a loss as that which has been described. The loss would have been probably not more than £50,000 or £60,000; but it has always been the principle on which the Post Office is administered that improvements should be carried on out of income, and that we have no such thing as a capital account. If the 6d. telegrams were introduced on the 1st of October next, instead of on the 1st of August next year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have been compelled to spend during the current financial year the whole amount required, instead of spreading it over two years. Now, my hon. Friend, by some of the remarks which he made, seemed to think that this delay would be the cause of great waste. I do not think the waste will be anything of importance, because the works are not suspended, and all that we have done is to spread their completion over 14 instead of six months. With regard to the telegraph learners, no possible disadvantage, but a real advantage, will result from the postponement, because it is well known that it takes two years to become a skilled telegraphist. If we had introduced the cheap telegrams on the 1st of October next, there would have been the disadvantage which has always presented itself to me—that we should have had to meet the increased work with a staff not so skilled as it might have been; but having 10 months longer in which to complete the work, we shall have a better trained staff, and there will be less chance of the general telegraph business of the country being in any way dislocated. With regard to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster on the decline of the revenue of the Post Office, I think the fact that we have no capital account will, to a certain extent, explain that decline, because every improvement has to be paid for out of income; and although the Post Office is to be regarded as furnishing an important part of the Revenue, yielding, as it does, nearly £3,000,000 annually to the Exchequer, yet, in the interest of the commerce of the country and of the public convenience, I can conceive no greater mistake than that the Post Office should be administered merely as a Department of Revenue; because there is something, to my mind, deeper and of more importance to keep in view, and that is, that the Post Office, in various ways, may be administered so as to conduce to the commercial prosperity and general convenience of the country. I can conceive no money so badly spent as if, for the sake of saving a few thousand pounds, the public were deprived of the introduction of the Parcel Post, or of a plan such as that of Postal Orders, which have greatly facilitated the transmission of small sums of money. If we look at the Post Office somewhat more narrowly than has been done by the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), we shall be able to arrive at some very satisfactory conclusions; and I venture to bring these figures before the Committee, not so much in the defence of the Department which I have the honour to administer, as to show some set-off to the gloomy things that have been said this evening, and that there are certain things occurring in this country which may make us hope for its prosperity. I will compare the profits of the Post Office in periods of 10 and five years. I take 10 years ago, 1873-4, because that was the period selected by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to show the growth of the Civil Service Expenditure. He mentioned that the Post Office expenditure had increased in that period by £2,600,000. Yes; but seldom has there been an expenditure which has yielded a richer harvest. We have increased our expenditure; but we are paying, at the present time, nearly £1,000,000 a-year more profit to the Exchequer than at that time. But I will take a period of five years, and I will compare the profit which is now yielded by the Post Office and Telegraph Service with the profit yielded five years ago, and I will endeavour briefly to show what has been done in that time. Compared with five years ago we are now making nearly £200,000 a-year more profit, and what has been done in those five years? £150,000 a-year has been spent in improving the position of the telegraphists and sorters, and I say there never was an expenditure of public money which was more justifiable than that. If we had yielded to mere popular demands and thrown away this money we should deserve the severest censure; but I believe that if an increase of wages had not been conceded it would have been impossible to carry on the administration of the Department; and I think there is no economy so unwise as refusing to increase remuneration when you are convinced that the circumstances of the case demand that that increase of remuneration should be given. £150,000 a-year has been spent in that way; and now I come to another item of expenditure to which I will particularly call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster. In addition to the £150,000 spent three years ago in improving the condition of the telegraphists and sorters, we have spent about £100,000 in improving the condition of the letter carriers, both town and country, in England, Scotland, and Ireland; and if the increase of expenditure on the telegraphists and sorters was justifiable, this increased expenditure in improving the condition of the letter carriers was still more justifiable; and in proof of this I may call to witness the right hon. Member for Westminster. Ten years ago there was a most serious agitation among the letter carriers, who demanded that their position should be improved and their scale of wages should be increased. They received much support from many hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House; but the most influential and the most important support they received was an earnest letter from the right hon. Member for Westminster, saying that the Government ought at once to concede their demands. In spite of that authoritative declaration, although the right hon. Gentleman occupied the position of Secretary to the Treasury, where he had far more control over the wages of the letter carriers than the Postmaster General, nothing was done to meet those demands, which in 1873 were considered so just, until the year 1882.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to make any misrepresentation. A considerable addition was made to the pay of the letter carriers in London in 1874.

MR. FAWCETT: Yes; but this letter of the right hon. Gentleman referred not only to the letter carriers in London, but to the letter carriers throughout the Provincial towns; and I believe it will be found that between 1873 and 1882 nothing whatever was done to improve the condition of the letter carriers in the Provincial towns of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken.

MR. FAWCETT: At any rate, in 1872, before the meeting to which this letter was addressed was held, the system of good-conduct stripes existed in London; but there was no letter carrier out of London, in England, Scotland, or Ireland, who, until two years ago, had the privilege of wearing a good-conduct stripe. Now, these two improvements in the position of the Post Office staff have involved an expenditure of about £260,000 a-year; but there has been, I am glad to say, another improvement in the position of that staff. I do not think there is any body of public servants in this country who have been so miserably paid as the small sub-postmasters. I looked into their case, and their position has been improved at a cost of about £35,000 a-year; and all these improvements have involved an outlay of about £300,000 a-year. If this money has not been required the expenditure has been an act of extravagance, for which I am prepared to bear the full responsibility; but I can only say that I did not, and I would not, recommend that 1s. of this money should be spent until I had made a careful investigation of the whole subject—until, as far as I could, I had exhausted every means of investigation. Having come to the conclusion that this improvement in the position of these men was required in the interests of the Public Service, I can only say that I am perfectly willing to bear the entire responsibility of having recommended the Government to agree to this outlay to improve the position of these hard-working public servants. But that is not the only increased expenditure within the last year or two. We have spent at least £150,000 in capital expenditure on the Parcel Post; £180,000 have been spent in preparing for cheap telegrams; and, consequently, we had last year an expenditure of over £600,000, which was not in operation five years ago; and yet, in spite of all this, so great is the progress of the country, and so general is the diffusion of education, and so great has been the use of the Post Office, that we are actually making £200,000 a-year more than was made five years ago. I am free to admit that some of our calculations as to the Parcel Post have not turned out as we hoped they would. I am prepared to take the responsibility of the estimates; and I am sure the Committee will see that, at any rate, we had very slender data to go upon. I always felt that it was little more than guess-work; but, after all, our estimate of the number of parcels to be carried has not been very far out. We estimated that we should have to carry 27,000,000 parcels a-year, and we are carrying at the rate of 21,000,000 a-year; so that we were not so very far out. But what has prejudicially affected the revenue is that the weightier parcels, and consequently the postage on them, have not come as we estimated they would, and that has affected our revenue. If we had known beforehand the number of parcels we should have to carry, and if we had known how the parcels would be distributed, and what would have been their weight, we need not have made such great preparations as we did make; but before the Parcel Post was introduced, as far as I was able to ascertain, the opinion was almost unanimous that our preparations, instead of being excessive, were not sufficient to meet the business we ought to anticipate. The thing I was most anxious to ensure was that there should be not the slightest risk of dislocating the Letter Service by the introduction of the Parcel Post, for in a commercial country like this it would be impossible to put a pecuniary value on the loss and the inconvenience that would have been caused if the Letter Service had been dislocated for a single day. I can only say this—and not in the slightest degree to take credit to myself, for the credit is due to the permanent officials of the Post Office—that although our preparations were, perhaps, somewhat more costly than they might have been if we had known all the circumstances, yet everything was so carefully prepared that, as far as I have been able to ascertain, this great change in the Postal Service was introduced without a single letter being delayed or disturbed in its course. This, I think, is a most important fact. Although we found that we had, perhaps, made somewhat too large preparations for the amount of business to be done, I trust the Committee will allow me to point out this. We shall be able, without any increase of staff, and with scarcely any increase of expenditure, to make arrangements also for an International Parcel Post. Reductions of expenditure are every day taking place; and whether the Parcel Post business is great or small, I feel perfectly certain that we can adjust expenditure to the amount of business, whatever it may be, and that soon we shall have a balance between revenue and expenditure. I think also that this is to be borne in mind—that if there has been some loss on the Parcel Post the public have gained an advantage; because instead of destroying private agencies and enterprises for carrying parcels, the Parcel Post has acted as a stimulus to a better and cheaper private service. I am sure it would be a great mistake to estimate the effect of any postal improvement by the financial results of one year. The Penny Post, when it was first introduced, involved a certain sacrifice; and that, I believe, must be the case in regard to every postal improvement. I believe—and I express this opinion with the greatest confidence—that, in the course of a year or two, the profits from the Post Office will be as large as they have ever been; and I do not think it is a very bad business at the present time, considering that we are making a profit of £2,800,000; while great improvements will have been introduced into the Service, and improvements will have been effected in the position of the staff. This is not simply a question which concerns the interests of the staff, but which concerns the interests of the public; and I do not know that I can better describe, in my concluding remarks, the advantage which the public derives, or may derive, from this improvement in the position of the letter carriers, sorters, and telegraphists, than by quoting the opinion of a provincial postmaster, who the other day said that before the recent revision of the letter carriers' pay it was often difficult to get such a class of men as the correspondence of the country could properly be entrusted to. He said—

“We shall now be able to draw men from an improved class; and I believe there is no expenditure which has ever been sanctioned with regard to Post Office administration more important than this, which will confer not only greater advantage on the Post Office staff, but also on the public, whose correspondence that staff has to deal with.”

I am sure the right hon. Member for Westminster would be the last to wish not correctly to state the facts; but there is one thing I ought to point out, the bearing of which he will see in a moment. That is, that within the last two years the cost of manufacturing Post Office stamps has been transferred from the Inland Revenue to the Post Office itself, and that means no less than £135,000 a-year. Consequently, the Post Office expenditure has been apparently increased by that amount.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Everyone in the House, I am sure, feels that the right hon. Gentleman has done the work belonging to his Department in a manner which deserves the greatest credit. We have listened with great interest to what he has just said; but I cannot help thinking that we are sometimes led into some error with regard to the Post Office revenue by the distinction, of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is so fond, between that portion of the Revenue which arises from taxes and that drawn from other sources, and by his sometimes reckoning the Post Office as a source of Revenue which is not to be called a tax. In a certain sense that is true; but the repetition of that view rather leads the public to believe that we do not look on the Post Office as a source of Revenue, and that we ought not to look upon it as a source of Revenue. We have always been in the habit of so considering it; and I think it would be a great mistake if we were to consider that we have nothing to look to but that the Post Office paid its expenses, did its work properly, and left an ordinary margin of profit. We ought to look upon it as a fair and legitimate source of Revenue to the State; and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes his proposals for any financial year, he always takes into account the Revenue which he can rely upon from the Post Office. Therefore, there is naturally and properly an amicable contest between the Postmaster General and the Secretary to the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to what is to be allowed, on the one hand, from the improved efficiency of the Department, and the greater convenience of the public; and, on the other hand, as to maintaining a fair and reasonable balance of Revenue. We have an instance of that in what has been done to-night. An increase which is admitted to be desirable, which has been promised, and to which a great deal of interest is attached, is to be laid aside, because it is necessary to maintain a balance of Revenue. Now, with regard to the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I do not know that I have very much to say with regard to what may be called the Budget proper. In point of fact, the right hon. Gentleman has produced a Statement which shows so close a balance between Revenue and Expenditure that he does not find himself in a position to make proposals with regard to the alteration, or reduction, or remission, of taxation. On the other hand, he does not seem to consider the time favourable for proposing any great change in our system of taxation. I am not sure whether, under the circumstances, it would not have been as well if he had postponed what he said with regard to the Death Duties, as he was not prepared to deal with them now. With regard to the Statement itself, it is, undoubtedly, one which, if not too sanguine, is not one to be called gloomy. I think the very interesting statistics given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) may induce the Committee to consider that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken by no means an unfavourable view of the position of the country at the present time. We hope that the Estimates he has prepared may be justified by the results on all accounts; but I would also point out that while the right hon. Gentleman has been careful to take a sufficiently full view of the Income Tax, he has not, perhaps, been quite so ready to make allowance for the possible exigencies of expenditure. I shall rejoice if we find that the provision he has made for expenditure is not exceeded; but looking to the state of things in regard to foreign policy, and other matters to which I need not refer now, I fear no margin is left for possible exigencies. With regard to the other interesting points to which the right hon. Gentleman has directed attention, which lie outside the Budget proper, we have the proposal as to dealing with light gold. Observations have been made by some hon. Members dealing with the subject, and it has been considered by some of the authorities in this House. I myself was not aware what the proposal was to be, although I had heard a report upon it. I cannot say that, at the first blush, I like the proposal for turning the half-sovereign into a token. It is introducing a principle into our Gold Coinage which we ought to be shy of. Not having considered the question, I do not wish to express a positive opinion upon it; but I hope we shall have a good opportunity of discussing this subject. The right hon. Gentleman will, perhaps, tell the Committee what course he intends to pursue with regard to that and other proposals in the Budget; when he intends to bring them forward and to take the Votes upon them; and whether they will be embodied in one measure, or in separate measures? With regard to the proposal as to a reduction of the Interest on the National Debt, that is also a matter upon which we ought to have time for consideration; and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will lay on the Table a Statement showing what the working of his proposal will be. I am not quite sure that I understand the observations of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to a portion of the relief that will be given by a reduction of the rate of interest—that portion of the relief to be given at once to the taxpayers. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that the relief is to be given from year to year if the rate of interest is diminished, or is the amount now appropriated, £28,000,000 a-year for the reduction of the Debt, to be applied subject to annual reductions and fluctuations according to the reduction of the amount to be paid as interest on the Debt? Will they be changes made from year to year, or will the £28,000,000 a-year be reduced once for all, or at long periods? If this is to be done by reducing the £28,000,000 year by year according to the reduction in the interest, that will be a strong blow against the principle upon which the £28,000,000 rests. I do not know that there are any other points which, at the present moment, claim attention; but I must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having brought his financial operations of the year to a satisfactory conclusion; and we must also congratulate him upon his clear and able Statement.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that at that hour of the night (12.30 A.M.) he thought the time had arrived for him to reply to the remarks which had fallen from hon. and right hon. Gentlemen in reference to the Financial Statement he had made earlier in the evening. First of all, however, he wished to thank the Committee for the manner in which they had been good enough to receive the very long Statement it had been his duty to make. He had tried to make it as clear as he could; but he was afraid, looking at the questions he had had to deal with, it had been impossible for him to meet by anticipation every point that might be raised. He had been asked by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) whether the House would have an opportunity of fully discussing the plan for converting Three per Cent Stock, and whether there would be a separate Bill dealing with the Gold Coinage. There would be many opportunities of discussing the proposal as to the Gold Coinage, for it would be the duty of the Government to bring in a Bill for carrying out in detail the plan he had explained to the House; and on the different stages of that Bill there would be full opportunity for discussing the scheme. The right hon. Gentleman also asked him whether, under the conversion plan, the relief to the taxpayer would be varied from year to year, or would be once for all. The proposal was entirely in harmony with the Act of 1876, and the automatic arrangement of last year would not be altered in the slightest degree. The hon. Member for Andover (Mr. F. W. Buxton) had asked him, in the first instance, how Australian gold would be dealt with under the new plan affecting the Gold Coinage. Australian gold would be dealt with under the new plan as it was dealt with now—that was to say, it would still be a legal tender. Light Australian gold found in the country would be treated in the same way as light English gold; but light Australian gold coming in after the adoption of the new system would be subject to the same rule as any other coin coming in and found light—that was to say, it would be sent to the Bank to be dealt with under the present law. Then his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had enlarged a good deal upon the plan for creating new 10s. gold pieces, and had pointed out that great danger would arise from a new trade springing up at Birmingham and places abroad, for the manufacture of illegal 10s. pieces, in order to gain the 1s. in 10s. which would be secured in consequence of the amount of gold in the new coin not being worth its nominal value. The hon. Member had spoken of that as a very probable evil, and as one in regard to which they might derive warning from what had happened up to the present time. But his hon. Friend had entirely forgotten that if that trade was likely to be established for the sake of the small 10 per cent gain upon gold coin, how was it that it had not been established for the sake of the much larger gain—20 per cent—which might be made in connection with the silver coinage, or for the sake of the even larger gain on the bronze coinage? A 2s. 6d. silver coin contained less than 2s. worth of silver; and though there had always been a certain amount of false coinage—that was to say, of spurious money—in the country, there had never yet been to any appreciable extent an illegal coinage of money, silver or copper, of the same value as the current coin. That was a trade which, if it were likely to spring up in the case of gold coin, he should have thought would have been much more likely to spring up in the case of silver coin. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had complained that he had made no allusion to the Wine Duties. Well, there was a saying that “Speech is silver and silence is gold.” He had used a few words with reference to the Wine Duties last year; and the Committee was aware that the Government had laid upon the Table full information as to the negotiations which had been carried on with certain wine-producing countries on this subject. Having full knowledge of the present position of the question, he had intentionally refrained from saying anything about the Wine Duties that evening. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had given them some very useful, and no doubt accurate, information as to the trade of the country; and they were all of them very much obliged to him for it. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was not justified in attributing the increase of the Income Tax to the extent that he had done to the accumulation of capital in the country. That was a subject upon which it was his duty to be in constant communication with the Heads of the Inland Revenue Department; and whilst he recognized to the full the valuable work and increasing energy of many of the officers in connection with that Department, and the consequent benefit to the Revenue, these authorities concurred in the opinion that the increase which had taken place in the Income Tax was mainly due to an increase of capital in the country. The right hon. Gentleman had given them a case which was not altogether to the point. He had quoted a Return as to the value of Stocks dealt with on the Stock Exchange on the 1st of March, 1883, and the value of the same Stocks on the 1st of March of the present year. The period covered was 12 months, and it showed that the value of certain securities had shrunk, although their nominal value had increased by £150,000,000. Well, but the shrinking of the value of Stocks was no evidence of falling-off in accumulation in the course of 12 months; but the increase of the accumulations was measured by the additional amount of Stocks bought. The increase and decrease in the nominal value of these securities was owing to different considerations from those referred to by the right hon. Gentleman; and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had no doubt there was a very large amount of capital accumulating every year in the country. Where it came from there was not time just at present to discuss; but there was no doubt a steady accumulation of capital going on in the country, and though some was not invested, a large quantity was added to the property-paying Income Tax. Touching upon the question of local taxation, it was said by the right hon. Gentleman that when they thought they had done so much in diminishing the Imperial Debt they must set against that diminution the increase of Local Debt. Now, no doubt the increase of Local Debt was a very important question; but those two kinds of Debt were totally different. When they increased Local Debt they intended to make a judicious remunerative investment. Whether it was really judicious and remunerative would depend upon the wisdom shown by the Local Authority; but the investment was one, as a rule, earning interest. He did not say that was so in every small case; but a great mass of Local Debt was raised for remunerative purposes; whereas Imperial Debt had been incurred for wars, and was not of a remunerative character at all; therefore, although it was, of course, very important to check any undue increase of Local Debt, it was mathematically wrong to set the Imperial Debt and the Local Debt against each other, as if they were of like nature. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had said that the words he had used about the taxation of the lands in mortmain were a condemnation of the First Lord of the Treasury; but he had no idea in what this supposed condemnation consisted. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had asked him to consider the question of brewing licences, and to try to make them fall a little less onerously on the cottagers. The hon. Member knew that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had been making some inquiries in reference to this subject; but there had not been any time to consider the question fully before the present Budget. He would not reply to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) on the subject of the Post Office and the Telegraphs, because he had already been answered most fully by the Postmaster General. He believed he had now answered all the questions that had been put to him; and once more he thanked the Committee for the indulgence they had extended to him.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, that another opportunity would arise to call attention to the great omission from the Budget of any relief to local taxation; but he wished to call attention now to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to subventions. Did the right hon. Gentleman include prisons and the Irish Police?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Yes.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, that arguments against the policy of subventions was hurled at the heads of hon. Members by the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues; and when they challenged him he and his Friends were silent. In the debate on local taxation he had challenged the President of the Local Government Board as to what he had said last year, and he quoted his own words and figures. He proved to the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that the lunatics and police had decreased in proportion to the subventions; and now the Chancellor of the Exchequer came forward and lumped together the prisons and the Irish Police. There at once went £1,000,000 out of the £2,900,000. That was the way in which the policy of subvention was attacked; and when they came to grapple with the figures they entirely broke down.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he had followed the Return which bore the signature of the Secretary to the Treasury of the late Government. The distinction between the payments made for Imperial purposes and the payments made for local purposes was made by the late Government; and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had simply followed their Return. If he remembered rightly, the Return commenced in 1875 or 1876.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT said, he should like to make a protest against the extremely narrow view which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had enunciated to the Committee with regard to the Imperial and the Local Debt. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Imperial Debt was a Debt contracted through the operations of war, and therefore had been mere waste.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he had not said anything of the kind. What he had said was that the Imperial Debt had been mostly incurred for objects which were not pecuniarily remunerative; and therefore it was not fair to put it side by side, as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr.

W. H. Smith) had done, with Debt incurred for local purposes.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT said, he had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that expenditure on war was not a useful expenditure. He had certainly stated that Imperial Debt was incurred for wars, and was not of a remunerative character at all. Would the Chancellor of the Exchequer state that the money spent upon the construction of a Town Hall at Birmingham was more beneficial and more remunerative than the money spent in the Imperial efforts which saved England and Europe from the universal domination of the First Napoleon, or which guaranteed the security of 250,000,000 people in India? [Mr. WILLIS: Certainly.] That was just what he should have expected to hear from the hon. and learned Member for Colchester. No doubt the hon. and learned Member would like to be a down-trodden worm under some French or Russian despot. He could quite understand that; but what he should like to know was, whether this Local Debt was incurred for objects which were more remunerative and valuable than the military operations which had saved India? There were three striking features in this Budget. There was, first, the substitution for the ancient and time-honoured Three per Cents, of the New Two-and-a-Half, and the New Two-and-Three-Quarter per Cents. There was then the issue of these bad half-sovereigns—which would remind them of the worst days of the Plantagenets; and there was, last of all, this miserable surplus of £200,000, which he sincerely hoped would not prove to have been the price of the lives of General Gordon and those depending upon him. He should remind the right hon. Gentleman, when the proper time came, that he had promised them that these Bills, which were to deal with changes in taxation and Revenue, should be brought in at a reasonable hour. He had promised them that they should be brought in at a time which would give them ample opportunity for full discussion—that the measures would not be hurried through the House at 3 o'clock on an August morning, as was the National Debt Bill last Session. He could not offer the right hon. Gentleman his congratulations upon the Budget Statement he had made. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had not been so fortunate as to hear that Statement; but he had read it since. He had no doubt it was delivered with all the right hon. Gentleman's characteristic lucidity and eloquence. The right hon. Gentleman had made some very important admissions. He had told them that trade was bad; that profits were low; and that incomes derived from land were still unsatisfactory. It was to be hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would, therefore, induce the Government to reconsider their fiscal policy, and to give up the present futile system of so-called Free Trade, which was ruining the country, and which was causing the accumulated capital of centuries—certainly of generations—rapidly to disappear, and which was giving other countries every possible advantage over us in the race for prosperity, and even for existence. He believed that a more judicious policy of encouraging our Colonies by turning our emigration and our trade into Colonial channels, rather than into foreign channels, would largely remedy the evils which at present existed.

Question put, and agreed to.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

[BILL 3.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be read a second time To-morrow, at Two of the clock."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, before the Motion was agreed to, he wished to protest against the way in which the interests of private Members had been trampled upon by the Government. There was not, he believed, any precedent in recent years for the appointment of Morning Sittings before Easter, a practice to which the Government had recently resorted. There was no valid ground for the deprivation from which private Members were suffering at the hands of the Government.

DR. CAMERON asked if the hon. Member for Eye was in Order in making these remarks, the Morning Sitting having been fixed?

MR. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. Member are not out of Order.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the observation of the hon. Member for Glasgow showed a deplorable want of acquaintance with the Rules of the House. The Government could not be surprised at Motions for Adjournment and discussions at inconvenient times, if they deprived hon. Members of their opportunities of bringing forward their Motions. He had himself been a serious sufferer from that cause. He ventured to say that the Government would not be gainers by the practice, because at times most convenient to himself, and perhaps inconvenient to the Government, he should now feel it his duty to call attention to subjects which he had not, owing to the action of the Government, been able to bring forward at the appointed time. That day every expedient had been resorted to for putting off the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard), and that of the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Brice). Those two important Motions had been pushed about in a manner which caused great inconvenience to the House generally, and to the hon. Members in whose names they stood. [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE dissented.] He must ask the protection of Mr. Speaker against the incoherent mumblings of the President of the Local Government Board. This was a very serious question. The Government complained of Obstruction; but he ventured to say that if they paid more respect to the rights of private Members, and if they had made up their minds as to their policy, there would have been none of the debates, or certainly but one quarter of the debates, which had taken place, and to which Ministers so much objected, on the Egyptian Question. There would also have been much saving of time in regard to the raising of other questions and inconvenient Motions. He rose, however, for the purpose of moving, as an Amendment to the Motion before the House, that the Bill be put down for Monday at 4 o'clock, instead of for that day at 2 o'clock. He doubted if Her Majesty's Government would gain anything by the Morning Sitting to-morrow; they would probably waste time, while they injured private Members. He felt it his duty to make this protest in behalf of independent Members, whose rights were infringed; and he should repeat it on every future occasion, when the Government pursued their present course of treating private Members unfairly, while, at the same time, they failed to advance Business in any way.

MR. WARTON said, he begged to second the Amendment of the hon. Member for Eye. The Government persisted in treating the House with scant courtesy; hon. Members had been trifled with in the most ridiculous manner with regard to the Sitting of to-morrow morning. On Tuesday they were told there would not be a Morning Sitting on Friday; on Wednesday they were told there might be; and to-day they were told there would be a Morning Sitting on Friday. In that way the Government, of their own sweet will, trifled with the convenience of Members and the public time. He joined in the protest of the hon. Member for Eye against a Morning Sitting to-morrow. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade said—"It is already fixed;" it was in that way the House was irritated so much, although the Government had not sense enough to see it. If it were otherwise, he was convinced that a great deal more Business would be gone through in the House. He had put down a Notice of Motion that Morning Sittings should not be fixed except by Motion made in the ordinary way.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "To-morrow, at Two of the clock," in order to insert the words "upon Monday next,"—(Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett),—instead thereof.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, the Motion of the hon. Member for Eye, if carried, would have the effect of wasting the time of the House.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that would not be so. Private Members would proceed with their Motions.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE repeated that there would be a waste of time. He presumed that Orders of the Day would be taken before Notices of Motion. However, the hon. Member, in his opinion, had lost his opportunity by not making his Motion at an earlier stage. The House had certainly agreed to a Morning Sitting for to-morrow.

MR. HICKS said, he would appeal strongly to the Government to reconsider the course they were taking. There had been more Morning Sittings up to that early period of the Session than had been known in the history of the House. And what had resulted from them? Almost every one of them had been wasted, and that, too, by the Government themselves. At one Morning Sitting the House was called together to take into consideration the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill; but instead of proceeding with it the Government took another Bill, the consequence being, as he stated, that the Sitting was wasted. The Bill was then put down for another Morning Sitting, which was likewise nearly wasted. Then, again, they had insisted on a Morning Sitting last Tuesday, and Her Majesty's Government were well aware of the result. They were now asked for another Morning Sitting to-morrow; but he thought, judging from the feeling shown by the House, that the Government were not likely to derive any benefit from this tyrannical treatment of hon. Members. On the contrary, they would probably discover that "force was no remedy." They might get Members into their places at 2 o'clock; but it by no means followed that their Bills would be passed. He hoped, therefore, they would reconsider their line of conduct with regard to these irregular demands upon the convenience and rights of private Members, and allow the Business of the House to proceed in the ordinary way.

MR. BIGGAR said, if the Government were determined to have a Morning Sitting to-morrow the time could be very pleasantly occupied in discussing the Stockton Carrs Railway Bill, which was down for second reading.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 21: Majority 38.—(Div. List, No. 69.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read a second time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 109.]

(Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be read a second time To-morrow, at Two of the clock."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

MR. LEAMY said, he rose to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be taken on Monday. Irish Members did not think it would be taken on so short a Notice. This was a Bill in which many of his hon. Friends were interested, a large number of whom were absent from the House, and certainly had no idea that it would be taken at a Morning Sitting without adequate Notice being given. Many Irish Members were at that moment in Ireland; and he thought it only fair that the Bill should be postponed until Monday on that account, the Notice being too short in the case of Gentlemen who, when they went away, were perfectly easy in their minds as to the Bill not coming forward in their absence. He believed that if the Bill were one which affected England or Scotland it would not be treated in this way. However that might be, the only result of putting the Bill down for to-morrow would be that its discussion would occupy so much time that no progress would be made with it. If the Government desired to act fairly towards Irish Members interested in the measure they would have no hesitation in assenting to his proposal, or take the Bill next Tuesday, when he supposed there would be a Morning Sitting also. Amongst those Irish Members interested in the Bill and absent from the House were the two Members for Dublin, supporters of the Government, the two Members for the City of Cork, and the senior Member for Waterford, not one of whom, as he had said, had any reason to expect that it would be taken at a moment's Notice. It was, of course, reasonable that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill should take every opportunity that presented itself of advancing it; but, believing that the course now proposed by the Government was unfair, he begged to move that the Bill be taken on Monday.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "To-morrow, at Two of the clock," in order to insert the words "upon Monday next,"—(Mr. Leamy,)—instead thereof.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Government were not able to accede to the wish of the hon. Member for Waterford, Notice having been given in the most public manner on Wednesday. As far as his observation went, there was a very large gathering of Irish Members, including, certainly, the Members for two of the cities mentioned. Those hon. Gentlemen who were absent would have been able to read in The Irish Times of Thursday the announcement made by the Government on Wednesday, and be in town in time to take part in the debate to-morrow. He was sorry to dissent from the opinion of the hon. Member.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read a second time To-morrow, at Two of the clock,

SCHOOL, &c. BUILDINGS (IRELAND)
BILL.—[BILL 45.]

(Colonel Colthurst, Mr. William Shaw, Mr.
Thomas Dickson, Mr. Blennerhassett,
Mr. Patrick Martin.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel Colthurst.)

MR. COURTNEY said, he did not intend to oppose the Bill; but it raised a question which intimately concerned a large number of people, because it proposed to facilitate the granting of loans of public money to build schools. The difficulty with regard to Bills of this kind was in obtaining security, for the buildings themselves never afforded security, being of no value except for the purpose for which they were built; and it could not be supposed that security could be easily enforced against priests who might become responsible for the debts. It must, however, be worth considering what guarantees the State could get; and, for his part, he thought it would not be unreasonable to suggest that the Bishop should offer some guarantee. In the first place, he would be able to see the application for a loan was not foolishly or improperly made; and, in the next place, that the money should be properly spent; and by reason of these circumstances, and his influence in his diocese, he could protect himself against loss. He did not see any difficulty, in principle, in applying that plan to the larger question of Training Colleges; but without pledging himself to that proposition, he would assent to the second reading, on the understanding that before the next stage was taken there should be some plan before them for obtaining proper security.

MR. SEXTON said, he thought the hon. Gentleman showed a sincere desire to meet the object of the Bill; and with regard to the suggestion that the Bishops should co-operate in an application for a loan, he was perfectly disposed to assent to that, believing it to be desirable that the Bishops should be associated with such matters. As there were, according to the statement of the Chief Secretary, several hundreds of schools in Ireland, many of which were not in a fit state, he hoped the House would assent to the second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 15th May.

PUBLIC HEALTH (MEMBERS AND OFFICERS) BILL.—[BILL 164.]

(Sir John Kennaway, Mr. Cowen, Mr Long.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Kennaway.)

MR. GRAY said, he thought the House ought to know something more about this Bill before they agreed to the second reading. He did not object to the Bill, because he knew nothing about it; but he thought that was a good reason for protesting against its being taken now. He would ask the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill to say whether it was applicable to England alone, or to the whole of the United Kingdom; and if it was only applicable to England, why he so restricted it? A measure of this kind ought to be general in its application. The Public Health Acts for England and for Ireland were practically identical, although they were enacted separately; and as the hon. Member thought it incumbent upon him to amend the Public Health Act of England in certain particulars, he ought to take the trouble to ascertain what were the corresponding clauses in the Irish Act and amend them also, and so preserve that uniformity which had been established by a codifying Act a few years ago. This Bill, he thought, should be made general, and should not be restricted to one part of the country; and if the hon. Member would undertake on the Committee stage to re-commit the Bill, so as to extend it to Ireland, he should not further object to the second reading.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that as the question of public health in Ireland was dealt with by separate Acts from those referring to England, and was under entirely distinct authorities, it would be impossible to make Amendments in the Acts of the two countries at the same time; but he could promise the hon. Member that if the same difficulty existed in Ireland as in England he should have no objection to amending the Irish Acts. A grievous hardship, undoubtedly, existed. It was stated in the form of a Question put to himself a few days ago, and he had then said that a hardship existed which ought to be remedied; but he would await the issue of an appeal that was pending in a case which had occurred in the West of Ireland before he attempted to deal with the subject. At the same time, he stated that he would give all possible support to this measure, because he knew that a certain grievous hardship did exist. If the same hardship existed in Ireland he would certainly help the hon. Member to remedy it.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the right hon. Gentleman to state what the hardship was?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE replied that it was an extremely technical point, which it would be desirable to deal with in Committee. The 3rd clause referred to proceedings being taken by a common informer against persons who had become servants merely by letting a room to a Local Authority. In some cases the service to the Local Authority had been of the smallest kind; and yet a whole class of Acts had been invalidated by the mere fact that a small room had been let to the Local Authorities. The penalties were recoverable at the instance of a common informer.

MR. GRAY said, there was a great deal more than that in the Bill.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE replied that it would be open to the hon. Member to move to leave out other portions of the Bill; but the main principle of the Bill was as he had stated it.

MR. LEAMY asked whether the hon. Member would be willing to leave out Clause 2? According to the right hon. Gentleman the really important clause was the 3rd, which was to prevent a common informer pursuing a person for acts which were illegal now, but which Clause 2 would make perfectly legal.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT suggested that the objections raised by the hon. Member were objections to be raised in Committee, and that if the Bill was now read a second time they could be dealt with in Committee, when the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would be able to give the objections thorough consideration. He did not think the hon. Member would lose anything by assenting to the second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 15th May.

said, he would not go into the details of this Return; but it was most important that it should be granted, in order to show that public money was being wasted. Prizes were given away in a most reckless fashion, while the best teaching and the real honours were obtained outside these Colleges. The Chief Secretary knew perfectly well the meaning of this Return; but while not saying that the Return was unreasonable, he said all the information it could give would be brought out before the Commission which he proposed to grant. It was most important that the House should know, on authentic evidence, which were the grievances complained of, so that they might understand how they could be remedied. Unless this authentic information was given they could not tell what the grievances were, nor could they understand another reason there was for placing this Motion on the Paper. No one knew whether there was to be a Commission of men actually impartial, or whether further inquiry into the whole question would yield further evidence. Whether he pressed for this Return or not depended upon whether the Chief Secretary answered his question as to what sort of a Commission it was that he intended to give, and as to whether he would put upon it some person who would represent the views of the Catholic clergy and those of his hon. Friends around him. They were entitled to have such a Representative on the Commission; but he would now content himself with making his Motion.

MR. SEXTON wished to urge upon the Chief Secretary the reasonableness of this Motion. The Irish Bishops, as heads of a body directly interested in this matter, because of the exclusion of Roman Catholic students from their fair share of prizes, met recently and passed a Resolution outlining the Catholic claims, and that Resolution attracted public attention to the subject. He thought his hon. Friend had no option but to make this appeal to-night, because the right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Commission might possibly be appointed to-morrow. Therefore, there could be no delay allowed. It was essential that there should be an Irish Member on the Commission; and if the right hon. Gentleman would state that there would be such a Representative of the Irish Bishops and the Irish public the work would be more than half done.

MR. TREVELYAN trusted that hon. Members who were interested in this question realized the full gravity of the step the Government had taken in consenting to the appointment of a Royal Commission. With regard to the remarks of hon. Members as to the continued anxiety to obtain this Return, he could not help thinking that they underrated altogether the importance of the step the Government had taken. He would not say that that step would not have been taken but for Parliamentary pressure; but the step would not have been taken if the Government had not been satisfied that there were serious grounds for inquiry of the nature which he had several times indicated, and to which this Return referred. That step was taken at a time when the authorities of the Queen's Colleges were, undoubtedly, having their time largely taken up by responding to demands for Returns, and by sending answers to Questions put in this House. Those Returns and answers were assuming a volume, which amounted to something very like a Parliamentary inquisition into their condition. The Government were of opinion that it was necessary to choose between this Parliamentary inquisition, which might, in the long run, become somewhat costly and voluminous, and have the business done by a body of gentlemen whom they could thoroughly trust. They had taken their decision; and he must say he could not see his way to departing from that decision. If, when the names of the Commissioners were announced, hon. Members felt no confidence in the proposed Commission they would then obviously continue their inquiry; and the knowledge of that had, of course, influenced the Government in the selection of the Commissioners. With regard to that selection, the first object of the Government was to get men who were thoroughly acquainted with education in Ireland; and their next object was to get a Commission which should have upon it some men who were primarily interested in the matter. If the Queen's Colleges could stand the test of an examination by men who were accustomed at their Universities to see that the greatest amount of educational work was done for the least amount of money, they would stand any test they would be required to stand. The one method of obtaining rigid and thorough workmen on the Commission was to have a small number, and it was proposed to appoint three. Another point was that the Commission should set to work at once. The Government were perfectly aware that it was necessary to have on the Commission some person who would represent those people in Ireland who imagined that the education funds of the country were not at present properly administered. He had had placed before him the names of several gentlemen of high University distinction who would be very proper persons to serve on this Commission; and, as a Member of the House of Commons, he was proud to find that several of those gentlemen were in the House; but he felt that it would be a distinct disadvantage to select English Members, and for that reason he had set aside two hon. Friends of his own, who were second to none as connected with the practical work of University education. The gentlemen whom he had asked to represent English University education had been specially selected as not belonging to the House of Commons, and on that ground alone he had not asked any Member of the Irish Party to sit on the Commission. If any Member of the House of Commons did sit on the Commission eventually, which he hoped would not be the case, he would then communicate with Irish

Members as to whom from among them the Government would be willing to accept. With regard to a Member of the Commission who might be supposed to represent the views of the Prelates and educationalists who had been referred to, the Government thought they could get such a man. That was the Commissioner whom they were most anxious about; and, under the circumstances, while he should be very sorry to ask the House to negative the Motion for these Returns, he trusted the hon. Member would postpone the Resolution, say for a fortnight. If the hon. Member did that, he could not see that he would be in any degree in a worse position than he was now; whilst, on the other hand, it was quite certain that during the interval the Government would get the names of all the Members of the Commission. He hoped that by to-morrow, or Tuesday, he should have the acceptance of a gentleman who had been asked to serve as representing a very influential body.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, that he was with his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) on this subject of University education; but he would ask him to accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. He was certain that the right hon. Gentleman would make such a selection as would be acceptable to the people of Ireland. Suitable ecclesiastics, who were not Bishops, could be obtained; and, on the whole, he thought that the hon. Member for Longford would best serve the interests he had at heart if he would allow the matter to stand over for a fortnight.

MR. O'BRIEN said, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had to leave the matter in suspense. The right hon. Gentleman seemed perfectly to realize the fact that the entire usefulness of the Commission would depend on its commanding the confidence of the Irish people; and while he (Mr. O'Brien) was sorry to say that the right hon. Gentleman's statement did not indicate a desire to procure anything like a full or preponderating representation of Irish opinion upon the Commission, still he thought it was desirable, in view of the passing promise given them, that the body appointed should be such as to secure the confidence of the people of Ireland, that they should, for a time, at all events, suspend their judgment on the matter. With the leave of the hon. Member for Longford, therefore, he would move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. O'Brien,)—put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday next.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— RELIEF OF BERBER AND KHARTOUM.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of putting a Question to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, of which I have given him private Notice. It is, Whether Her Majesty's Government have arrived at any resolution as to the steps that should be taken for the relief of Berber, and for securing the safety of General Gordon at Khartoum? The Question is almost identically the same as that which I put yesterday, and I wish to disclaim either any design of discourtesy to the noble Earl (Earl Granville) or desire to disregard the Rules of the House by putting it then without Notice. It struck me at the time that this was a matter of very general interest; and I thought, possibly, some information could be given which would have been satisfactory to this House. I am not sure that I was not to some extent justified in this course, because on referring this morning to the usual channels of information that action has been foreshadowed "elsewhere," which, if confirmed, will lend increased value to any communication that may be made by the noble Earl. I take it that we have it now as a matter of fact that Her Majesty's Government recognize that there is extreme danger at Berber; and if in the interest of the public service it is not considered desirable to enter into details, I will not, under the circumstances, unduly press the noble Earl; but what I and others feel is this—that, if it were possible, we should like to know what the actual danger is at Berber at this moment; whether it is a danger of so grave a nature that it requires to be dealt with immediately, or whether it is one which will allow the Government time to consider what course they will take; and I should like, in the latter event, to know how soon the noble Earl thinks he will be able to make some announcement with regard to the intentions of the Government on the subject? Then with regard to Khartoum. Here I come to what I consider to be the very important admission which the Government have made to the country. There are two statements in the papers this morning; one is that, in the opinion of the Government, General Gordon is in perfect safety at Khartoum, and the other is that Mr. Power is in very considerable peril in the same place and at the same time. These two statements cannot be reconciled. We are also told that Her Majesty's Government thoroughly recognize the obligations they are under for General Gordon's safety, and that, recognizing it, it is their duty to put themselves in a position to discharge it should the occasion arise. To anybody with a certain amount of common sense who reads these words, they must appear to foreshadow some action; and I am at a loss to know whether, when Her Majesty's Government have undertaken the responsibility which I assume they have undertaken from these words, how that responsibility will be increased by giving the public information as to what they intend to do; and I also believe a statement of what they intend to do will have a very great effect in bettering the position of General Gordon, and also the position of the garrison at Khartoum. I would also like to ask the noble Earl another Question. I see in The Morning Post to-day a telegram which states that at an extraordinary Cabinet Council held yesterday at Cairo, a resolution was adopted declaring that the immediate despatch of an expedition to Upper Egypt was imperatively necessary, and that Nubar Pasha had been instructed to communicate that resolution to Her Majesty's Government. I wish to know whether anything of the sort has been done; and whether the noble Earl is able to inform us what steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take with regard to that expedition?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am obliged to the noble Earl for having given me Notice this morning of his intention to put this Question. I am quite sure that, being a good Conservative, he will be satisfied in conducting the Business of the House in a regular way. I can quite understand the great anxiety and curiosity that the noble Earl feels on this subject, and which is not peculiar to himself, but is common to all your Lordships. The noble Earl speaks of the responsibility which we have undertaken; but we are also under responsibility in regard to the answers which we give to Questions put to us. I do not think I have much to add to the answer which I gave the other day to almost the same Question put by the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) who sits on the front Benches opposite. With regard to Berber, our information is that it is in immediate danger; but I cannot go beyond what the Prime Minister said not many hours ago, that we have received communications from Berber, and have replied to them. As far as Khartoum is concerned, I am really not aware that "elsewhere" anything more was said than I said on Tuesday, when I stated, in the strongest manner possible, the obligations under which Her Majesty's Government felt themselves to be, in common with the country, in regard to the safety of General Gordon. That acknowledgment of obligations involves the responsibility of carrying out the duties imposed by those obligations; but I am not prepared to give the noble Earl any further information on the point which has been raised by the noble Earl, though he has said something new. The noble Earl has said that he learnt something new yesterday—namely, that though I said I did not consider Khartoum or General Gordon in military danger, Members of the Government in the other House were of a very different opinion in consequence of the intimation we had given to Mr. Power. But this intimation was given very nearly a month before General Gordon had left this country. His position is not different now from what it was then. Is it to be held, because we said we believed there is no military danger to General Gordon at this moment, that we are insensible as to his position, and feel no interest or sympathy with him? It has been a consolation to me this afternoon to have had a conversation with that very distinguished man, Sir Henry Gordon, who repeated to me what he had said before—that he believes his brother is in no military danger at Khartoum, whatever cause of danger might exist elsewhere. He read to me a letter from his brother, dated the 12th or 15th of March, in which General Gordon said he should be more powerful two months hence, when the waters of the Nile began to rise, than he was two months ago. I am sorry I cannot give the noble Earl more information; but the noble Earl will probably appreciate the feeling that there are responsibilities under which Her Majesty's Government believe that they ought not to say at any moment exactly what they will or what they will not do.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, it is not my intention to press the noble Earl, after his last declaration, on any matter connected with the intentions of Her Majesty's Government; but I wish to make one observation with respect to the mode in which he received the Question of my noble Friend last night. The noble Earl stated that it was the uniform practice of this House that Notice, public or private, should be given of Questions which it was intended to put in this House. I will not attempt to traverse his opinion in that respect, his experience in this House having been so much larger than my own; but I desire to call attention to the difference between the conduct of the Government in the other House and that in this House. In the other House Questions are constantly put to Ministers on the spur of the moment, and they are not disposed of in the cavalier manner which has been adopted by the noble Earl in this House. Some answer is almost always given. It may, of course, be in the public interest that answers should not be given to Questions such as that of the noble Earl, especially without Notice; but I think I am right in calling attention to the curt and—if I may use the word in this House—the snubbing rejoinder that no information can be given unless Notice is given beforehand, is not the manner in which the Government receive Questions in the other House put at a time of crisis like this, with respect to which the interest of all Her Majesty's subjects is urgent and extreme. I think the noble Earl presses the tradition and practice of your Lordships' House too far, and that he might have given information in this House which is not refused in the other. I can only explain the noble Earl's conduct in one way—he has been embarrassed by the somewhat effusive language of the Prime Minister in the other House, and thinks it necessary to hear what the right hon. Gentleman has said before giving an answer himself. That is a position which I can easily understand; but I think he exposes his apprehensions in too nude a manner.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, although it is irregular, I must ask to be allowed to say a few words in reply to what has been said by the noble Marquess. I have been a great many years a Member of this House, and have long held official and semi-official positions; but this is the first time I have been accused of want of respect to your Lordships' House. Without regard to the differing practices in the two Houses, one thing is quite clear, and that is, that yesterday, in regard to the chief Questions put in the other House of Parliament, Notice, either public or private, had been given; and I cannot conceive that any one should have thought it necessary to make an innovation here. I put it to the noble Marquess himself, who has had so much experience, whether there is any possible advantage, either to this House, to the Government, or to the public, that noble Lords, having Questions to put to Ministers in regard to which they must have made up their minds in the course of the day, should jump up at the very last moment, and I am sure without the slightest intention of doing so, taking by surprise the Minister to whom the Question is addressed. I believe the tradition of this House is an excellent one, and one which should be acted upon; and, as far as I am concerned, I shall try to adhere to it, whether in Government or in Opposition. If the noble Marquess likes to break this rule, of course, he can do so; but I do not mean to be deterred by any taunts of his from reserving to myself the right to have some Notice given of very important International Questions before they are put to me.

STOCKTON CARRS RAILWAY BILL (by Order.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that in consequence of certain incidents which transpired on a recent occasion it would, perhaps, be as well that he should state to the House, at the opening of the remarks he was about to make with regard to this question, that it was in no shape or form tinged with the colour of Party. He might mention, as an evidence of that, that among the chief opponents of the measure who had taken a very large part in promoting Petitions and otherwise expressing an opinion against the scheme were, in the first place, the Chairman of the Stockton Liberal Association, and another chief opponent, who employed something like 1,000 hands, was, he was told, a former President of the same Association. He mentioned that fact so as to clear the ground entirely in regard to the district to which he was about to refer, lest the House might be induced to believe that the measure partook somewhat of a Party character. The merits of the scheme, to which he wished to draw the attention of the House, were very clearly set forth in the official Report of the Inspector of the Board of Trade, Colonel Yolland. Colonel Yolland said—

"I do not gather, from the statements which the engineer laid before me, that there is any specific want on the part of the public that will be satisfied by the construction of this short piece of railway, but that it is proposed as a speculation, as the means of utilizing a small portion of unoccupied ground in Stockton Carrs; and provided the public safety is not unnecessarily endangered by the construction of this work, there would probably be no objection to its being sanctioned. But two level crossings of public roads in the town of South Stockton are proposed to be constructed on this short portion of railway."

Colonel Yolland went on to say—

"In my opinion, other means of reaching this piece of unoccupied land at Stockton Carrs should be found. The number of persons killed at level crossings of different kinds on railways in the year 1883 was 78, and 51 were injured, and these numbers were in excess of the numbers killed and injured at similar level crossings on the average of the previous eight years."

He would beg the attention of the Home Secretary, who was responsible for the lives of Her Majesty's subjects, and also of the President of the Board of Trade, to these statements. Colonel Yolland concluded by saying—

"I therefore recommend that the proposed level crossings may not be allowed, as they appear to me to be entirely unnecessary."

Now, that was the Report of Colonel Yolland; and he had read it to the House, because he thought it better that a statement of that kind should emanate from an impartial authority, and not from one who, like himself, had had his attention called to it by persons locally interested in the merits of the scheme. Now, with regard to the level crossings to which Colonel Yolland referred, he himself (Mr. J. Lowther) had taken a recent opportunity of inspecting the ground in question. He had gone down to this place, and he had been enabled to judge for himself. He had visited it at a time when a portion of the working men who must necessarily pass over the tract of ground where these level crossings were proposed to be constructed were returning to their work from their dinner. He was, therefore, in a position to assure the House that a very large number of workmen would be daily compelled to pass over these level crossings, and that very considerable inconvenience, if not, as Colonel Yolland suggested, actual danger must arise. Statistics were not usually very acceptable to the House, and he only proposed to inflict a very few upon it; but he thought it right to mention that observations had been taken on a given day, and it was found that the piece of ground proposed by the Bill to be occupied by these crossings was traversed in one day by 309 vehicles and by 12,594 foot passengers. In addition to a traffic of that kind, there were no inconsiderable number of the rising generation playing about, who were the inhabitants of the neighbouring houses, and he left the House to judge how far it might or might not constitute an augmented danger. He might also inform the House that there had for some time past been a strong local feeling in South Stockton against level crossings as a general principle. But there had been what might be called a very formidable agitation locally set on foot against these particular level crossings. It was only fair to mention that among the most active opponents of these crossings was one of the gentlemen who had appeared before the Chairman of Ways and Means the other day in order to state his approval of the scheme. Mr. Walker held a position upon the Local Board as Chairman of the Paving Committee, and he had taken a very active part against these level crossings; but he seemed to have become enlisted in favour of those proposed by the present Bill. He hoped the House would allow him (Mr. Lowther) to place before them as briefly as he could the extraordinary, unparalleled, and he hoped he might say for-ever-after unexampled, history of this scheme. The Board of Health of South Stockton consisted of 15 members; and when the proposal was made before the Board that the Bill should be approved there were seven members who voted for the scheme and six against it. There were, he was told, 14 members present; but one gentleman, who was a promoter of the Bill as well as being a member of the Board, had the good taste to abstain from voting on that occasion. He thought the House would fully appreciate the good taste displayed by this gentleman in not voting in a matter in which he was personally interested. The question was raised before the Board on a second occasion, when a virtual attempt was made to rescind the vote previously arrived at. It appeared on that occasion that eight voted for the scheme and seven against it; but among those who voted for it he regretted to find the name of Mr. Promoter Breckon, the gentleman whose self-denying ordinance on the previous occasion he had felt it his duty to commend. Thus the approval of the Bill was carried by a majority of one, that one being a promoter, who happened to possess a seat upon the Local Board. Public opinion in Stockton had not been idle during that time. A requisition was got up at a public meeting of the inhabitants, at which the chair was taken by the Chairman of the Local Board of Health. At that meeting a resolution was passed in the following terms:—

“That this meeting regrets the action taken by the Local Board of South Stockton in assenting to the Bill of the proposed South Stockton Carrs’ Railway, thereby approving of a level crossing being made through the public thoroughfare.”

A second resolution was also passed—

“That this meeting respectfully recommends the Local Board to reconsider their decision, and strongly urges the importance of opposing the measure in Parliament.”

These resolutions were signed, on the part of the meeting, by Mr. John Watson, the Chairman of the Local Board of Health. The effect of the passing of these resolutions did not appear to be absolutely nil, because he found that on the next occasion that the matter came before the Board it was proposed that the Bill, as amended in a manner he would afterwards describe, should be approved by the Board. Against that proposal he found there was a majority of one, the form of amendment being that the amended Bill be referred to a certain Committee—[Mr. DODDS: No.] At any rate, the Board declined to sanction the scheme at that time; but after it became the lot of certain members of the Board of Health to vacate their seats under the Act of Parliament a new election was held to fill up the vacancies. He would not trouble the House by going in full detail into the result of those elections, as he was anxious to save the time of the House; but it brought matters to this point—that he now held in his hand a Petition, signed by a majority of the legally-elected members of the Local Board of Health, praying the House not to give its consent to this Bill.

MR. DODDS rose to a point of Order. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he was about to read to the House a Petition signed by certain members of the South Stockton Local Board of Health. Now, the point of Order he desired to raise was this—whether, having regard to the Standing Orders of the House, it was competent for any hon. Member to read a Petition with reference to a Private Bill which had not been presented to the House in the ordinary way—namely, by being deposited in the Private Bill Office of the House?

MR. GUY DAWNAY: This is the third reading of the Bill, and no other opportunity can be afforded for bringing a Petition before the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that in order to enable the Speaker to rule upon that point, he must inform him of the fact that the Petition was one which had been signed by a majority of the legally-elected members of the Stockton Board of Health, praying the House to decline to give its assent to the third reading of the Bill. It was obvious, therefore, that this was not a Petition praying to be heard by counsel and witnesses in the usual manner, but was totally distinct from the ordinary procedure in respect of Private Bills.

MR. SPEAKER: I understand that the Petition has not been presented to the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I am about to present it now.

MR. DODDS: It cannot be presented to this House except in the ordinary way—namely, through the Private Bill Office.

MR. SPEAKER: It appears to me that this is not the time to present the Petition, and that, technically, the right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to read it. But the right hon. Gentleman is entitled to state, generally, the substance of what passed.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, his only object in alluding to the Petition, or in taking any other steps in regard to the Bill, was to place the House of Commons in full possession of the facts of the case, in order to allow the House, without prejudice to one side or the other, to decide the question on its merits. Following the instructions of Mr. Speaker, he would confine himself to the statement that this was a Petition signed by eight gentlemen out of 15 constituting the Stockton Local Board of Health, immediately after a popular election which had produced a change in the composition of that Body, and the Petition requested the House to decline to give its assent to the third reading of the Bill. The Board of Health had taken other steps to make its opinion known; and he thought it right, after the interruption which had just occurred, that he should, in defence of the Local Board, state how it came about that they took the unusual form of making their wishes known to Parliament by signing a Petition for presentation to the House on the part of the majority. As soon as the new elections had terminated, a requisition was forwarded by certain members of the South Stockton Local Board, requesting that a meeting of the Board should be convened, at which formal action was to be taken in the direction of rescinding the previous Resolution to which he had referred. This requisition was addressed to the clerk of the Board, and he (Mr. J. Lowther) held in his hand the answer which was sent to the requisitionists by the clerk of the Board. He saw that it was dated, "South Stockton Local Board, Clerk's Office, Stockton-on-Tees, April 1884," and there was in the margin of the letter the following words in print:—"Clerk, Joseph Dodds, M.P." It would appear that the attempt to suppress the opinion of the legally elected representatives of the ratepayers of South Stockton which had just been made in that House, was attempted likewise on a previous occasion; for he found that the Gentleman who was described as "Joseph Dodds, M.P.," and who signed the Circular as clerk to the Board, sent the following reply to the requisitionists, who were simply seeking, in a regular manner, to obtain the decision of the Local Government Board of Health on the subject. The latter acknowledged the receipt of the communication from the Local Board. It went on to say—

"It is not legally competent to the Board to proceed in the manner indicated in their requisition. I shall, however, send out notices for a special meeting as requested."

He would not trouble the House with details of the special meeting that was held. He would only point out that, owing to some technicality in connection with the bye-laws of the Local Board of Health, it was found that it would not be practicable to rescind the previous Resolution without certain definite steps in the way of notice being taken, and also that a certain proportion of the members must be present, and that the majority for rescinding the Resolution already passed must be one of two-thirds. In consequence of that difficulty, the Local Board of Health had been driven to an expression of their views in a somewhat unusual manner; but, at any rate, they did pass a Resolution in the following terms:—

"That, in the opinion of this Board, the Resolution passed in favour of the Stockton Carrs Railway Bill should be rescinded, and that legal steps should be taken to rescind such Resolution as soon as may be convenient."

There voted for that Resolution eight, and six against it. He was told that the gentleman who abstained on the first occasion, on the ground of his connection with the promotion of the scheme, voted amongst the minority; but that was a detail into which it was not necessary to enter. The fact was that the Local Board of Health of South Stockton, as now constituted, had, by a majority of eight against six, declared against this scheme. He had already referred to the measures which had been taken locally for expressing the opinion of the ratepayers and their representatives. He had omitted, however, to state that in addition to being signed by the majority of the Local Board of Health to which he had referred, and in addition to the Resolution of the Local Board, steps had been taken to express the local opinion. In passing, he might remark that his hon. Friend the Member for the North Riding (Mr. Guy Dawnay) had had forwarded to him several Petitions, largely signed by working men employed at the works situated in the vicinity of these level crossings, which working men would have to pass such level crossings several times in the course of the day. There had been, as he had already stated, other means adopted to give expression to the local opinion. Some of the large manufacturers, including the Chairman and ex-Chairman of the political Body to which he had already referred, had presented a Petition to Parliament in a regular manner, asking for leave to be heard by counsel and witnesses against the second reading of the Bill. They were refused that privilege by the Standing Order, or Locus Standi Tribunal. He did not presume to express any opinion upon the action of that Tribunal. From his knowledge of the Gentlemen who composed it, he had no doubt they arrived at a thoroughly just and honest conclusion. They disallowed the Petition, and the Bill became what was technically known as an unopposed Bill. The House would be aware that unopposed Bills went before the hon. Baronet the Chairman of Ways and Means. Of course, it would be presumptuous in him to say anything as to the competency of the Chairman of Ways and Means to conduct an inquiry in regard to any Private Bill introduced into Parliament; but he would take the liberty of saying this—that it would not be possible to find any Gentleman more thoroughly capable of conducting an inquiry into the merits of any Bill, if he had only the means afforded him of conducting an impartial inquiry. He (Mr. J. Lowther) would only say of his own knowledge, as the result of inquiry, that the hon. Baronet who now filled that Office not only exerted himself the same as his Predecessors in times past to discharge the duties imposed upon him with efficiency, but that he had, notwithstanding the considerable demands upon his own time and health, gone very much more closely into the details of unopposed Private Bills than was formerly the case. But what were the means which the Chairman of Ways and Means had at his disposal for sifting the merits of unopposed Private Bills? The hon. Gentleman had to be dependent upon such evidence as might be forthcoming at the instance of the promoters of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman did not have the advantage of hearing witnesses, except from one side; and he had not the advantage of hearing those witnesses cross-examined by counsel. The hon. Gentleman, in fact, had to discharge duties somewhat analogous to those which were performed by a Grand Jury. He had to hear ex parte statements, and arrive at the best conclusion he could upon the very slender information presented to him. That being the case, the hon. Baronet must have been largely dependent upon gentlemen who represented the promoters of the Bill. What did he find? The hon. Baronet, who, as he (Mr. J. Lowther) had said just now, was exceedingly desirous of forming, after the fullest inquiry which was available to him, a comprehensive judgment upon the issue submitted to him, had one engineer called before him. This engineer was a gentleman about whom he could say nothing beyond this, which was, that he was one of the actual promoters of the Bill, and that he had devoted his attention throughout his life not to railway matters at all, but to matters connected with water. He was a river engineer, who had not, he (Mr. J. Lowther) believed, attained any great mark in his profession; but, of course, that was a matter with which the House had no concern. It was, however, right that he should point out that he was not, in any shape or form, a gentleman capable of expressing the opinion of an expert upon a railway matter. [Sir ARTHUR OWAY: Who is he?] The gentleman to whom he referred was Mr. John Fowler. The hon. Baronet had asked for the name; and he might tell the House that although the name of this gentleman was "John Fowler," he must not be confounded with the eminent engineer of that name. He was a gentleman of local celebrity only, and the hon. Baronet, in his desire to obtain full information, had actually had palmed upon him a gentleman who was not a railway engineer at all. It was just as right that they should consult an occultist for the tooth-ache as to employ a water engineer upon questions of railway construction. [Mr. HORWOOD: Oh!] He begged the hon. and learned Member's pardon; this was a matter which involved not only very great local, but general importance; and he should endeavour to compress his remarks as much as possible. He did not regard the interruptions of the hon. Member as anything personal, because the hon. Member almost invariably interrupted every hon. Member who addressed the House. In addition to the water engineer he had referred to, another witness, apparently, was the solicitor to the Bill, who, as had been mentioned the other day, was the son of the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds). He did not, however, attach much importance to that fact in connection with the matter he was referring to. One other gentleman was, he believed, examined—namely, the Chairman of the Paving Committee, who was, he understood, a potter by calling, and in no shape or form could be qualified to speak with authority upon an engineering question. But if the hon. Baronet had been enabled to avail himself of the expert evidence, which would have been forthcoming if there had been an opportunity of seeking for it, he might have had before him a civil engineer of considerable eminence, a partner of the eminent Mr. Fowler, not the obscure gentleman to whom he had already referred, but the well-known Mr. Fowler.

He referred to Mr. Baker, the civil engineer, who had told the Chairman of the Local Board of Health that he would have been only too glad to give evidence before a Committee. The Chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Local Board of Health was also a member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, as also was the Chairman of the Committee of Works. The hon. Baronet, with the slender information at his command, did, as he (Mr. J. Lowther) was sure he always would do, the best he could under the circumstances. The hon. Baronet had inserted into the Bill certain provisions, among others that no train was to pass over these level crossings at a greater speed than three miles an hour; that a red flag should be exhibited in front of a coming train; and that a foot-bridge, 6 feet in width, should be erected over each crossing. The hon. Baronet further provided that there should be a close time during which no train should be run, whether preceded by a flag or travelling at any rate of speed whatever. Those hours the hon. Baronet had fixed according to such local information as had been presented to him by one side. The hon. Baronet had naturally selected those hours which he thought would be most convenient to all parties concerned; and the hours he had selected were between 11.30 A.M. and 1.30 P.M. Now, this was one of the dangers of an inquiry of this kind, conducted with limited means of information as those which were at the command of the hon. Baronet; because, as a matter of fact, while one of the large firms employing some 1,000 hands who would have to cross over this ground fixed the dinner hour at from 12 to 1, another firm also employing 1,000 hands fixed the dinner hour at from 1 to 2. Hon. Members would see that it was the intention of the hon. Baronet to insert a close time during which working men were passing to and fro for their dinner; but that intention had been defeated by the absence of information which might have been forthcoming if the Bill had been opposed in the ordinary way. It had been urged that the House would do well to allow the Bill to pass—although it had been condemned by the official Inspector of the Board of Trade, and notwithstanding the fact that it had been denounced by the inhabitants in public meetings assembled, and protested against by the majority of the Local Board of Health, and that the employers of labour were strongly opposed to it—because there was still room in what was technically called “another place” for these unfortunate omissions to be repaired. Hon. Members, however, would perhaps be surprised to hear that under the bye-laws of the Local Board of Health of South Stockton it would be practically impossible for the Local Board to obtain a locus standi before the House of Lords; because the rescinding of the Resolution approving of the Bill, although now agreed to by a majority of the Board, required, according to the bye-laws, that a majority of two-thirds must take part in rescinding of it, and that an equal number of members must be present at the rescinding as were present at the time it was passed. He need not point out to the House that, although the majority were willing to rescind the Resolution, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain the necessary quorum. This was a case, therefore, in which the House must be prepared to undertake its own duty, without casting on the shoulders of the House of Lords the responsibility of remedying any omission of its own. Although most unwilling to refer in any way to personal matters, he felt that he should not be discharging his duty to the House if he were to omit to point out that this Bill had been promoted by most unusual means. He was not going to refer to the painful incidents which took place on the last occasion that this Bill was before the House. The House dealt according to its judgment with what then transpired, and he had no desire to reopen that unfortunate issue; but he thought it right to draw the attention of the House to a certain Standing Order which he feared had been in spirit, at all events, somewhat infringed upon during the passage of the Bill. The Standing Order to which he referred was No. 436. First of all, by a Resolution of February, 1830, it was laid down that it was contrary to the law and usage of Parliament that any Member of the House should be permitted to engage, by himself or any partner, in the management of a Private Bill, before that or the other House of Parliament, for pecuniary reward. As he had said just now, it was the spirit of the Standing Order and not the letter which he wished to draw the attention of the House to. The other day it was mentioned that a Circular had been sent out referring to the fact that a near relative of an hon. Member of that House was employed as the solicitor to this Bill. The House treated that matter as being a parental excess of zeal, and as not being a wilful evasion of the Standing Order, and it accepted the apology of the hon. Member for the issue of that unfortunate Circular. But what were the real facts in connection with the Circular? He trusted the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) was in a position to say how far he (Mr. J. Lowther) was rightly informed; but he understood that the solicitor for this Bill was a partner engaged with the hon. Member, generally speaking, in professional business; that they occupied the same office, and that they employed a common staff of clerks. Well, the genealogical and domestic personal matters of interest which occupied the attention of the House a short time ago—namely, the fact that these two gentlemen who lived under the same domestic roof stood in the relation of father and son, was, in his mind, a secondary matter; but what, in his judgment, the House ought to consider was, whether it was in accordance with the spirit of the Standing Order that one member of a professional firm should, in his individual capacity, become a solicitor for a Private Bill; while another member of the same firm should also, in his individual capacity, constitute himself a Parliamentary guardian of the Bill of which his partner was solicitor? That was the real issue. The House, the other day, took a lenient view of the indiscretion of the hon. Gentleman; and he could assure the House that had the hon. Member profited by the somewhat sharp lesson which was read to him on that occasion—although the benevolent intervention of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) somewhat modified the censure of the House—if he thought the hon. Gentleman had taken that lesson to heart, and was prepared to abstain from the practice of which complaint had been made, he (Mr. J. Lowther) would not have referred again to the unpleasant incident. But what were the facts of the case? He was indebted to an hon. Gentleman opposite for having placed him in possession of a document which showed that, notwithstanding that expression of opinion on the part of the House, another Circular had been distributed by the hon. Gentleman himself, and that the hon. Gentleman was found, as late as yesterday afternoon, in the Lobby of the House performing functions which were usually assigned to sandwich-board men. The hon. Member was engaged, with profuse liberality, in distributing Circulars which, although they omitted to mention the matter of domestic and genealogical interest to which he had referred, at any rate urged the passage of this Bill. He might go further, and he spoke within the recollection and knowledge of many hon. Gentlemen when he said that during the proceedings of the House yesterday the hon. Gentleman actually came within the Bar and distributed to hon. Members on his own side of the House a Circular of the kind to which he (Mr. J. Lowther) had referred. He must seriously ask the House to consider where this sort of thing was to stop. If the hon. Member denied the accuracy of what he said, of course he would not proceed to dwell further upon it; but as it occurred for the most part within his own personal observation, and he had the authority of others in corroboration of what he said, he thought it his duty to point out to the House that if one partner in a practising firm was to be allowed to place his own individual name, in his individual capacity as distinguished from his partner, on the back of a Private Bill as solicitor, and another member of the same firm, in his individual capacity as a Member of that House, was to be allowed to stand in the Lobby and distribute Circulars, and invite the support of the hon. Members to whom the Circulars were given—and he thought hon. Members would corroborate him as to the accuracy of what he said—there was no knowing where such a system would end. He had thought it right to mention the matter, because the hon. Member for Stockton occupied in respect to Private Bills a somewhat unique position, which ought to place him in a different category from that occupied by other Members of that House. The hon. Member—and, no doubt, it was a most praiseworthy act on his part—had for some time afforded assistance to the hon. Baronet the Member for Walsall (Sir Charles Forster) in taking charge of Private Bills in a quasi-semi-official capacity; and it was for the House to consider seriously how far it was right that proceedings of this kind ought to be supposed, in any shape or form, to command the approval of the House. He had only now to move that the Bill be read a third time upon that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. J. Lowther.)

Mr. DODDS said, he had hoped that the circumstances which had occurred in that House a fortnight ago would have disposed of the personal question raised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite on the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, and that he (Mr. Dodds) would have been permitted on this occasion to address himself to the Question before the House, whether or not the Bill should be allowed to pass. But, after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, it was incumbent upon him to repeat, which he did without the slightest hesitation, reservation, or equivocation of any sort or kind, that he had not the slightest interest in this matter in any shape or form. He was neither a shareholder in the undertaking, nor was he interested in the land to be taken by the Bill or in the land to be benefited by the Bill, nor in any of the works to be constructed upon it; whilst, in regard to professional matters, long before he had a son old enough to join him in his Profession, when he became a Member of that House, under the advice of distinguished counsel—a Member of the House, of two members of his own Profession, both then and one still a Member of this House, and of Parliamentary agents—he made an arrangement with regard to his business which absolutely precluded him from receiving, in any shape or form, any share whatever of pecuniary reward in regard to any business connected with Parliamentary practice of any sort or kind. So strictly had he acted upon that arrangement, that during the 16 years he had been in Parliament he had not received one single farthing in connection with Parliamentary business. When, in course of time, his son became a partner with him in general matters, the necessary arrangements and deeds were entered into which expressly excluded him from all share in any business connected with Parliament; and during the whole of the time which had since elapsed, so strictly had he adhered to the rule which he had laid down before entering Parliament, and in regard to which he had some hesitation originally in accepting the invitation sent to him to become a candidate, that, as he had said, he had not received on any occasion during the 16 years he had been a Member of Parliament one single farthing, even for travelling expenses or personal expenses of any description. But during the whole of that time he had taken an active part in every local measure which affected his own immediate district; and whether his son happened to be the solicitor for or in opposition to a Bill had not, in the slightest degree, affected the course he had pursued. He had felt it his duty, since the constituency of Stockton conferred upon him the honour of reposing its confidence in him, to forward every measure that was likely to promote the interest of that district; and he appealed to the town of Stockton, and especially to South Stockton, to endorse the action he had taken in regard to this and other matters from time to time. As a matter of fact, he knew very well that South Stockton had endorsed what he had done and what he was now doing in this particular matter. The right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) had referred to the distribution of reasons in favour of this Bill; but he had not referred, nor did he refer on a former occasion, to the fact that he, or someone behind him who was pulling the wires, had also issued a Circular. He hesitated not to say that there had been what was technically called a "whip" quite as vigorous on the other side as the action which had been taken by those who were in favour of the Bill, except that the right hon. Gentlemen had not the good fortune he (Mr. Dodds) possessed of having a son who was capable of taking charge of a Bill in Parliament. If he had, possibly the right hon. Gentleman might even have gone as far as he

(Mr. Dodds) had done; because, in all other respects, the right hon. Gentleman had certainly gone the whole length with him. The right hon. Gentleman had referred, as the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) had done on a former occasion, most unnecessarily, and he thought most ungenerously, to his having taken a part, in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall (Sir Charles Forster), in conducting the Private Business of the House. Why had he done that? Before he came into the House he had had considerable Parliamentary experience and practice with regard to Private Bills. He knew a considerable number of Parliamentary agents; and he would undertake to say that there was not a single Parliamentary agent who was engaged in transacting the Private Business of the House who would not himself as soon place that Private Business in his (Mr. Dodds's) hands as in those of any other Member of the House. He had not intended to refer in any way whatever to the personal part of the question; but the right hon. Member having referred to it had given him this opportunity of making a disavowal, which he ventured to think most hon. Gentlemen would accept as being perfectly and strictly accurate in every particular. He was sure that those who knew him would do so, and the right hon. Gentleman himself ought to do so. He had, on more than one occasion, received a tribute of thanks recording the sense of the town and district for the services he had rendered, not only in connection with public affairs, but in connection with Private Bills. In regard to the Stockton Carrs Railway Bill, the right hon. Gentleman, in the Circular he had caused to be issued on that as on a former occasion, had quoted the expression of Colonel Yolland that the railway was not required except for speculative purposes. The right hon. Gentleman might have added another circumstance which was an undoubted fact—namely, that Colonel Yolland at the time he made the Report referred to had not seen the place at all. He had seen nothing beyond the deposited plans and certain statements which were put before him, which included a statement made on behalf of the Petitions against the Bill, and was of a most exaggerated, and, in most respects, of a most erroneous character. Colonel Yolland, in his Report, simply quoted the allegations put forward in the statement. In mentioning what had occurred before the Chairman of Ways and Means, the right hon. Gentleman might have mentioned what had since occurred before Colonel Yolland, which was far more in favour of the Bill than anything the right hon. Gentleman had shown in a contrary direction. It was said that this railway was a very short one, and that it was merely intended to utilize a few acres of land. The first part of that statement was true. It was a very short railway, indeed; but it was not quite as short as it seemed, because, as a matter of fact, it was an elongation of an existing branch railway connected with the main line of the Stockton and Darlington Railway, which now formed part of the North-Eastern system. As a matter of fact, it formed the missing link between the main line of railway and the Stockton Carrs district; and perhaps he might be allowed to explain of what the district consisted. It was not merely, as had been stated, a few acres of land that were in question; but if hon. Members would carefully study the plans that had been circulated and which had been deposited, they would see that the district to which this line was to give access included three very important works. The first was a bone mill for the preparation of bones for agricultural purposes and for the manufacture of artificial manures. The next was an oil and seed cake mill; and both of these works had been established some time ago by some of the leading agriculturists in the North of England for the purpose of supplying themselves with artificial manures and oil-cakes for their own consumption. From these mills there went out every year some 4,000 or 5,000 tons of artificial manures and oil-cakes. In the next place, there existed one of the largest flour mills in the North of England, and perhaps he might say one of the largest in the United Kingdom. In that flour mill there were manufactured every year from 150,000 to 200,000 sacks of flour; and there were employed in the conveyance of this manufactured article to the other side of the river some 20 rolleys, which travelled from 20,000 to 25,000 times across the river in the course of the year. The whole of this traffic was now taken through the streets of South Stockton at a cost of something like £1,300 a-year. If this railway were made available for the purposes of these works, a saving might be effected of nearly the whole of the amount of the present cost. The rates originally inserted in the Bill had been found somewhat excessive; and by an arrangement with the Board of Trade, the Chairman of Ways and Means had struck them out in favour of more reasonable rates, which had received the sanction of the Board of Trade or of the Railway Commissioners. The result would be that the charges would be virtually merged in the rates charged by the North-Eastern Railway Company. The North-Eastern Railway Company conveyed nearly the whole of the traffic to distant places, and the consequence would be a saving of nearly the whole of the rates now charged. The district in question had a frontage of something like three-fourths of a mile upon the River Tees, embracing some of the best water adapted for vessels of the largest class, the whole of which was at present practically useless. Then, in addition, there was land belonging to the promoters of the Bill, out of which six acres had been sold and appropriated for an iron ship-building yard, which would be commenced the moment it was ascertained that the Bill would go on. There were other proprietors of land in the neighbourhood who were prepared to utilize their property; so that instead of the benefits conferred by the Bill being confined to a small tract of land, they were practically extended to a very large district. He had no hesitation in saying that if the Bill passed, and the desired railway were constructed, it would afford employment in a very short time to 1,500 or 2,000 men; and, surely, that was a most desirable object for such a town as Stockton. Of course, it was not so desirable to the gentlemen in whose interest the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) opposed the Bill, who already possessed their own level crossings and desired to prevent other persons from having the same advantages. At the present moment the rateable value of South Stockton was about £40,000 a-year. He believed the land of which they had heard so much was rated at £50 a-year; but, upon the most moderate computation, if this Bill were passed it would contribute to the rates of Stockton hereafter upon a rateable value of something like £5,000. If that were really so—and he believed it was—the result would be the reduction of the rates to the extent of 12½ per cent, or one-eighth of the present amount. There would also be taken out of the streets of Stockton an enormous amount of traffic which now passed through it day by day, and there would be much less danger to life from these level crossings than there was at present from the existing traffic. Another reason in favour of the Bill was the enormous amount of work it would afford in the district, where work was very badly wanted just now. The right hon. Gentleman had taken especial care not to refer to the fact that he had been put in motion by the principals of the firm of Head, Wrightson, & Co., who were the chief opponents of the Bill, and who had induced three other firms to join with them who were in much the same position as themselves. The right hon. Gentleman had not informed the House that the opposition to the Bill was brought forward by the Chairman of the Constitutional Association at Stockton, who, if reports were correct, was to be his (Mr. Dodds's) antagonist at the next General Election for Stockton. That gentleman was a neighbour and friend of his, and had been a client for many years, and he thought he was a client even at the present time. He was of opinion, however, that that gentleman had never taken a more unwise step towards gaining a seat on the Benches opposite than he had done in getting up this opposition. ["Question!"] Surely this was the Question after what the right hon. Gentleman had stated; and he would repeat that this gentleman had never taken a less wise step for gaining a seat in that House than he had now done. ["Oh!"] Well, that was his opinion, at all events, and he was entitled to express it. That gentleman had a level crossing of his own over an adjoining street, called Hanover Street, which was just as much used as any level crossing ever established in Stockton. That level crossing, to his certain knowledge, was used long before Mr. Wrightson became connected with the works there, and all Mr. Wrightson's traffic passed over it, yet there had never been the smallest objection to it, although there had been, as the right hon. Gentleman had stated, a great objection generally to level crossings, the result of which was that on the main line they had been done away with. He asserted shortly, plainly, and distinctly, that the opposition to this Bill emanated from gentlemen who had a personal interest in the matter. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] He (Mr. Dodds) said "Yes;" and it was got up for no other purpose. If hon. Members would look at a map of the district they would see that the gentlemen who were opposing the Bill had their own level crossings to give them access to the main line of railway, and they would not be one whit the worse in regard to crossing the line in future than they were at the present time. In the case of two of the opponents of the Bill, their works were situate beyond level crossings, and the working men employed by them had to cross the line every day. But had there been a single loss of life? He was afraid that the district had not been altogether free from loss of life, and everyone deplored it; but that loss of life had never occurred on a siding of this kind, which was practically only a works siding, and not a level crossing at all. He had done all he could to get rid of level crossings in Stockton, and he had succeeded to a large extent, and he hoped to succeed still further. But he had never attempted to get rid of the level crossing of his friend Mr. Wrightson, because he knew that it was absolutely required for the enormous works in the district, and that without similar crossings it would be impossible to carry on the works connected with the land affected by the present Bill. He had already referred to the Report of the Board of Trade, and he had said that Colonel Yolland, before he made his Report, had never seen the place at all. Colonel Yolland made his Report without having visited the locality; but even taking Colonel Yolland's own Report, and dealing with the words which the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) had read, what were the facts of the case? Colonel Yolland said it might be a matter of speculation; but as long as the public were effectually protected that was not a matter of much consequence. The question was, what provisions were laid down for the protection of the public? The right hon. Gentleman, with that candour for which he was so eminently distinguished, had called attention to what the Chairman of Ways and Means had done for the protection of the public in order to give effect to the requirements of the Board of Trade; but the right hon. Gentleman had not dealt fairly with the House, because he had quoted a little bit, and a little bit only, and the right hon. Gentleman must have known that he was only quoting partially what the Chairman of Ways and Means had done in the matter. Now, what was it that his hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means had done? The hon. Gentleman had provided, in the first place, at the expense of the promoters, and in redemption of a pledge made by them to the Board of Trade and to the Local Board, that the rate of speed should not exceed three miles an hour. [Mr. J. LOWTHER: I said so.] If the right hon. Gentleman would restrain his impatience, he was about to say what it was that the right hon. Gentleman had said, and what he had not said. In addition to limiting the rate of speed in approaching the level crossing to three miles an hour at the most, in addition to such a moderate rate of speed, which one would almost think was impossible to cause an accident, every engine was to be preceded by a man carrying a red flag. The right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, made that statement; but he did not state that, under the general Act, provision was made for gates and gate-keepers. Then came the climax of the right hon. Gentleman's candour, fairness, and honesty towards the House. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted a clause which he (Mr. Dodds) held in his hand in order to show how impossible it was for the Chairman of Ways and Means to deal with the question from want of local knowledge. The right hon. Gentleman illustrated his point of view by showing that the Chairman of Ways and Means had inserted a clause in the Bill to provide that the level crossings should be closed between the hours of 11.30 A.M. and 1.30 P.M., because it was assumed that during those periods working men would be passing to and fro to dinner. Now, was it fair on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to omit to state the whole of the provision? He would not read the words of the clause, but he would give the substance, and the whole of the provision was that between half-past 5 and half-past 6 in the morning there should be no traffic whatever over the crossing; that between half-past 7 and 9 there should be no traffic; that between half-past 11 and half-past 1, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, there should be no traffic; and that between half-past 4 and 6, also, no traffic should be allowed to pass over it.

Mr. J. LOWTHER: I beg the hon. Member's pardon, I only referred to the dinner hour.

Mr. DODDS said, he was quite aware that the right hon. Gentleman had only quoted the provision which applied to the dinner hour; but the right hon. Gentleman knew very well that there was something more than that; and if he would restrain his impatience for a short time he (Mr. Dodds) would tell him what it was. There was also a provision that the crossing should be closed to traffic between such other hours as the Local Board might, from time to time, determine, not being more than two hours at any one time, nor seven hours in any one day. So that the clause itself, which the Chairman of Ways and Means had taken care to insert, made provision that the Local Board might alter the hours from time to time, so as to suit the dinner hours of the workmen. This showed that the Chairman of Ways and Means knew perfectly well what was necessary to be done, and that he had done it. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the history of this matter, and, as usual, he had only quoted so much of the history of it as suited his own purposes. He (Mr. Dodds) hoped the House would permit him, as shortly as he could, to tell him the remainder. The right hon. Gentleman had not told the House that among the persons who opposed the Bill when it was originally framed were three gentlemen—his friend Mr. Wrightson, Mr. Wrightson's manager, Mr. Anderson, and Mr. Watson, Chairman of the Board—all of whom were the members of opposing firms; so that one-half of the opposition had a direct interest in the matter. What happened next? There was a public meeting convened to denounce the Bill. It was called, at a very short notice, by Mr. Watson, one of the petitioning firms, and care was taken to pack it. Indeed, if ever there was a packed meeting this was one. As soon as the doors were opened the room was filled by the employés of the petitioning firms. Up got Mr. Wrightson, and proposed a Resolution, and undoubtedly the working men of that firm voted very unanimously in favour of it. What happened? The matter went back to the Local Board. He (Mr. Dodds) happened to be present at the time the Local Board sat; but the Resolution passed at the meeting was so absurd that the Board took no notice of it, but stuck to their own Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman said that since then there had been a new election. Well, what happened then? The opponents selected their own men; two of them were cordial disciples of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), and were acceptable men in every way. With those two gentlemen was put forward another of the leading employers in South Stockton. Thus, three of the best men who could be selected were put forward as candidates. Well, what happened? Two of the candidates were elected, but the third was totally defeated. He was told that an analysis of the votes showed that 3,000 more were given in favour of those candidates who supported the Bill than were given in favour of those who opposed it, notwithstanding that a system of open voting papers prevailed, which could easily be manipulated—as he was told they had been on this occasion—by persons going about among the working men. The right hon. Gentleman had brought a charge against him (Mr. Dodds) because his son was the solicitor for the Bill. Now, he (Mr. Dodds) had referred to Mr. Wrightson, and he thought he (Mr. Dodds) would have been justified in directing the same language against the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire as he had brought against him (Mr. Dodds), and with more propriety, the right hon. Gentleman being, he believed, a partner with Mr. Wrightson in the newspaper which he (Mr. Dodds) held in his hand—a great Constitutional organ. Mr. Wrightson was Chairman of the Constitutional Association; and he (Mr. Dodds) was surprised to read in a report contained in this newspaper, in reference to an occasion when the bye-laws had been used in order to permeate a little job, that the ratevited to pass the whole thing over. He wished the House to remember that this was a mere siding across a road over which there was no traffic at all, except to the works situated on this piece of land. He had presented, in a legitimate way, two Petitions in favour of the Bill, and one was from persons who were the owners of land in the Carrs district, and nearly all the owners and occupiers of the houses in the street across which the level crossing would pass had also petitioned in favour of the Bill, on the ground that it would be of the greatest advantage to the entire district. The right hon. Gentleman said that a Petition was about to be presented from a number of workmen employed in the existing works. If he (Mr. Dodds) were permitted to read a statement which had been sent to him from the men employed in those works, it would be found that most of them had been coerced into signing that Petition. He held one of those statements in his hand; but he would not go into it at that moment. ["Read!"] He promised the hon. Member for the North Riding (Mr. Guy Dawnay) that when he had presented his Petition in the proper manner, and it had become the property of the House, he would hear something more of it, possibly in connection with a Breach of Privilege. He (Mr. Dodds) had presented Petitions from owners and occupiers in South Stockton, and those Petitions had been presented in the ordinary way of Private Bill Petitions to the House. They were signed by 1,896 out of 2,300 ratepayers, so that, practically, four-fifths of the owners and occupiers of property in South Stockton had petitioned the House in favour of the Bill. He was quite certain that at this moment nine out of ten were in favour of it; and if the Bill went forward and went to "another place," which, thank God! they had, the promoters of the measure would be able to satisfy the House of Lords that they had the full support of the people of South Stockton. He would throw out this challenge to the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) and the hon. Member for the North Riding (Mr. Guy Dawnay)—that if they would take the sense of the people of South Stockton by ballot upon this Bill, they would find that at least three-fourths would declare "aye" in favour of it, and desire, as he-

now desired, that the House should pass the third reading of it.

MR. PEMBERTON trusted the House would believe that he had no political feeling in the matter, and would allow him to explain the reasons why the Bill had been treated by the Court of Referees as an unopposed Bill, and had decided against the claim of the Petitioners to be heard. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) had said that there were some Petitions against the Bill. He thought the right hon. Gentleman was incorrect in that assertion, because he (Mr. Pemberton) was sure, from his own recollection of the facts, that there was only one Petition presented. According to the practice of the House, it was important to consider whether a Petition was, in reality, a Petition from one individual, or from one individual representing a particular interest or class; because it was the rule of the House that no one individual was entitled to be heard against a Private Bill unless he had some special interest in the matter different from that which was common to all the inhabitants of the district affected by the Bill. If he had no interest other than that of the rest of the inhabitants, then his interest was covered by that of the rest of the inhabitants; and on occasions like the present his interests were supposed to be represented by the Local Board. The Local Board represented the whole of the rate-payers of the district, and one private individual having no interest distinct from theirs was not, according to the practice of the House, entitled to be heard. He observed that the Petition was signed by more than one person; but his recollection of the case was that one Petitioner only appeared. The Petitioner argued the case himself, and, it was upon that point—namely, the practice of the House itself, and upon the consideration that the Petitioner was represented by the Local Board, that the Court of Locus Standi disallowed the Petition; and the consequence was that the Bill was treated as an unopposed Bill, and went before the right hon. Baronet opposite, the Chairman of Ways and Means. In taking that course the Court of Locus Standi did nothing beyond following the usual practice of the House; but in taking it they were certainly influenced by the statement that the Local Board of the district were in favour of the Bill, and had petitioned in favour of it. They were not told, as they were now, that the decision of the Local Board was obtained by a majority of one, and that one, as they were now given to understand, one of the promoters of the Bill.

MR. DODDS said, that was not so. The gentleman in question did not vote in the first instance, although he did so afterwards.

MR. PEMBERTON said, he understood that the Resolution in favour of the Bill was carried by a majority of one, and that this gentleman, who was one of the promoters of the Bill, voted.

MR. DODDS said, the hon. Member was mistaken. As a matter of fact, the gentleman in question did not vote until afterwards.

MR. PEMBERTON said, he did not think that the time when the gentleman voted was of much importance. The Court of Locus Standi were, undoubtedly, led to believe that the Local Board representing the district were in favour of the Bill. He thought if they had been informed of the circumstances of the case, although he would not say that their decision would have been altered, they certainly would have considered the matter more minutely, and further inquiry would have been made. He would not say that the result would have been otherwise; but he certainly did think that the Court had not been fairly treated when they were told that the Local Board were in favour of the Bill. As to the immediate question before the House, he could not help feeling that it was really one which ought, in the ordinary way, to have been discussed by a Select Committee of the House. He had the greatest possible respect for the abilities of the hon. Baronet the Chairman of Ways and Means, and for the care and attention which he paid to these unopposed Bills; but he thought it must be obvious to hon. Members, without making themselves partizans of either one side or the other, that this was a case on which a great deal might be said on both sides, and that it was one in regard to which it was unfortunate that the House had been left without the guidance of a Select Committee in the ordinary way. No doubt, his hon. Friend had witnesses before him; but they were witnesses on one side only, and he had not the advantage of hearing counsel, or of having the witnesses cross-examined. It was, consequently, clear that the inquiry before his hon. Friend, however ably conducted, could not possibly have exhausted the question in the same way that it would have been exhausted, if it had been considered by an ordinary Select Committee of the House. Under those circumstances, and in the absence of a full and proper inquiry, he could not help thinking that it would be unsafe for the House to pass the Bill in its present state.

MR. GUY DAWNAY expressed a hope that hon. Members would dismiss from their minds the curious and unpleasant circumstances with which a former reference to the Bill was connected, and that the question would be decided on its own merits alone. Hon. Members naturally felt impatient at having so much of their time, and the time of the House, taken up by the consideration of a Private Bill; but they had just heard the reasons why the Bill had ever come to them for the third reading at all, which it was certain it would not have done if it had been opposed in the usual way before a Railway Bill Committee. He was quite certain that no Committee would have dreamed of sanctioning the perpetration of such an outrage, if he might say so, as the construction of a level crossing in one of the principal streets of a large and important town, and that, too, a street which was daily traversed by more than 3,000 foot-passengers and 300 horses and carts. And if these works were carried out, as the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) hoped they would be by this Bill, there would be an addition of some 6,000 more foot-passengers over this road every day. The hon. Member for Stockton said that the people of South Stockton fully endorsed his action in the matter, and the hon. Member had attempted to make light of the statements of the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) as to the real feeling of the inhabitants. He (Mr. Guy Dawnay) would say, in the first place, that on February 13 a fact occurred which he did not think the hon. Member had alluded to at all—namely, that the Local Board, by a majority of one, passed a vote to rescind the approval they had previously given. The hon. Member had made some allusion to the Petition which he (Mr. Guy Dawnay) had now the honour of presenting to the House. He was not quite aware whether that was the proper or formal way of doing so; and, therefore, he would present it in the usual way afterwards. The hon. Member for Stockton had made some remarks as to the manner in which the signatures to this Petition had been obtained. Let him tell the hon. Member that his opinion of Yorkshiremen was far better and far higher than to induce him to suppose that they would allow themselves to be coerced by their employers into signing anything. There might, however, be a few cases in which women in Yorkshire had been coerced; and he held in his hand a letter from Mr. David Thomas, in which the writer informed him that a person named Wells had called at his house with a Petition in favour of the Stockton Carrs Railway Bill, and had induced his wife to sign it without having obtained his (Mr. Thomas's) consent to it. Mr. Thomas subsequently saw Mr. Wells, and asked him if he had his (Thomas's) name to the Petition? The reply was, "Yes, I have." Mr. Thomas complained of the signature having been obtained in the way it had been. Mr. Thomas went on to say—

"He told me he would scratch it out if I wished. I said that I did; but whether he did scratch it out or not I do not know."

Now, he (Mr. Guy Dawnay) had visited Stockton in order that he might form an opinion himself as to the proposed works; and he thought that if any hon. Member had made a similar inspection he would have returned as keen an opponent of the Bill, and quite as ready to condemn it, as himself. The facts were these. It was proposed to construct a line on a piece of waste land adjoining the river Tees, which had been offered for sale at a low price on account of the difficulties of obtaining cheap access to it. It had been bought by some acute speculators, who saw the possibility of being able to rush this scheme through the Local Board and through Parliament, and who were ready to sacrifice the daily comfort of the artisans of Stockton, and to endanger the lives of the inhabitants, for the sole purpose of saving some little extra expense. A level crossing was altogether unnecessary, and any competent engineer in the world would have said at once that there were various other means of gaining access to the land in question besides that which had been adopted. Even in a less busy centre of manufacturing industry than South Stockton, and a street less crowded by artizans hurrying to and from their work than Trafalgar Street, the construction of a level crossing ought to be regarded as inadmissible. The hon. Member for Stockton had referred to a regulation inserted in the Bill to prevent the running of trains from 11.30 in the morning until 1.30 in the afternoon; but the hon. Member knew very well that in one of the large works in the neighbourhood the dinner hour was from 12 to 1, while in another it was from 1 to 2. Whatever order any future Board might make, they certainly could not undertake to stop the trains during all those times in the evening, in the case of overtime work, when workmen would be crossing the line. Allusions had been made to the level crossing which now existed at the works of Head, Wrightson, & Co.; but the hon. Member for Stockton knew well that few foot-passengers ever went over that crossing at all. It was made 41 years ago, when the country was comparatively open, and it was the only level crossing, as the hon. Gentleman well knew, which the Local Board of South Stockton had not thought it necessary to make considerable sacrifices in order to abolish. He believed that the North-Eastern Railway Company had spent a very considerable amount of money—£100,000 at least—in getting rid of level crossings on their railway system; and the hon. Member for Stockton would hardly deny that he had himself lately advised the Corporation of Stockton to expend £2,000 in order to do away with the level crossing at Oxbridge Lane. The son of the hon. Member had gone as a deputation to the North-Eastern Company in order to arrange for its abolition. The hon. Member also knew of another level crossing in Stockton, at a place called Mill Street Lane, where numerous accidents had occurred. Only at the end of January last a girl was run over and killed, and at the Hartburne Crossing there were two other fatal accidents in the month of December. He would only, therefore, say that if the House did sanction the third reading of the Bill the responsibility of all the fatal accidents which were certain to ensue would rest on those hon. Members who voted for it. He had not the slightest interest in the passing of the Bill or in its not passing; and the hon. Member for Stockton would acquit him of any feeling of personal antagonism towards himself. He would only say that the Bill was opposed just as strongly by members of the Radical Party in South Stockton, who were political opponents of his own, as it was by Conservatives. As a matter of fact, he was shown over the ground the other day by a keen political opponent. He opposed the Bill only upon one ground, and it was upon that ground that he asked the House to oppose it also. The reason was that to give the sanction of the House to it would be to perpetrate a great wrong upon the population of an important and increasing manufacturing town, that it would seriously impede the trade and traffic of the district, while it would also endanger human life, and would license one of the most unnecessary, one of the most selfish, and one of the most iniquitous schemes that, in the way of Private Bill Legislation, had ever been presented to the House.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY said, he thought that it was much to be regretted that an ordinary Motion for the third reading of a Private Bill should have been accompanied by a discussion of so excited a character as to be calculated to obscure the real merits of the question before the House. Into none of the incidents which had been mentioned did he mean to enter. They were perfectly new to him, and he had never heard of any of these circumstances until he had heard them mentioned in that House. But the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) and of his hon. Friend the Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) enabled the House to understand without difficulty how the matter stood. It appeared that a heated controversy was going on in this district. The right hon. Gentleman represented one party there; whereas the hon. Member for Stockton sympathized with the other. There was, consequently, an unmistakable difference between them. The right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire represented certain gentlemen who were already in possession of considerable advantages in the way of railway communication, and it was not altogether surprising that they should be somewhat averse to other gentlemen residing there, who had the sympathies of the hon. Member for Stockton, procuring the same facilities. He (Sir Arthur Otway) proposed to confine himself simply to one point in the matter in which he felt himself most concerned; and he did not intend to allow himself to be at all angry even in regard to the somewhat unusual language which had been used by the hon. Gentleman who had just resumed his seat. The hon. Gentleman had accused him of perpetrating a job which was a gross outrage.

MR. GUY DAWNAY: No, no.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY said, it must be so, seeing that he was responsible for the Bill.

MR. GUY DAWNAY wished to explain what it was that he had said. What he said was that the construction of a level crossing in one of the principal streets of a large town was an outrage.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY said, the Bill had also been stigmatized as one of the greatest impositions which had ever been attempted to be palmed off upon the House; but probably the right hon. Gentleman who made that statement did not mean to impute that he (Sir Arthur Otway) was the perpetrator of that imposition. Now, what was the case as regarded this crossing? The House would scarcely suppose, after all the heated expressions they had heard, that it had only come before him in the very innocent garb of an unopposed Bill. When he found that to be the case, he was bound to entertain the opinion that there were no persons who were at all opposed to it. He was there simply to adjust certain matters of detail upon a question which he naturally believed to be in accordance with the views of the people of the locality. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire had made some comments upon the conduct of business before the Chairman of Ways and Means, which he (Sir Arthur Otway) would like to refer to on another occasion; but he would not do so now, as the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman were of a general character. No doubt, a great responsibility was thrown upon any Member of the House who filled the position which he filled; and in consequence of that responsibility he felt himself obliged to go very thoroughly into every measure submitted to him, and to dispose of it in the best way he possibly could. When this scheme was first brought before him as an unopposed Bill, he made an inquiry into it, and said there were two things he would not consent to—one was the making of this level crossing, unless it could be rendered perfectly safe; and the other was that the promoters of the Bill must show that there would be great public advantage to the people of the neighbourhood in making it. He accordingly adjourned the Committee and the consideration of the Bill for, he thought, a week or 10 days; and, in the meantime, he instituted an inquiry into the plans. Probably hon. Members had not had as much experience of level crossings as he had. There was no matter in which he had concerned himself more than in that of providing for the safety of the travelling public, and especially the safety of persons who had to pass level crossings. People were constantly killed on these level crossings. The House must not, however, suppose that fatal accidents often occurred on level crossings such as these; but they occurred on the level crossings upon the main lines of railway which hon. Members travelled over when they went to visit their constituents; and they were generally caused by trains running at a very high rate of speed, and were inflicted upon persons who had neglected to use ordinary precautions. In regard to level crossings of this character, he had no hesitation in saying that a well guarded level crossing was the safest way by which a person could pass over such a railway as this. He would undertake to say, after the precautions established by this Bill in regard to this small line of railway, that it would be almost impossible for any accident to occur, and people might pass and repass this level crossing with perfect safety. As he had said, he adjourned the Committee for a week or 10 days, and in the interval he was furnished with further plans and evidence which satisfied him upon these points. When the Committee reassembled, evidence was given to him of the desire of the persons living in the neighbourhood that this railway should be constructed, and of its public utility, very much in the form which had been described by his hon. Friend the Member for Stockton. With regard to the level crossings, he was not so satisfied, and he required some further evidence to be given. The right hon. Gentleman

the Member for North Lincolnshire had devoted a portion of his time in disparaging the evidence of Mr. Robert Fowler.

MR. J. LOWTHER begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon. All he had said was that engineering evidence was given only on behalf of the promoters, and that the only engineer examined was not a railway engineer at all.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY said, he did not know what the experience of Mr. Fowler was; but that gentleman appeared to him to understand fully the questions upon which he spoke, and, at any rate, there was no other evidence produced.

[MR. J. LOWTHER: Hear, hear!] It was established to his (Sir Arthur Otway's) satisfaction that the railway could not be made except by means of a level crossing, and that there was no possibility of making a bridge. That being so, he determined that the level crossing should be made, but only under conditions which would make it absolutely safe. Now, what were those conditions? He wanted to know how it was possible for an accident to occur upon a railway when an engine was only allowed to pass at a speed of less than that at which a man walked; when it was to be preceded by a man carrying a red flag; and when it was only to work at times when there were very few people about? And that was not all. A bridge would have to be constructed, by which foot-passengers would be able to cross the line. Therefore, the only question was that of the vehicular traffic, and that was provided for by the speed at which the engine was alone allowed to proceed, and by the locking of the gates by the watchmen who would have to look after them. Under these circumstances, it appeared to him that, as far as any arrangements could be made, perfect safety had been secured. He knew of no other mode by which a level crossing could be made safe; and he did not think that any danger could arise to any man passing a level crossing under these circumstances. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire if he was acquainted with the town of Middlesborough? In Middlesborough there were more than a dozen of these level crossings upon eight or nine intercepted lines of railway, crossed by thousands of people every day, and he was informed that there had never been a single accident, notwithstanding the fact that the crossings to which he referred were unprotected, or, at any rate, not protected as these would be. There was only one other matter to which he thought it was necessary he should refer. He had endeavoured to obtain information as to the hours during which the workmen were generally about, in order that restrictions might be imposed upon the passing of trains during those hours. He certainly thought sufficient precautions were taken, because power was given to the Local Board at any time to vary the hours specified in the Bill.

MR. GUY DAWNAY: Subject to the condition of the crossing only being closed for two hours at a time.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY said, that if the persons who objected to the Bill thought the workmen would not be sufficiently protected by the hours now fixed, they could have those hours extended. Under these circumstances, he must say he thought it would be most unwise if the House were to defeat a measure which was calculated to confer great public benefit upon the district for which it was designed. After the explanations which had been given, he trusted the House would not reject the Bill on the third reading. If there were strong objections to the measure, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire could show that those objections were as generally entertained as he asserted they were, the Bill had to go to "another place," and the right hon. Gentleman would have no difficulty in bringing his views before the Committee of the House of Lords. For his own part, he (Sir Arthur Otway) had no hesitation in saying, separating himself altogether from questions with which he had no concern of any kind, that as far as the protection of the public against danger from level crossings was concerned, it was in this case as complete as any protection could possibly be. If that were so, the objection raised against the Bill was not, he thought, a sufficient one to induce the House to reject the Bill now on the third reading.

MR. GILES said, he merely rose for the purpose of saying a few words in behalf of a gentleman who had been rather hardly dealt with by the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther). He referred to Mr. Fowler, the engineer. It was quite true that Mr. Fowler, who was connected with this Bill, was not Mr. John Fowler, the eminent railway engineer; nevertheless, the Mr. John Fowler referred to was a man of the highest ability, who had been the means of conferring great advantages upon the district in connection with the River Tees. Mr. Fowler, by the works he had carried out, had increased the depth of water up to Middlesbrough from 3 feet to 18 feet. He (Mr. Giles) would, therefore, say, without knowing anything in regard to this railway, that if a man was eminent enough to be able to do that which Mr. Fowler had done in regard to the River Tees up to Middlesbrough, he would be quite willing to take his opinion on the merits of this little railway scheme. Being an engineer himself, he (Mr. Giles) would like to add that there were many cases in which, if they prohibited level crossings, they would find it necessary to prohibit railways altogether, and they would be unable to carry on the traffic of the country. There were main lines of railway upon which trains ran over level crossings at an express speed of 60 miles an hour. Of course, it was not desirable to have level crossings if they could possibly be avoided; but on a line of light traffic like this, he doubted whether the works could be carried out without the level crossings. He thought he need scarcely add that he was not in any way interested in the promotion of this Bill.

MR. A. PEASE said, he had inspected the place, and he was in favour of the scheme now under the consideration of the House. He had been almost inclined to believe that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Guy Dawnay) could hardly have visited it himself when he said that it crossed the main street of the town. Those who knew anything of Stockton knew that the main street of South Stockton was a street which led from the bridge to the Cleveland district.

MR. GUY DAWNAY remarked, that what he had said was "a main street."

MR. A. PEASE thought the hon. Gentleman was mistaken, because the street in which it was proposed to construct these level crossings had no through traffic upon it at all. It was only a street which led down to the river, and it was passed over by working men and carts going in and out of the works. In regard to the Bill, he believed the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) had spoken in the interests of his constituents. If there had been a railway communicating with Stockton Carrs, there would long ago have been thousands of men employed in the locality; and it was only because there was no railway communication that manufacturing works had not been developed there. He had no doubt that the construction of this railway would be of the greatest public advantage; and he had reason to believe that as soon as this Bill was passed there would be another extensive shipyard built. He had very little doubt that the construction of this railway communication would result in a very few years in a large increase in the rateable value of South Stockton, and that it would also be of great convenience and importance to Stockton itself. With regard to the level crossing at Head, Wrightson, & Co.'s Works, which had been alluded to, it was a crossing which was entirely unprotected, and the whole of the working men had to pass it in going to their homes. He could not, therefore, imagine how it was that the gentlemen representing these works were opponents of this scheme, seeing that they had sidings of their own which placed the public in much greater danger than anything this scheme would do. The ground of their opposition to the Bill certainly appeared to be somewhat remarkable. He hoped the House would consent to read the Bill a third time.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, he had been particularly struck by what had fallen from the hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Pemberton), who was a Member of the Locus Standi Committee. It certainly appeared to him (Sir Baldwin Leighton), after what they had heard, that it was not desirable for the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) to continue to give what, no doubt, had been valuable services in aid of the hon. Baronet the Member for Walsall (Sir Charles Forster). He regretted that the hon. Baronet was not present; but considering the position which the hon. Member for Stockton held with regard to railways, and also the active part he took with regard to Private Bill Legislation, it was quite possible that a Bill might be brought forward in which his action in aid of the hon. Baronet the Member for Walsall might be regarded with some suspicion. He did not suggest for a moment that anything improper had happened; but he thought it was desirable that the action of every Member who assisted in Private Bill Legislation should be entirely free from suspicion. The success of the Private Bill Legislation of the House must depend very materially upon the manner and character of those Members who, like the hon. Baronet the Member for Walsall and the right hon. Baronet the Chairman of Ways and Means, undertook the conduct of it. Therefore, he would venture to say—and he had no doubt it was what many hon. Members felt who did not say it—that it was not desirable that such a state of things as that which now prevailed should continue. He hoped the hon. Member for Stockton would see that, under all the circumstances, it was not desirable that his services in aid of the hon. Baronet the Member for Walsall should be continued.

Mr. BIGGAR wished to make one remark upon the statement of the Chairman of Ways and Means—namely, that the representations made to the hon. Baronet in regard to this Bill were entirely of an ex parte character, and the value of ex parte evidence in a contested question appeared to him to be exceedingly slight. He had no doubt that the promoters of the Bill had supplied to the hon. Baronet a list of all the Petitions presented in favour of it, and had also given full information in regard to the gentlemen who voted for it in the Local Board of Health, and that they naturally made out the best case they could; but, at the same time, they would naturally avoid saying anything which would at all appear favourable as to the views entertained by the other side. He entirely failed to see the value of the services which were rendered by the Chairman of Ways and Means under such circumstances. He had heard the defence of the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds); but the hon. Member had entirely avoided all reference to what seemed to him (Mr. Biggar) to be the most important part of the case—namely, the distribution of Circulars on the part of the hon. Gentleman in support of the Bill, not only in the Lobby of the House, where it was customary for the clerks of Parliamentary agents and messengers to distribute Circulars, but actually—for the statement of the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) had not been contradicted—within the Bar of the House. If such a course were to be countenanced, and hon. Members were to continue the distribution of bills in favour of particular schemes, he thought there ought to be a Resolution on the part of the House allowing professional men to take a professional part in opposing Private Bills. At present, the House enforced a Rule to prevent that; but it was preposterous to carry such a Regulation, and then to allow Members to come down to the House and distribute Circulars with regard to schemes which were disputed as to their merits. He thought the practice was a very objectionable one; and he trusted the House would set its face against it. In the next place, he hoped the House would only consent to sanction the construction of level crossings under very peculiar circumstances—such, for instance, as their construction across a road where there was a very trifling amount of traffic, and where there was no risk of endangering the public safety. In this case the hon. Member for Stockton had himself pointed out that there was a large population in the neighbourhood of the proposed line, and that the employment of workmen was likely to increase very considerably after the line was made. If this Bill were passed in its present shape there would be no means of remedying the grievance, no matter how largely the population might be augmented in the future. In the eyes of some hon. Members it did not appear to be a matter of much consequence whether lives were sacrificed upon a level crossing or not. He entertained a strong view that it was highly inconvenient to conduct traffic across a high road; and he held that no railway, except under very peculiar circumstances, should be allowed to make a level crossing in any town in England.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE begged to remind the House that it was in the power of the Board of Trade to direct that a level crossing should be put a stop to.

Mr. MAC IVER expressed a hope that some Member of Her Majesty's Government would be good enough to inform the House who the Board of Trade were.

MR. LEAMY said, that it had been stated, in the course of the debate, that within a very recent period several fatal accidents had occurred in Stockton upon the level crossings now in existence. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade what his opinion was as to these crossings, and what convenience they afforded to the public?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he must protest against the interference of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works. The interference of the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be somewhat wanton, because, if he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) were not mistaken, the right hon. Gentleman was not one of those who had been present during the whole of this very interesting and somewhat protracted debate. Nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman had intervened with a single sentence, evidently for the purpose of having the last word with the jury. The right hon. Gentleman was mistaken, however, and was not going to be allowed to have the last word. The observation which the right hon. Gentleman had so skilfully interpolated was an observation which dealt with the kernel of the question—namely, whether or not level crossings were a danger to human life. The case with regard to this particular railway was already practically settled, because there had been three lives lost already in the town of Stockton upon level crossings since the month of December last. It was now proposed to add two other level crossings. The right hon. Gentleman said the Board of Trade had the power of stepping in at any time to put a stop to the use of a level crossing; but the right hon. Gentleman knew very well that a level crossing could not be changed without incurring considerable expense. One of the things which the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) had put forward in that eulogy with which he had indulged with regard to himself and his own public services as one of his many claims to canonization was that he had himself spent £2,000 in getting a level crossing abolished in this very town of Stockton. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was informed by an hon. Gentleman who was acquainted with the circumstances that no less a sum than £10,000 had been spent by the rate-payers of Blackburn recently in order to get rid of a level crossing, which certainly ought never to have been sanctioned, in the midst of a large population. He had nothing to say against the character of the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means; but he thought no more damaging statement could have been made against the case for this Bill than the statement of the hon. Gentleman. To paraphrase an old Latin phrase, they had an accused person confessing his own guilt—of course, he used the term in a purely Pickwickian sense. The hon. Gentleman said the measure came before him as an unopposed Bill. That was the grievance which was now protested against; and it appeared that the hon. Gentleman himself was not satisfied with the statements made by the promoters in regard to it, because he made an order for other evidence to be brought forward, and adjourned the Committee until it could be produced. But by whom was the new evidence brought forward. It was not by the opponents, because the Bill was unopposed; and, therefore, the evidence which succeeded in bringing conviction to the wavering mind of the hon. Gentleman was the evidence of the promoters of the Bill. He wanted to know whether or not it was a fact, as stated by the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay), that no less than 12,000 working people passed the place every day where this level crossing was to be constructed; and, if that were so, was the House prepared lightly, and upon most insufficient evidence, to expose to great danger the lives of no less than 12,000 of the constituency of Stockton? The hon. Gentleman the Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) had an easy way of meeting all objections. It was said that there had been a public meeting against the Bill. "Oh," said the hon. Gentleman, "that public meeting was packed," then it was said that there was a Petition from the working men against the Bill; but in that case the hon. Member said that the signatures were forged, or had been obtained under dureesse, because certain persons, unlike the hon. Member for Stockton, had a personal interest in the matter. In fact, the whole case of the hon. Member for Stockton was that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) ought to hide his face in such blushes as he had at his command, because the right hon. Gentleman did not come into court on this occasion with the dove-like innocence of the hon. Member for Stockton. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not at all agree with those who said that personal questions ought not to be introduced into the discussion of this measure. He thought that the personal matters were the very essence of the question now before the House; and he told hon. Members on the other side of the House that public opinion outside would look to the personal side of the matter as the question upon which hon. Members ought to vote. And the personal part of the question was this. No one seriously asserted that the hon. Member for Stockton had a personal interest, or a corrupt motive, in the matter. That was not the charge against him; but the personal charge was that he was seeking for the personal support of the House to this Bill, not upon public grounds, but upon personal and corrupt grounds—not on grounds of public utility, but because his own son happened to be the solicitor to the Bill. That was the real question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire said that the son of the hon. Member for Stockton was his partner; but the hon. Member had denied that. ["No!"] The hon. Member denied that he had any personal or pecuniary interest in the firm in regard to this section of its business. He did not think, however, that he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) need dwell upon that point; because if the hon. Gentleman had requested support for this Bill as a stranger, he would, if the facts he had himself adduced were correct, in making the demand have acted upon corrupt and illegitimate grounds. That was the question the House had to consider; and he said that if this Bill were a good one, he thought that what had taken place, and considering the auspices under which it was brought forward, together with the circumstances which surrounded it, the House was bound, by due regard for its own dignity, to throw it out. The Bill was a bad Bill; and he thought the public would to-morrow narrowly scan the Division List, in order to see whether the House had more regard for the personal susceptibilities of a political Colleague than for the honour, dignity, and respect of that great Assembly.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 126; Noes 117: Majority 9.—(Div. List, No. 70.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE OXFORD COUNTY COURT—THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT.

MR. ONSLOW: I beg to give Notice that on Monday I will ask Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been called to a paragraph which appears to-day in all the newspapers, to the effect that the Home Secretary has, in default of an appearance in a County Court, been ordered to pay, within 14 days, the sum of £4 15s. for button-holes, nosegays, and cut-flowers for ladies, ordered by him at the election at Oxford in 1880; whether the purchase of these delicacies as presents to ladies interested in the election was not at the time an illegal practice; and if these bouquets were not sent to the relatives of voters, whether he would cause inquiry to be made as to what necessity there was for the Home Secretary to display such a profusion of floral decorations during the progress of the election?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I should like to answer the Question myself now. I am very glad the hon. Member has made the inquiry, because it is one which since this morning I have made myself. The first time I ever heard of this action or proceeding was when I saw it in the newspapers. Whether there is any foundation for the statement that any such proceedings in the County Court have taken place, or any such judgment has been given, I really do not know. I have sent to ask whether it is a fact, because to me it is a new practice that a man can be sued in the County Court, and have judgment given against him, without having ever been informed of any such proceedings being taken.

QUESTIONS.

SWITZERLAND—RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have made any representations, through the British Legation at Berne, to the Swiss Federal authorities, with reference to the religious persecution of British subjects and others, which for some time past have taken place in certain Cantonal States of the Swiss Republic?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Representations upon this subject have been made to the Federal Government through Her Majesty's Legation at Berne. Papers will be laid on the Table.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS—HYDE PARK CORNER—THE WELLINGTON STATUE.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the First Commissioner of Works, Who are the members of the General Committee, and by whom appointed, referred to in the Report which has been presented to Parliament, of the executive Committee on the decoration of the new place at Hyde Park Corner; and, to what extent the Chief Commissioner has delegated his authority to the said General Committee? The right hon. Baronet said, he saw by the Report which had been laid upon the Table that the Executive Committee appointed by the General Committee were in a position to make their Report to the General Committee; that they had carefully weighed all the suggestions made by the General Committee; and that the Executive Committee were prepared to give their decision to the General Committee, and strongly recommended that the latter should give their adhesion to the conclusions to which the Executive Committee had been guided.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman state if there is any precedent for presenting as a Parliamentary Paper the Report of a private Body not being a Department of the State?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The General Committee consisted of a considerable number of distinguished persons, whom the Prince of Wales invited to confer with him on the subject. I think they numbered about 85 in all. I shall be quite prepared to supply the right hon. Baronet with the names, but I do not think it is necessary to give them to the public generally. I have delegated none of my powers either to the General Committee or to the Executive Committee, and I am responsible alone for anything that may be done hereafter in the matter. In reply to the Question of the noble Lord, I am not aware that there is any precedent one way or the other; but I was asked by some hon. Member to issue this document, and I agreed to do it.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Was it printed by Order of the House?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes, it was.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Who moved for it?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I did. No; it was moved by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands).

MR. GORST asked whether the Notice for the production of the Report was given by the hon. Member for Burnley in the usual way, and whether it appeared on the Papers of the House?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked whether the matter came before the Printing Committee over which the Speaker presided?

MR. SPEAKER said, that a Motion for the production of the Report must have been made; but he could not recall the actual date when it was made.

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed that the Return was made according to an Order of the House of Commons, dated April 8.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL subsequently asked whether a Minister could obtain from the House, without Notice, an Order for the printing of a document which was neither Departmental nor Ministerial, nor a command paper, but simply a private document? If a Minister could do so, he might have his speech to his constituents printed, or his election address, or any other frivolity of that kind.

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is, undoubtedly, referring to a Paper presented by the Chief Commissioner of Works, a Paper relating to his Department, which was presented by him in his quality of Minister without Notice.

The right hon. Gentleman, in the course which he took, was only following a precedent which is constantly acted upon.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Question arose out of an answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). I quoted in my answer a Paper, and the hon. Member asked me to lay it before the House. I believe that a Minister who has quoted a document in the House is bound to lay it before the House.

STATE OF IRELAND—MEETINGS OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE—INTRUSION OF THE POLICE AT QUEENSTOWN.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the case that detective policemen attended the last meeting of the Queenstown Branch of the Irish National League, and refused to withdraw when requested to do so; if so, upon whose instructions were they acting, and with what object; if they were acting on their own initiative, whether they will be informed that they exceeded their duty; and, whether, in view of the frequent altercations that have occurred between the police and people, owing to the confusion in the minds of the police as to their duty in this respect, an explicit general instruction will be issued for the guidance of the police, in relation to their attendance at private meetings of the Branches of the National League?

MR. TREVELYAN: The meeting referred to in this Question was held in the Town Hall at Queenstown, and summoned by printed placards extensively posted throughout the town. A sergeant and a constable attended by direction of the District Inspector. There was no objection made to their entering the Hall, which appeared open to all. Two persons, however, objected to their remaining at the meeting, and proposed and seconded a resolution to that effect. But the Chairman declined to put the resolution to the meeting. He said he saw no reason why the police should not remain, as the meeting was not a secret one; and he invited them to take seats, which they accordingly did. On the general question, the police have instructions. I do not think it necessary to issue fresh instructions; but I am engaged in ascertaining whether the present instructions are thoroughly understood by all concerned, as they are intended to be understood by the Government.

MR. O'BRIEN: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman, will he not consider the advisability of issuing warrants, as in the cases of searches for arms and documents, empowering the police to attend in certain special cases, so that persons could not be prosecuted for ejecting the police? There would then be no further difficulty.

MR. TREVELYAN: I think the cases should be special cases. I will inquire into the matter.

RIVERS CONSERVANCY AND FLOODS PREVENTION—LEGISLATION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether, in view to the pledges of the Government, he has in contemplation to introduce, this Session, a Bill to make provision for the better prevention of Floods and for the Conservancy of Rivers?

MR. DODSON: I do not quite know what are the pledges referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. I only know that on February 11 I gave a by no means encouraging answer when asked whether there would be legislation on this very difficult and complicated question in the present Session. Since then, looking at the progress of Business, the prospect of being able to deal with the matter this year has not improved, and I am afraid that I should only be misleading the right hon. Gentleman and those who are interested in this subject if I were to raise any expectations of legislation in the present Session.

POST OFFICE—TELEPHONIC COMMUNICATION.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (for Mr. GRAY) asked the Postmaster General, If he can say before what day the Estimates for the Postal Telegraph Service will not be brought forward; and, whether he will have them submitted at such an hour as to afford opportunity for discussing the policy of his Department towards the development of Telephone communication?

MR. COURTNEY: I think I may say, in answer to the Question put by the hon. Member on behalf of the hon.

Member for Carlow, that the Vote for the Postal Telegraph Service cannot be taken for a considerable time yet, and it would be quite premature to say at what hour. We shall, however, endeavour to suit the convenience of hon. Members when the Votes come on; but we shall go through the ordinary Civil Service Votes first.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION (SUB-COMMISSIONERS), LONGFORD—CASES IN GRANARD.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the complaints made in the district of Granard, county Longford, of inconvenience caused by the fact that claims for reduction of rent made in Granard are heard by the Sub-Commissioners in the town of Longford, many miles distant; and, whether he will recommend that Granard cases should be tried in Granard?

MR. TREVELYAN: The instructions of the Land Commissioners to the Assistant Commissioners are to hear cases from each Poor Law Union at the place most convenient to the suitors. The Land Commissioners are unable to say why the Longford Sub-Commission has appointed the hearing of Granard cases at Longford; but they have communicated with them by the telegraph for the purpose of ascertaining, but up to the present date they have received no reply.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—THE CHURCH IN WALES—DISESTABLISHMENT.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the interest felt in the question by the people of Wales, he will give facilities to the Honourable Member for Swansea to bring forward his Motion on the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales during the present Session?

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) may be favoured by fortune to secure a day which will ensure a proper discussion of the question which he has raised. With respect, however, to our giving facilities, I do not think we could consistently, in the present state of Public Business, give any for a Motion which we are not prepared to support. We are not quite ready to take charge of a measure for the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales, and thus add to the burdens with which we are laden at the present moment.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— "THE TIMES" CORRESPONDENT AT KHARTOUM.

MR. HENEAGE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he could state the dates of the telegrams relating to Mr. Power leaving Khartoum which he referred to yesterday?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The telegrams to Mr. Power authorizing him to leave Khartoum and his reply are, as I stated yesterday, to be found in "Egypt," No. 5, 1884. They are dated January 2 and 4. The telegram from Lord Granville to Sir Evelyn Baring, authorizing him to thank Mr. Power for his courage and public spirit—those are the words of the telegram—is also in "Egypt," No. 5, under the date of January 24. I alluded to this subject, as I stated yesterday, in the debate on the Vote of Censure; but I made a fuller statement on March 15.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— RELIEF OF KHARTOUM.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT: I wish to ask the Prime Minister, Whether it is convenient for him to state whether it is a fact that the Egyptian Government have abandoned the expedition on which they had decided for the relief of Khartoum owing to directions from Her Majesty's Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I have not been informed of the fact.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman now, or if not convenient I will give Notice for Monday, whether the responsibility which the Government acknowledge with respect to the safety of General Gordon extends to the garrison who have so faithfully adhered to him?

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps the hon. Member will give Notice of the Question.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House any information with respect to the present state of affairs in Berber and Khartoum?

MR. GLADSTONE: There is no new intelligence in the possession of the Government.

THE IRISH VETERINARY DEPARTMENT.

MR. O'BRIEN (for Mr. HEALY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he could state how many veterinary surgeons are at present on the staff and enrolled at Dublin Castle; how many are of the Protestant and how many of the Catholic religion; and, what qualifications are necessary for an appointment?

MR. TREVELYAN: There are 28 veterinary surgeons employed under the Irish Privy Council Veterinary Department. The qualification held to be necessary for the appointment is that of a legally qualified veterinary surgeon. I have already informed the hon. Member in whose name the Question stands that the question of religious profession is in no way considered in reference to these appointments, and that the Government has no information whatever on the subject.

ARMY—AMBULANCE DRILL.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will consider whether the officers and men in each regiment of the Army might be systematically instructed in ambulance drill, and how to treat sick and wounded in the absence of medical assistance; and, if he is aware that ambulance classes are attached to many of our volunteer corps, police force, and also many manufacturing establishments?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: In consequence of the continued indisposition of the Secretary of State for War, perhaps I may be allowed to reply for him that a General Order is about to be issued, which will, to a great extent, carry out the suggestions contained in the hon. Member's Question.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Is the Prime Minister in a position to say when the Navy Estimates will be taken? An engagement was made as regards the Navy and the Army Estimates that a night should be given for discussion in each case before Whitsuntide.

MR. GLADSTONE: We hope to be able to redeem the pledge then given.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Can the right hon. Gentleman state the course of Business for Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that on Monday the Motion that the House resolve itself into Committee on the Franchise Bill would be made, and on Tuesday the Cattle Diseases Bill would be proceeded with.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us anything as to the Business on Thursday?

MR. GLADSTONE was understood to say that this was not settled.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) BILL.

MR. DODSON: The Government have, in accordance with the undertaking which I gave after the Division in Committee on the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill on Tuesday last, carefully considered the course which they will take in regard to the Bill; and they have used their best endeavours to find some means to enable them to proceed with the Bill. As the result of our consideration, I shall propose another Amendment to Clause 1, which I will put on the Notice Paper to-day, and which will appear to-morrow. It will follow upon the decision at which the House arrived the other day, and which, of course, we cannot attempt to reverse. I will read to the House the words of the Amendment which I propose to move—

"In Clause 1, line 14, after the words 'foreign country,' to leave out the word 'therein' in line 17 inclusive, and to insert 'or any specified part thereof that, having regard to the sanitary condition of the animals therein or imported therefrom, to the laws made by such country for the regulation of the importation and exportation of animals, and for the prevention of the introduction and spread of disease, and to the administration of such laws, the circumstances are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease.'"

I may add, that if the House consents, we propose to proceed with the Committee on the Bill at 2 o'clock on Tuesday.

MR. TOMLINSON asked whether the House was to understand that as a matter of course they were to sit at 2 o'clock on Tuesday?

MR. DODSON: The House itself must appoint the Sitting.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir William Harcourt, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

[BILL. 3.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he did not think it was necessary he should make any detailed statement. When the Bill relating to Corrupt Practices at Parliamentary Elections was before the House last Session he received remonstrances from both sides of the House, complaining that no provision was made in that Bill for dealing with corrupt practices at municipal elections. It was pointed out to him that evils prevailed at those elections, and he recognized the justice of those remonstrances. He found, however, even with the generous support of the House, that to pass the Bill dealing with Parliamentary Elections was a most difficult task, and, therefore, he felt it more advisable to postpone the measure dealing with municipal elections until this Session, so that he might learn from the experience of the Parliamentary Bill how far the feeling of the House would be willing to go with him in support of a Bill like the one now before the House. He now submitted the Bill confident that it would receive the same support given to the Parliamentary Bill. It would be remembered that the Bill of last year dealt with corrupt practices by punitive clauses, and substantially those clauses would be found in the present Bill. He saw no reason why there should be a difference in such a matter where the offence was really the same. Then the Bill of last year prohibited certain classes of expenditure, and provisions of a similar character would be found in this Bill. The Bill of last year also contained a maximum schedule of expenditure; but he thought the House would see that it was impossible to apply a maximum scale to municipal elections, the expenditure at which, except in one or two cases, was not large. They ought, of course, to make them as inexpensive as possible, so that men of every class could enter the municipal bodies. There was a class lower than that which now were returned willing to enter into municipal bodies and take part in local government. He thought the House was bound to do all it could to make it easy for these classes to enter, and they ought not to throw obstacles in the way of persons who had a great stake in relation to local affairs taking also a fair share in those affairs. He found, however, that it was not so much the expenditure as the process of election that was the difficulty. Therefore he made no attempt to deal with the maximum scale. That was the exception, and substantially the Bill was the same as the Act relating to Parliamentary elections. He would suggest the only provisions different from the Parliamentary Act. The first was as to where public meetings should be held. In the discussion on the Parliamentary Bill, such a strong representation was made to him as to the difficulty of obtaining rooms for holding public meetings, other than those in connection with public-houses, in regard to county elections, that he felt compelled to withdraw the proposal; but he had received so many representations on the subject as to municipal elections, that he had felt it necessary to introduce the prohibition into the Bill, because it had been felt that, in a large number of cases, meetings were held in support of candidates which were really for the benefit of the publican. But while he placed this clause in the Bill, if it could be shown in the course of the discussion that it produced greater inconvenience than benefit, he should, so far as he was personally concerned, be prepared to listen to the arguments of hon. Members. Representations had also been made to him that persons who were perfectly innocent had to bear the costs of the actions of their agents. When it was recollected that it was made obligatory on persons, if elected, to enter the municipal body, they ought not to add burdens which might prevent them from becoming candidates. The proposition in the Bill was that where a person had not himself taken part in any corrupt practice some relief should be given to him with respect to the payment of those heavy costs. If corrupt practices extensively prevailed, then the community should pay the costs. If other persons bribed for the candidate, then those persons should pay. He had endeavoured to extend the provisions of this Bill not only to municipal elections, but cognate elections, such as Boards of Guardians and Local Boards. The rest of the Bill, which had only some 36 clauses, followed so closely the Parliamentary Bill, as it left that House, with the concurrence of the majority, that he did not think it necessary to go over it clause by clause. He thought it almost a duty to present the Bill to the House, for if some such measure as that suggested should not become law, all the labours of last Session would be of little avail, in consequence of their having what he might call one hole unstopped; and the only change would be that corrupt practices would be shifted from Parliamentary to municipal elections. He thought experience justified him in saying that the Bill was not framed to aid any political Party, and that the Act of last year was wisely framed. In this, as in the other measure, he had endeavoured to be guided by gentlemen of experience, and he would gladly receive suggestions for its improvement from whatever quarter of the House they came.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was sure the hon. and learned Member had been impelled by a sense of duty to introduce the measure, for everyone knew that bribery at municipal elections might be carried on for the express purpose of political corruption. He was glad also to hear that the Attorney General was willing to receive suggestions from any part of the House for its improvement. As to the former Bill, it had not yet been subjected to the test of a General Election, though so far as they had been able to learn it had worked well at bye-elections. At the time when the Corrupt Practices Bill was introduced great stress was laid on the principle of a maximum expenditure. Why had that principle entirely disappeared? It was just as important in municipal as in Parliamentary elections to say that a certain amount should be spent and no more. He had had no experience in municipal elections; he was happy to say he knew nothing about them; but this point certainly would demand the consideration of the House. He regretted the proposal that the Bill should be referred to a Standing Committee, and could see no reason why it could not be dealt with in the House, where they had Representatives of all the great boroughs. This was a matter specially requiring to be treated by the whole House, and he should oppose any attempt to transfer it to the Standing Committee.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought the House should bear in mind the fact that the Act of last year imposed very severe penalties, which should not be carried further than the nature of the case required. They might reasonably be applied to municipal elections, which were generally of a political character, and frequently connected with those for Parliamentary purposes; but the elections for School Boards, Boards of Health, or Guardians, were totally different matters, and it was unwise and unjust to expose persons who came forward to fulfil those duties to the heavy penalties of the Act which might be incurred by very slight inadvertence. He trusted, therefore, that, under any circumstances, elections of this nature would be omitted from the Bill.

MR. FIRTH asked why in this, in common with all previous Municipality Bills, London was to be excluded? He could see no reason why it should be, except, perhaps, the great natural virtue of its citizens. They were promised, indeed, a London Government Bill; but if they were so unfortunate as not to obtain it, they ought not to be excluded from the benefits of this one. At elections in the City of London votes had been bought and sold as completely as sheep in the open market. [Mr. WARTON: Oh, oh!] The hon. and learned Member objected to his statement. It was done in the ward of Portsoken at the last election but one, and if the hon. and learned Member would refer to The City Press, the organ of the Corporation, he would find what he had said was a fact.

MR. RAIKES said, he desired to congratulate the Attorney General on the introduction of this Bill. Any measure dealing with corrupt practices at Parliamentary elections must necessarily be supplemented by a measure like this, and he was glad the Government had seen their way to introducing it early in the Session, and seemed disposed to carry it through. The Attorney General had mentioned two points of difference in the new Bill, and in both cases they were an improvement on the former. In the first place, meetings in public-houses, where, in fact, the whole of the corrupt practices took place, were prohibited, and the cost of the proceedings were in certain cases thrown upon the constituency or the corrupt agents, instead of the unseated candidate, when personally innocent. He would, however, suggest that it was hardly satisfactory that the person incriminated should be precluded from having an appeal; but otherwise he thought it right and useful to be able to hold in terror over these gentlemen the extreme probability that they would have to pay for their malpractices. He would join very strongly in the representation of his right hon. Friend (Sir R. Assheton Cross) as to the policy of sending this measure to a Standing Committee. The Attorney General himself had not said why he thought it desirable to do so. The measure had very little to do with law, except in so far as that every measure which came before the House had something to do with a change in the law. He would suggest that it might just as well be sent to the Standing Committee on Trade, which had nothing to do at the present moment, and which would have the advantage of again being led by the President of the Board of Trade, who was well acquainted with every sort of electioneering, and whose experience might prove useful in the matter. He confessed that he would be extremely sorry to see this measure run the risk of getting into the troubled waters of a Standing Committee, and he would, therefore, venture when the question came up to challenge the proposal. He hoped, however, that the Attorney General, after what he had heard, and what he would hear in that debate, would be led to alter the conclusion to which he had come. The House ought to take a Bill of this sort in hand with great vigour and decision, and he thought that on Constitutional grounds the measure should remain under the consideration of the House. The result would be better if it were discussed in Committee of the Whole House, rather than committed to a delegated body such as a Grand Committee.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he held that if the Bill was to be passed at all it must go to a Grand Committee. He understood it was proposed to make the Bill applicable to Scotland. He should like to know if that were the case, and how it was intended to proceed with the introduction of clauses giving effect to the intention?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that it was intended to extend the Bill to Scotland. There would be no difficulty in introducing the necessary clauses.

MR. GORST said, he also cordially concurred in the admiration expressed with reference to the principle of the Bill. He, however, maintained that the success of the Act of last year was entirely due to the limitation of expenses. He doubted whether the present Bill would be successful unless the expenses were similarly limited. Bribery had been undoubtedly committed in municipal elections with a view to subsequent Parliamentary elections, and the present Bill would not put a stop to the practice. A clause should be inserted to limit the expenditure. With that addition, he thought that the Bill would work as well as that of last year.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, he was afraid that the Attorney General would be disappointed in his hope that the Bill would bring forward a better class of men for municipal elections. There was a great deal of corruption going on that was done, not by individuals, but by collective bodies, who had the control of charity and other funds, and he doubted whether the Bill would reach those cases. He did not see any reason why London should have been exempted from the action of the Bill; but still, in his opinion, the Bill was distinctly a step in the right direction.

MR. STOREY said, he thought there was a good deal in what had just fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) with reference to the limitation of expenditure at these elections. He, too, wished to take this opportunity of pressing upon the Government that in such a Bill it was absolutely necessary that a clause limiting the expenditure should be inserted. The misfortune in this matter was that the Law Officers of the Crown had had, comparatively speaking, no experience, except in reference to elections in small boroughs, and, as all knew, the circumstances therein were certainly dissimilar to the circumstances of large towns. He understood the hon. and learned Attorney General also to say just now that such a thing as large expenditure over municipal elections was not common. Well, if he correctly apprehended what he said, he could only say that he spoke in total ignorance of the subject. Why, he knew of an election in a Midland town only a few months ago where in a single ward of the borough, which had at least 12 wards, there was in that single ward an expenditure by two candidates of £700 in order to settle which of them should represent it. Nor was that an exceptional case. He had known in his own experience in various towns very large expenditure at such elections—sums spent varying from £100, £200, and £250—in a single ward. Now, if these sums were multiplied by the number of wards in the towns—and very often at the November ward contests there were elections in all the wards of a borough—they got absolutely a much larger sum spent in the month of November in municipal elections than could be spent in Parliamentary Elections. He therefore impressed very strongly on the Attorney General—having had, he was sorry to say, very large experience in such matters in more than one town—the absolute necessity there was of providing for the limitation of the expenditure at these elections.

MR. ONSLOW said, that the expenditure in ward elections did not always fall on the candidates. The amount necessary was to some extent obtained by large subscriptions, and that money undoubtedly was employed to influence voters. In small boroughs, if a legal limit were put on expenditure at municipal elections, and that limit was exceeded, it would be difficult to find anybody to prosecute, especially as he might be floored on some technical point and have to pay very heavy costs. No doubt, there was excitement at municipal elections; but it was nothing as compared with the excitement at Parliamentary elections. However strict were the rules laid down in that matter, they would be evaded in small places, although in large towns, like Manchester or Liverpool, where political feeling ran high, they might get men who would prosecute. In a small town, if a tradesman prosecuted another for bribery his business would go at once, and he would not deem it prudent in his own interest to do so. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) was here understood to refer the hon. Member to the clause relating to the Public Prosecutor.] That was all very well; but who would move the Public Prosecutor to prosecute? No doubt, the Corrupt Practices Bill of last year had done a great deal of good. He witnessed the late contested election at Brighton, and had been at many similar results at Brighton before that, and he had never known any election there, at which there was less display of colours, less posting, or less expense incurred, than at the last Parliamentary contest. In conclusion, he would not oppose the second reading of that Bill, but at the same time he would urge that it should be considered in Committee of the Whole House, and not relegated to a Grand Committee. Why it should be sent to a Grand Committee he could not conceive, unless it were that the Attorney General desired to give the Committee work.

MR. WHITLEY said, he agreed in the opinion that generally speaking the Bill was an improvement on the Bill of last Session. If he understood its principle correctly, it brought punishment more directly home to the actual offender and protected the innocent. There were, however, two alterations in the Bill to which the Attorney General had not alluded. Upon the Corrupt Practices Bill of last Session there was a long discussion as to the policy of allowing election meetings to be held at political clubs, and the result was that an exception was made in favour of those clubs in regard to meetings. In the present Bill, however, there was no suggestion in favour of political clubs. That he thought was a mistake. He agreed that the holding of such meetings at public-houses was most objectionable; but if buildings were erected where meetings might be held without the corrupting influences of public-houses, he could not see why they should not be utilized for municipal, in the same way as for Parliamentary elections. That Bill affected every man in the House, and he thought that the whole House ought to have an opportunity of considering it in Committee. He generally approved of the measure, and would give the Attorney General every aid in his power in passing it.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he regarded that Bill as one that was eminently fitted to be referred to the tribunal of a Grand Committee, and he believed that the Government had exercised a very wise discretion in proposing that it should be sent to such a Committee. He, at the same time, took the opportunity of saying that he thought the Bill went unnecessarily far; and while he cordially agreed in the expediency of extending the Corrupt Practices Act to municipal elections, he could not see that it was requisite to apply all its provisions to the election of Poor Law Guardians and members of School Boards. They had to be careful in legislation of that kind not to lay traps for innocent persons, who might, for some trivial act connected with these minor elections, be exposed to very heavy penalties.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, he had not intended to speak in that debate; but since he came down to the House he understood that a serious charge had been made against the constituency which he had the honour to represent. He was told that the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) had said that at municipal elections in the City of London votes were bought and sold as sheep were bought and sold in the market. He would ask, then, how it was that year by year in the various municipal wards of the City of London men were elected without any contest? There were, he thought, only two or three contests on last St. Thomas's Day in the City, and for one of those contests the hon. Member for Chelsea was responsible, because that hon. Member brought a friend into the ward to contest the seat of a much-honoured member of the Common Council, a strong Liberal in politics. In all the wards the same men were generally elected from year to year. In corrupt Parliamentary boroughs there was always a contest—they did not like "dry elections." If the constituency of the City of London were corrupt, why was it that they had not contests? He repudiated the statement of the hon. Member because it had been made in the House. Of what the hon. Member said out of the House he did not take any notice. The hon. Member for Chelsea was a man of high honour, but he had a craze about the City of London; and if the hon. Gentleman were told that either his hon. Friend and Brother Alderman opposite the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) or he (the Lord Mayor) had poisoned their grandmother, he would believe it like a shot.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he was afraid the Bill would not work without a whitewashing clause with respect to past corrupt transactions similar to the one in the Act of last Session. There was always an aversion on either side to have past elections looked into, so that, without one, unless the party workers on both sides were free from the risk of having old events opened up, they would never be able to start on a better footing. He wished to join in the protest against sending this Bill to a Grand Committee. When the Committees were formed they were divided into two classes—a Committee on Law and a Committee on Trade. He defied anyone to bring this Bill within the definition of matters proper for the Committee on Law. It would be as easy to bring it within the scope of the Committee on Trade. It seemed to him that, with respect to these Committees, if the work of the Committees was not limited to Bills having relation to the subjects with which they were intended to be exclusively occupied, it would soon come to be the prerogative of certain Ministers of the Crown to send all Bills introduced by them to Grand Committees. This course of proceeding might be used in derogation of the Privileges of the House.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he hoped the Attorney General would consider the question regarding the maximum limit of expenditure. Coming, as he did, from a large city, and familiar as he was with the fact that there was a large expenditure in times of municipal elections, he should be very much disappointed if the Bill of this year was different from the measure of last year.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was struck with the tone assumed by hon. Gentlemen opposite in reference to the sending of Bills to Grand Committees. He had been especially struck with the opinion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Wiltshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), who spoke of the Bill as being admirably suited for reference to a Grand Committee. The reasons which had been given clashed somewhat harshly with a great deal of somewhat exaggerated language to which the House had been compelled to listen not long ago as to the great improvement which might be confidently expected in their method of conducting Business by making use of those Grand Committees. The hon. Baronet had said that this Bill dealt with a subject which had been completely thrashed out, and was, therefore, capable of being dealt with in a Grand Committee. Hon. Members who had to listen to the discussions respecting the great principle of devolution must have had their original anticipations shaken when a staunch supporter of the Ministry defended the reference of a Bill to a Grand Committee on the ground that it dealt with a subject already thrashed out, and, therefore, would not introduce any political controversy. He thought the House would do well to consider how it initiated again this Session the system which had failed—the system of so-called devolution. What had been the result of the system last year? Hon. Members knew perfectly well that the so-called Grand Committees were universally admitted to be merely overgrown Select Committees, incapable of applying their energies to matters of detail with the force and the weight which a Select Committee was known to possess. When a Bill was referred to a so-called Grand Committee it had, for all practical purposes, been withdrawn from the cognizance of the House until the measure had reached such a stage as to have secured for all practical purposes its passage into law. As to the system of Grand Committees, however, it was not his intention to refer to the principle of it in any detail. He thought that when the House was asked by the Government, by Notice publicly given, to withdraw a measure from the immediate cognizance of the House, and to refer it to a Tribunal which, not only the Members of the House, but every person who was capable of forming an intelligent view of the conduct of Public Business, had admitted to have signally failed in carrying out the original high anticipations of its authors, the House ought to be very careful. The Attorney General had had appeals made to him to reconsider what he ventured to say was a most unwise resolve on his part, to refer this Bill to a Grand Committee. This was a matter which closely concerned a large number of their constituents, and it was a subject which was likely to form a topic of correspondence already sufficiently large with hon. Members. Those Members, therefore, who were not upon these so-called Grand Committees, would feel it their duty at the various stages open to them to exercise their position as independent Members of the House to open up any question which they might consider worthy to be dealt with by the House itself, whether or not attempts might have been previously made to dispose of those questions before another Tribunal. If the Attorney General had any corner in his mind open for the reconsideration of his determination, he hoped he would, while there was yet time, avoid being led into another of those fiascos which he (Mr. J. Lowther) regretted to think had succeeded in monopolizing so large a share of the invaluable time and energies of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he thought the Bill was eminently fitted to go before a Grand Committee, and that the gloomy anticipations of hon. Members opposite who objected to this course amounted, he would not say to Obstruction, but, at all events, to a denial to that House of the power of carrying through any kind of secondary legislation. If the system of Grand Committees had not fulfilled the expectations entertained of it, the reason was that the system had not been carried far enough; and he believed that until they consented to refer the greater number of the Bills that came before the House to Grand Committees, the House would never again get into working order. They wanted a radical reform of the procedure of the House in that direction.

MR. MAC IVER said, he entirely disagreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down. Having served on a Grand Committee, he knew what waste of time it was for any person whose time was worth anything to serve on those Committees, and how much they withdrew the subjects submitted to them from the proper consideration of the House. He joined with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) in appealing to the Attorney General to withdraw this Bill from the consideration of the Grand Committee. The Corrupt Practices Act, which had been, to a great extent, a success, was so because it had the cordial support of hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House. Both sides of the House were equally wishful to so amend the Corrupt Practices Act that it might be effective to prevent corruption. It was the desire of both sides that it should be a workable Act. It was far better, he thought, that the House should return to its old principle, and have measures discussed in the House rather than send them to the Grand Committees.

MR. RITCHIE said, he thought that, on the whole, the discussions which took place upon the Bankruptcy Bill last year in Grand Committee were of an eminently practical character. He was sorry he could not agree with hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House in thinking that this Bill should not be referred to a Grand Committee. They were all of opinion that the principle of the Bill was of a sound nature, and that some such measure should be passed into law; but there was very little chance of the Bill becoming law this Session, unless it was referred to a Grand Committee. The measure was of a non-contentious character, and all Members of the House were interested in seeing that the wheels of the House of Commons were greased, in order to enable them to pass a measure which the country expected them to pass. If, therefore, a Division should be taken now, he, for one, should vote for the reference of the Bill to a Grand Committee.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would appeal to the House to allow the matter to be decided now. The House had met at 2 o'clock to dispose of a Bill upon which there was really no practical difference of opinion, and almost every Member who had spoken on both sides had concurred in the principle of the Bill, and that it ought to be passed. They had then been four hours and a-half in the House, and had not yet come to a decision on the second reading. He hoped, at all events, the Bill might be allowed to be read a second time, and then before the Sitting closed they might determine the other question of referring it to a Grand Committee. It would not be to the credit of the House if, when such a Bill was before it, the Sitting should close without judgment having been pronounced upon it.

MR. HICKS said, that hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House were quite as anxious as hon. Members on the Ministerial side to support any measure which would put down corruption. The support the Government had received last year in the passage of the Bill dealing with the election of Members to that House ought to have taught them that they might safely trust the present Bill to a full Committee of the House. If the Attorney General would assent to the suggestion made to him, and withdraw his intention to send this Bill to a Grand Committee, he was quite sure that the discussion might at once stop, and that the Bill, having been read a second time, might go to a Committee of the Whole House and very soon be worked into a measure satisfactory to all parties. If the Bill was referred to a Grand Committee, it would have to be again discussed when it returned, and it would be far better to have it conducted in the old Constitutional way in that House.

MR. LEAMY said, he doubted very much if such a thing as corrupt practice at municipal elections existed in Ireland. The idea of spending money in that way would never occur to people in that country. He believed if the Government had stated, when the proposal to institute Grand Committees was before the House, that such measures as this would be referred to those Committees, they would not have obtained half the support they had received. This Bill was not at all required in Ireland, and they thought they had already a sufficient number of Bills with pains and penalties in that country. He might, therefore, inform the Home Secretary of the intention of the Irish Members to move that the Bill should not apply to Ireland.

MR. WARTON said, he objected to the reference of this Bill to a Grand Committee on the ground that the Government were preventing the House from having its rights. The House had a right to full and ample discussions on the stage of the second reading, and on the Motion to go into Committee; but that right seemed to have been temporarily lost. The penalties in this Bill were excessive; and he wished also to point out that the Attorney General was inconsistent with his proposals last year. Why, for instance, should the House of Commons be asked to treat the Licensed Victuallers' trade with contempt? Why did the Attorney General think it right one year, and wrong another, that meetings should be held in public-houses? Why was it that he now said he would not have meetings in public-houses, "because municipal elections were rather rough affairs?"

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LOCAL AND IMPERIAL TAXATION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD, in rising to call the attention of the House to the composition of the Public Revenue; and to move—

"That, accepting the principle which would adjust every man's taxation to his ability, this House desires that local and Imperial Taxation shall (whenever they are coincident) be levied upon a common basis and by a common measure of value; that Imperial Taxes shall, as regards the products of property, be (like local rates) charged upon their net or rateable annual value; and that industrial incomes shall be allowed, prior to assessment for Income Tax, an abatement, in compensation of their perishable nature," said, the question was one which affected several very important interests in the country, and had an important bearing, not only upon the levying of Imperial and local taxation, but also upon their administration and expenditure. Taxation and Revenue were too often regarded as convertible terms; and the amounts of the entries under the head of Expenditure in the official Statements of "Public Income and Expenditure" were assumed to be derived from the taxation of the country. This was very far from being the case. Of the £89,000,000 standing under the head of Income, £12,000,000 were repayments and cross entries, reducing the actual "Income" in 1883-4 to £77,000,000, from which again must be deducted the revenue from "Crown Services," "Crown Rights," and "Crown Lands." The sum actually raised by taxation was £73,000,000, of which the Income Tax contributed £12,000,000. It was especially to the Income Tax that he invited the attention of the House through the Resolution which proposed to adjust its assessment to the principle upon which local rates to the amount of £28,000,000 were already levied. How should the National Income be raised? To his mind, nothing was more obvious than that it should be the result of an aggregation of certain portions taken rateably from all individual incomes. The State, in the levying of that income, ought to be guided by the principle laid down by Adam Smith, "that every subject should be taxed in proportion to his ability"—that was, "in proportion to the revenue he enjoyed under the protection of the State." And it would be observed that the ability to expend, or, practically, expenditure, was the interpretation of Adam Smith's axiom. The Income Tax was, unhappily, not levied upon this sound principle, for it taxed at their nominal amounts of £1,200, incomes so widely different as these—A capitalist had a mortgage yielding him net £1,200; a landowner, out of a nominal rental of £1,200, had £1,100 net; a houseowner, out of £1,200, had but £1,000 net; and a millowner, out of a rental of £1,200, had £800 net. This inequality was the more marked in the case of incomes derived from landed property, which might be so heavily mortgaged, or otherwise encumbered, that the nominal owner, when he had paid interest on the mortgages and tax on the supposed income, would have hardly any residue. Take the case of a houseowner with his nominal rental of £1,200 reduced by outgoings to £900. He might owe £900 as interest on a mortgage, and he had to pay out of his net residue of £100, Income Tax on £300, or in a ratio thrice as large as that of the capitalist mortgagee. A landowner with a burthened property would be in the same position, or worse, for with the present reduction of rents he might be compelled to pay Income Tax on the outgoings of his land without having any residue on which to live. The remedy was obvious—simply to levy the taxation, not on the nominal value, but on the rateable net value. Passing from the owners of property of this nature, he would refer to the case of owners of industrial incomes, those living by the exercise of their skill and intelligence, such as barristers or officials of that House, who were taxed upon the whole of their receipts. He would ask, on behalf of all classes earning industrial incomes, such an amount of remission of taxation as would place them in a position of safety as regarded the future—that was, in the same position relatively as the owners of real property, who, in the case of local rates, enjoyed reductions of from 10 to 33 per cent. His proposal was that all purely industrial gains be allowed an abatement of one-third to place them on an equality with the net results of the rents of real property. This concession would be nothing more than carrying out the principles enunciated by Adam Smith, and it was merely extending to industrial earnings the same principle of assessment which the House had already adopted on the subject of local taxation. He wanted to know why was it that the principle which had been declared by the House to be right, sound, and just, to be scientifically true, and to be equal as between individuals in respect of their property, was to be denied in the taxation of the same properties for the Queen's taxes? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would know that, in his Department, in the case of determining licences or qualifications which depended upon a certain amount of value, the decisions were determined on the rateable value; and he would, therefore, call upon the right hon. Gentleman to support him in extending the same enlightened policy to the levy of taxes. He would now refer to the important decision of the House of Lords in the case of "Dobbs v. The Grand Junction Waterworks Company"—a decision which gave to his cause a force which no indifference or sophistry could resist. In delivering that decision, Lord Bramwell said—

"What is the meaning of 'Annual Value'? We may safely adopt the definition (in 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 96, 1836), viz., the rent at which it would let free of all usual tenants' rates and taxes, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent. This is their value, this is the value, the net, the only value. . . . 'Value' means 'net value,' 'net value' means 'value.'"

It was upon that decision that he placed his hope and confidence; and he thought the House, and he trusted the Government, would not continue to shut their ears and eyes to the evidence of such a decision with reference to the administration of that important branch of the Revenue which constituted the Queen's taxes. It was right to deduct from industrial earnings previous to their assessment the proportion which would be equivalent to their renovation or permanence. The millowner was allowed a deduction of 33 per cent on his machinery; but the professional man, who might be called a "human mill," as perishable as the other, was charged upon the gross income he received. The man himself could not be replaced, but his income might be; he could secure to his family the same amount which he could now spare out of his earnings. As regarded the question of what the amount should be, very able actuaries and students of scientific taxation had determined that one-half of an industrial income would not be an excessive amount to allow as a reduction for taxation. His (Mr. Hubbard's) calculation was that a practising barrister, earning £1,200 a-year, should lay by one-third of it, say, in a policy of insurance, as a provision for his family. That would be simply carrying out a principle which had been adopted—namely, to allow a deduction from income not exceeding one-sixth for Income Tax. The only defect in that clause was that one-sixth was not enough; it should be not less than one-third; and it was also absurd to bind people down to insurance as the only means of providing for their families. Government, and the Prime Minister himself, had already accepted the principle in the case of a premium for insurance. One advantage of the acceptance of the proposal which he placed before the House would be that it would bring into harmony the two great branches of public Revenue—the local rates, amounting to £28,000,000, and the Income Tax to £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 more; and it would bring them under the same valuation list and a common collection, which would be a source of great economy, and save the taxpayer a large amount of molestation, as he would have one instead of two visits from the collector. The necessity for introducing some method which should relieve the taxpayer under the Income Tax was unavoidable, for the amount of demoralization it had caused was hardly to be described. In by no means a distant Report on the Income Tax Revenue, it was stated that of the amounts which should be returned under Schedule D only 44 per cent came under charge. That was a frightful picture, for as Schedule D was the result of self-assessment, it really pointed to fraud. Moreover, this violation of honesty and truth in the Return was provoked by the injustice of the tax itself. So completely had some become reconciled to these disgraceful consequences of the tax that Mr. Lowe, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, stated that people had the remedy in their own hands; and why should the Government care about it? He protested against the continuance of a system which demoralized both the administrators and the victims of the tax. Instances had been known of high officials counselling their subordinates not to inform the public of their rights, but to allow the taxpayer to pay far beyond his legal liability. But was the Income Tax a tax which could be done away with? The Prime Minister, some years ago, gave the people to understand that the Income Tax would be repealed; and he mentioned the other day, in a letter printed in The Times, that at the time he expressed that opinion the finances of the country were in such a state as to make the repeal of the Income Tax a very probable event. He (Mr. Hubbard) had no doubt the Prime Minister said that with perfect sincerity; but what he (Mr. Hubbard) had to say was, that he was not the best doctor who killed the patient. The best doctor was he who cured. If the Income Tax were repealed, he wanted to know by what means they would bring the enormous wealth of traders under contribution to the service of the State. The Income Tax was the only tax which reached the owners of vast incomes who might spend them in dissipation in Paris or elsewhere abroad; and it was the only way of reaching the large Corporations. What was required was a re-adjustment of the tax; and he was in favour of the tax being maintained, because it was the only means by which all classes of the community could, according to their ability, be brought under a charge for the general service of the State. It was objected that the effect of his proposal would be to increase the burdens of the large capitalists, while lightening those of other classes. That was undoubtedly so; but no one could justly complain if those who were undertaxed had their burdens equalized with those who were overtaxed. No doubt, one class would feel the operation of the change, and that was the rich capitalist class; they would be more heavily charged, while, on the other hand, it would relieve those who lived by their brains and industry. It would weigh heavily on the idle permanent income, and relieve the industrial but perishable income. They could not readjust an unequally distributed burden without its pressing upon some more severely than it did before. If A, E, I, O, and U were engaged to carry between them a given load, upon equal terms, and it was presently discovered that A, E, and I had been carrying more than their share, it was obvious that O and U would, under an equal distribution of the load, carry more than they did before. In this matter he had been moved solely by a desire to do his duty for the benefit of the country; and he trusted the Prime Minister would see his way to the introduction of a measure which would harmonize and combine the system of public taxes and local rates so as to make them more just and satisfactory. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer also would be able to approve of a scheme which their own experienced officials were quite competent to carry out, which would remove all the inequalities and grievances under which the taxpayers now labour, and would substitute, for a system unjust, unequal, and demoralizing, one which would raise a portion of the Revenue easily and effectively as regarded the Crown, and acceptably and satisfactorily as regarded the taxpayer. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. TOMLINSON seconded the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "accepting the principle which would adjust every man's taxation to his ability, this House desires that Local and Imperial Taxation shall (whenever they are coincident) be levied upon a common basis and by a common measure of value; that Imperial Taxes shall, as regards the products of property, be (like local rates) charged upon their net or rateable annual value, and that industrial incomes shall be allowed, prior to assessment for Income Tax, an abatement, in compensation of their perishable nature,"—(Mr. J. G. Hubbard,)

—instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my remarks on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman will be partly critical and partly apologetic; but before I proceed to them I wish to make an observation as to the circumstances under which this Motion has been made. Yesterday, with a perfectly good conscience and a firm conviction, the right hon. Gentleman made a Motion, and stated to the House that he had to call attention to a definite matter of urgent public importance, and full 40 Gentlemen from the division of the House opposite to that in which I have the honour to sit rose to their feet to support the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman that the discussion he proposed to bring on to-night was a definite matter of urgent public importance. The right hon. Gentleman has brought on his Motion, has delivered his speech, and the numbers present in that division of the House which yielded yesterday, with such ease, 40 Members to make that assertion of the urgency of the subject have varied from between three to six. [Mr. WARTON: No.] I am stating matters of fact, which cannot be shaken by negation that appears to proceed from utter forgetfulness of fact. The numbers have varied between three and six—I should say seven; but out of the seven some have been here in anticipation of an interesting and, I think, rather urgent subject, the discussion of which was likely to follow. That is a curious illustration of the state of feeling—[Interruption.] An hon. Baronet opposite interrupts me.

MR. WARTON: No; it was I who did so.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg pardon; it was the hon. and learned Member for Bridport, who, in the exercise of his traditional privilege of disorder, interrupted me.

MR. WARTON: I rise to explain my interruption. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister is in possession of the House.

MR. WARTON: Am I not to say anything? I wish to make an explanation. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. GLADSTONE: There was great sympathy with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard), on the ground that if he brought forward his Motion last night he would not have fair play, because he would have been liable to have the discussion mingled with other subjects. There is, however, one advantage which the right hon. Gentleman would at least have had, and that is that he would have had the House pretty full to hear his statement, instead of the lank and lean attendance which has distinguished the portion of the House which was last night so deeply interested in the matter. But it is somewhat remarkable that the most fervent appeal made last night from the Front Bench opposite came from the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith), who testifies so deep and philanthropic an interest in the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman that he has not thought fit to honour him with his presence during a single sentence of his speech. These appear to me to be very extraordinary circumstances. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport, or any other Member, may comment on them as they think fit; but they seem to me extraordinary circumstances in connection with the arrangement of Business in this House. I am very sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has not had greater justice done to him, on a subject, too, upon which I am sure he has bestowed the greatest pains; for there is no one in this House who is more able to explain his views on any question connected with political economy with clearness and force than is the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has devoted himself to this matter with a chivalrous loyalty. He began upon it shortly after his entrance into Parliament, now more than 20 years ago; and I believe that he will pursue it to the death. It reminds me of the Crusades. They began somewhere about the year 1100, and they continued at intervals for about two and a-half centuries; and if the condition of human life, now so much less happy than in the patriarchal age, permitted the right hon. Gentleman to extend his Parliamentary career to a period as lengthened as that embraced by the Crusades, I am sure that at the end of two centuries and a-half the right hon. Gentleman would still be found arguing with undeniable force and all his clearness of demonstration in favour of his plan for the reconstruction of the Income Tax. But the right hon. Gentleman must be content to look to the interest of this question. He has had some experience of it; and what has his experience been? In 1861 I had the honour to be Chancellor of the Exchequer; and then the right hon. Gentleman made a speech of much the same character as that which he has delivered to-night, and, if I remember aright, in greater detail. As Chancellor of the Exchequer, having had a responsible experience of this matter which the right hon. Gentleman has never had, I opposed his Motion; but he beat me by a majority of four, and obtained what was then the great object of his desire—a Select Committee to examine into his plans. Before that Committee the right hon. Gentleman developed his views with a fulness not here permitted. He called the most distinguished advocates of those views to support them in evidence; he made no complaint as to the impartiality or the ability of that Committee; and when I point out that, not to mention others, there sat on the Committee such men as my noble Friend Lord Sherbrooke and as the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), it is plain that the House of Commons had done its best to make it an efficient and able Committee. That Committee produced a considerable Blue Book. The right hon. Gentleman himself was Chairman of that Committee, and had every advantage of bringing forward and pressing upon the minds of the Committee all the arguments that he has adumbrated—and necessarily only adumbrated—to-night. And what was the result? When the evidence had been taken, the right hon. Gentleman prepared a most elaborate and most able Report, setting forth these same views. The Committee were quite unable to accept the Report of their Chairman. They stated with sufficient frankness in the brief Report which they presented to the House that they had arrived at the conclusion that the plan proposed by their Chairman did not afford a basis for the practicable and equitable readjustment of the Income Tax. That was the effect produced on a Committee composed of the most able men by a full and accurate and open examination of the subject. And after having carried his Motion for a Committee, and failed to convince his Committee, which rejected his Report and adopted instead of it a Report drawn up by the right hon. Member for North Devon, the right hon. Gentleman now comes here and thinks that on the strength of a speech, however ingenious and clever, the House is to embark itself in the desperate undertaking that he invites it to enter upon.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD: I wish to explain that it is not the same scheme, and it is a new Parliament, without prejudices.

MR. GLADSTONE: It is a new Parliament, and a new generation, if you like; but I have not done with my history of the case; and, at any rate, there is this to be said—that the Leader of the Opposition and of the Party to which the right hon. Gentleman belongs is the same Gentleman who drew the Report from which I have just made a quotation. Whether it is a new or an old Parliament, it, of course, has a per-it, that there are a number of inequalities in the Income Tax, some of which he has shown, and many of which he has not shown at all, and many of which he does not seem to have any idea of. Are these inequalities incurable, or are they not? Sir, the right hon. Gentleman refers to a time when I, on the part of the Liberal Government, engaged that we should abolish the Income Tax. Why, according to the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman, it would be a great mistake to do away with the Income Tax. That seems to be his idea. Now, can this operation of curing be performed? The right hon. Gentleman says it can; but he had the opportunity of stating his case ten times more fully before the Committee he induced the House of Commons to appoint, and that Committee, by seven to two, declared that he had entirely failed. That is an awkward fact for the right hon. Gentleman; but it is true. He was not dismayed by the adverse vote of his Committee, and he proposed it again the next year, on which occasion his majority was only four. Let me go a little further and tell him this—that with one single exception—a clever man, Mr. James Wilson—there never has been to my knowledge one single Minister or economist who had paid the slightest responsible attention to this subject for the 90 years since this tax has been established who would have concurred in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman. Mr. Pitt and Sir Robert Peel are the two greatest financiers who have been at the head of a Government. Do you not think they took the greatest possible interest in finding, if they could, those means of removing an anomaly and an injustice, and to make the tax delightful and popular to everybody. Certainly they did; and I remember very well going to Sir Robert Peel when I was a Parliamentary youngster, a character that was then, I must say, very different indeed from what it is now—after hearing something like the speech I have heard to-night. I was extremely captivated by the speech, and I spoke to Sir Robert Peel about it. He put an extinguisher upon me and my speculations in half a minute, and declared that he would not entertain for an instant a proposition such as this. I have mentioned Mr. Pitt, Sir Robert Peel, Sir George Lewis, Mr. Herries, and the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote). Beside these I say there is not one who would support the right hon. Member for the City, and I challenge him to produce one. Why does the right hon. Gentleman not make his plan? He said that we had no plan before us—[Mr. J. G. HUBBARD: A good plan.]—that does not really touch the difficulties of the case. I do not wish to quote myself as an authority; but I would like to refer to the time when I first became Chancellor of the Exchequer, 32 years ago. At that time Mr. Disraeli, who had been the Chancellor of the Exchequer before me—as I know simply in the expression of private opinion and without any communication with the Revenue Departments—had expressed an opinion in favour of taxing Schedule D at 3*d.* and Schedule A at 7*d.* That secured, to a great extent, the votes of the Conservative Party for a plan of that kind. In the Liberal Party of that time there was an extremely free prepossession in favour of a plan of the kind; and when I became Chancellor of the Exchequer I will venture to say that if the question had to be decided there and then an immense majority would have voted for the plan of differentiating the Income Tax. In these circumstances I think it is pretty obvious that if it had been possible for me with my faculties to find a way to do it I should have done it. I spent more labour on a subject of this kind than I have ever done on almost any other subject in my life. I came down to the House and argued the case at great length, and I showed the great anomalies and difficulties involved then, and they were as nothing compared with the anomalies and difficulties which would have been involved if you had fixed differentiated duties on different Schedules. The House of Commons, by a large majority, having been induced to look closely into the case, repelled entirely these plans, and voted for the Income Tax as it had been voted before. There are two rival plans. One is that of the right hon. Gentleman. There is no doubt whatever about inequalities in the tax. The right hon. Gentleman says—“Cure the inequalities, make the tax perfect, keep it perpetual.” And the other plan is—

Mr. Gladstone

“The tax is incurable of its inequalities, and in support of that doctrine is arrayed every man

hon. Gentleman's course; but I observe the right hon. Gentleman was what the Scotch call "canny." In his references to the Schedule I heard him speak of E I U, I did not hear him mention O; but it seemed all through to be A E I O U. Why was it necessary to go to the five vowels? We have got the first five letters of the alphabet, and is that not just as good? A B O D E he would not touch. He thought it was better to generalize a little, and detach the operation of his plan from dry, hard, matter-of-fact, because the right hon. Gentleman yesterday had the great advantage of enjoying the support of the landed interest. They rose on his behalf in order to insure this discussion. [Cries of "No, no!"] Who rose then? I constantly hear it boasted from that quarter of the House that they are the landed interest. I believe there are some other people in the House who have got land; but, at the same time, they are always calling themselves the "landed interest" by way of excellence. They are entitled to do that, and I believed in calling the Party opposite the landed interest I was paying a compliment. Well, now, what is the right hon. Gentleman who got those 40 Gentlemen to rise and help forward this Motion going to do with Schedule A? If he had taken A B C D and E, instead of the vowels, it would have been necessary to particularize, and to have said we will lighten A B and C, and tax further I and U. No; he is not going to tax I and U, except upon the five vowels; but among the actual Schedules taxed he is going to tax further Schedule A as the main basis of his operations. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to tell me that if he has got £12,000,000 to raise by the Income Tax, and has begun by allowing a reduction of 33 per cent on D and E, he will get his £12,000,000 without further taxing Schedule A?

MR. J. G. HUBBARD: It is my firm conviction that in the recommendation which I have made Schedule A would, as nearly as possible, be in the same position as it is now, with this advantageous result from an adjustment, that those who are most heavily burdened would have their burdens lightened.

MR. GLADSTONE: I must investigate this a little further. I think it would have been better had he not taken those five vowels. It would have been much better if he had told us that the question really was whether Schedule A was to be burdened or not. That is the main question. Now, the right hon. Gentleman said at present you do not get upon Schedule D one-half of what you ought to get. Why do you not? Why, because of the great indignation against the injustice of the law; and, in consequence of that indignation at the Revenue, persons only pay upon 44 per cent of their income. Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has a faculty of imagination which came out in the last sentence of his speech, where he said that he was—I cannot remember the exact words—bringing forward a plan which would be easy of administration, lucrative in result, and satisfactory to the entire community. He offered to us a kind of paradise of taxation. I do not believe that the reason why you only get 44 per cent of this tax is this indignant sense of being oppressed. It is nothing of the kind. It is the unfortunate fact that a considerable portion of the community will escape paying dues to the Chancellor of the Exchequer if they can. At any rate, that is a question between the right hon. Gentleman and him; but what I want to know is this—the right hon. Gentleman from D and E deducts at least 33 per cent. Does he propose to deduct 33 per cent from A? No; nothing of the kind; and I will leave it to the landed interest and other gentlemen to say whether the fact of deducting 33 per cent from D and E, if the same sum of money has to be raised, will or will not be a burden on Schedule A? [MR. J. G. HUBBARD: I have not made the calculation.] I asked the right hon. Gentleman if he ventured to take 33 per cent from Schedule A; and he says no. I say that my right hon. Friend's plan manifestly goes to the burdening of Schedule A. That is a question which I have treated at great length in this House, and I will not refer to the arguments, because they are too long and intricate. I think it would have been better if the right hon. Gentleman had used the five vowels in the actual Schedule, and not have gone to the five vowels in order to obscure the operation of the plan. What is the real case? I have stated broadly to the right hon. Gentleman, and I do not question responsible in this matter in long succession, continued throughout many generations, without a motive to draw them aside from the right path, but with every motive to make them pursue it, are safer guides in a matter of this importance than what I regard as the academical speculations of my right hon. Friend.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL assured the Prime Minister that he and those who sat around him on the Opposition side were induced to take the action they did yesterday by their desire to maintain the rights of private Members, which, in their opinion, seemed to be threatened. He himself had been ignorant of the very terms of the Motion, though the name of his right hon. Friend was as closely connected with the subject of the Income Tax as that of Richard Cœur de Lion was with the crusades.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he thought the Prime Minister was unnecessarily severe on the Gentlemen of the Opposition. The other night they panted for information as to General Gordon up to 7 o'clock, when the Sitting was suspended. The British Constitutional Party had then to go to dinner—for the British Constitution must be maintained—and at 9 none of them returned. He did not intend to go into the intricacies of this question, but wished to remark that he called attention to one particular branch of it last year, when an important error arose in the discussion. To the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill he moved an Amendment for the purpose of preventing the Chancellor of the Exchequer from putting his paw on incomes that never came into the United Kingdom. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told him that a case had been tried in 1808 in which it had been decided that the whole income, whether made in England or not, was to be assessed. Still, 100 Members voted for the Motion objecting to that which was stated to be the law. His own solicitor being unable to find the case in the published reports, he applied for a reference to it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Private Secretary, who furnished him with the full particulars of the case, from which it appeared that what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been advised was a legal decision was only the opinion of the Inland Revenue Board, which was not upheld by the Income Tax Commissioners, the case being that of a gentleman who carried on trade in Ireland, which was not then subject to Income Tax, and who, having for some time paid tax on the whole income, succeeded in obtaining exemption, except for the portion of his income which was expended in England. In these circumstances, he should raise the point again this year on the Inland Revenue Bill; and it was probable that some hon. Members who did not vote previously against what they were told was the law would support his Motion, which was in conformity with the law.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he understood that the object of the discussion on the Motion for the Morning Sitting was to prevent interference with the rights of private Members; and he was under the impression that the first subject to be discussed was the Motion on Portpatrick Harbour, which it was said would not take long, but would lead to a Division. On reaching the House at five minutes to 10 he was surprised to find that the House was not discussing the first Motion on the Paper; and he believed many of his Friends were absent in the belief that that Motion would occupy more than an hour, and that the Motion on the Income Tax would be reached at a later period. He must emphasize one thing which had fallen from the Prime Minister. It had been shown clearly what the anomalies in the Income Tax were, and the Prime Minister had admitted that the anomalies were cruel; but he said they could not be remedied, and therefore they must be perpetuated as long as the Income Tax itself. He said there were the greatest possible difficulties in remedying them.

MR. GLADSTONE: Not difficulties, but impossibilities.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the right hon. Gentleman's correction proved his case further than he had ventured to state it. It followed that if the Income Tax were continued the anomalies could not be removed. In 1874 the right hon. Gentleman offered the constituencies the greatest bribe ever held out to them—namely, the abolition of the Income Tax; but the constituencies resolutely and boldly refused to accept it, and now it seemed, because of this refusal, no attempt was to be made to remedy the inequalities, although it was admitted that the operation of them amounted to cruelty. He entirely agreed in the views of his right hon. Friend, and he had hoped that some expectation would have been held out to the public that the existing inequalities which the Prime Minister admitted would have received some attention from him with a view to their removal. The Prime Minister, however, adopted a different course. He seemed to have taken offence because the country did not accept the bribe of the promised abolition of the Income Tax; but surely that was no reason why some attempt should not be made to remedy its inequalities. The taxation of the country had been greatly increased since 1874, and it was equally clear that the number of articles which were taxed had gradually diminished. If the Income Tax had been abolished it was difficult to say on what articles money could be raised to meet the expenditure of the country.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to explain. I must have conveyed a totally erroneous impression to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. He says that I stated because the country refused to have the Income Tax repealed in 1874, therefore I am determined that no attempt shall be made to remedy the inequalities in its assessment. I am not aware that any word of my speech could in the slightest degree warrant that statement. In 1853, and on other occasions in this House, I stated plainly that it was impossible to reconstruct the Income Tax on the principle of different rates and allowances in the different Schedules; and the opinion I entertain on that subject is the opinion of the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon, as recorded in the Report of the Committee of 1861, and read by me to-night.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he had no remedy to propose for the inequalities. [MR. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] As far as I can gather, that is the present position of the question.

MR. WHITLEY said, the question was a very important one, and he had hoped that it would have been met by the Prime Minister in a different spirit to that in which he had addressed the House. Hon. Members seemed to think it only affected the owners of large property; but he could assure the House that those who suffered most were the owners of property in large towns. There they suffered from over-taxation, and he thought that by what the Prime Minister had said the House had been led away from the Resolution of his right hon. Friend (Mr. J. G. Hubbard). It was a very simple Resolution which dealt with an admitted grievance, that local taxation was upon the net value, whereas Imperial taxation was upon the gross value. This was a matter which he assured the right hon. Gentleman was oppressive, not upon the large owners of property, but upon the small owners. [MR. GLADSTONE: I did not say so.] The right hon. Gentleman had stated that it would be a tax for many years to come. If it was to go forth to the people that the tax was likely to be continued, the country would be very much indebted to his right hon. Friend for having called attention to the subject. The other question was the difference between the taxation of settled incomes and the taxation of precarious incomes. He could well understand the difficulties to which the right hon. Gentleman had drawn attention; but, at the same time, the question was one worthy of serious consideration, and one which the country would expect the Government, if possible, to rectify; and he thought, therefore, that the Prime Minister had, if he would allow him to say so, led the House away from the issue before it. The Prime Minister seemed to lose sight of the real question of the right hon. Gentleman. It was a question which he was sure was deep in the minds of thousands of our fellow-countrymen—the owners of small property—and the great bulk of the constituencies must again and again have it brought before them. He was very much indebted to his right hon. Friend for having brought the question forward; but, considering the present condition of the House, he did not think it would be wise to press the matter any further.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he did not hesitate to say that no owner of landed property ever received, say, 80 per cent net of any property which he held. He paid Income Tax on the gross rental. There was no allowance for repairs, insurance, bad debts, &c. Let the House compare the difference with regard to trades. In trade they made their own returns, and received a liberal allowance for all those outgoings which, in the case of land, were never taken into consideration. The comparison between the treatment of traders and the treatment of owners of landed property was certainly a very grievous one. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] He would give an illustration. Only a short time ago he owned a poor property in the middle of a moor of about 100 acres. The buildings were very dilapidated. It was a question with him whether he should let it go down to common, or reconstruct the farm buildings. He was unwilling that it should go down to common, and he built upon it. The cheapest buildings he could put up cost him £700. He let it for £50 a-year, and now he had paid 14 years' Income Tax, but had not received a single farthing for the property. At no period had the landed interest suffered so much as during the last few years. Reference had been made to the question of subventions. He contended that the whole of the subventions had been absorbed entirely by the extra taxation for education, &c., which had been imposed upon the landowners since 1870. He would remind the Prime Minister that many years ago he promised that this question should be considered when the subject of local taxation came before them, and that relief should be given some other way. That promise had been kept dangling before them without any definite remedy. He sympathized very much with the Motion, because, as regarded the landed interest, they had still a very great grievance.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 35: Majority 38.—(Div. List, No. 71.)

Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

JAMAICA—THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL —CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM.

OBSERVATIONS.

CAPTAIN PRICE, in rising to call attention to the form of Government in Jamaica, said, that the Forms of the House would not allow him to make the Motion which he had intended; but, if he had been able to do so, it would have been in these terms—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the people of Jamaica should be restored to a material share in the management of their own local and financial affairs."

There were many hon. Members of the House better fitted to deal with this question than himself. There was one in particular who was especially qualified to do so, the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), whom he was glad to see present, who possessed an intimate knowledge of Jamaica, and who for years had shown himself ready to stand forward as a champion of the rights of the people of that country. But the accidents of the ballot had put this opportunity into his hands, and at another time he should be willing to second the hon. and learned Gentleman. He was afraid the subject which he had to bring forward that night was not one which would interest many hon. Members of the House. The day had gone by, fortunately, when the affairs of Jamaica could not be discussed without raising Party strife. Forty-five years had elapsed since Mr. Burge and Serjeant Mereweather had pleaded at the Bar of the House, in long and eloquent speeches, and pleaded successfully the right of the people of Jamaica to the control of their own affairs. The question in that day resulted in fierce and angry debates, and in the downfall of a powerful Ministry. In these days, he feared, it was more likely to result in a "Count out" of the House; or, at all events, in something very like apathy and inattention. Nevertheless, he felt it his duty to bring the matter forward, and he craved the indulgence of the House for some little time. The Blue Books and Papers recently laid on the Table would have shown hon. Members the state into which the finances of Jamaica had fallen during the 17 years of Crown Government, and the dissatisfaction of the people in consequence. They would have also shown that the matter had been under the consideration of the Government, and that the Secretary of State for the Colonies had taken what he was pleased to call a "new departure," and had promised the people of Jamaica that they should have some control over their own local and financial affairs. He proposed to examine what that really amounted to. There were

hon. Members in that House, and he feared their name was "legion," who thought that Jamaica should have no Constitutional form of Government whatever, and they based their contention upon three grounds. First, they said that a Constitutional form of Government had been tried, and had proved a failure, and that the Assembly was effete and corrupt; secondly, that the people of Jamaica abolished their own Constitution, and, therefore, were out of Court in asking for its restoration; and, thirdly, they said that Crown Government had been tried in Jamaica for 17 or 18 years, and had proved a success. Upon all these points he joined issue with them in the most unhesitating manner, and he would ask leave to examine those allegations; because, by so doing, he should clear the ground of many and grave misconceptions with regard to Jamaica, and also because it would furnish him with arguments directly applicable to the case he had taken in hand. It was not true that the Assembly of Jamaica, which had existed for 200 years, was effete and corrupt, though vague and reckless charges to that effect had been made in Parliament. It had been stated over and over again that the House of Representatives in Jamaica tampered with the finances. He would give an instance of the wild and reckless charges which had been made against the old House of Assembly, and which were generally believed in this country. In the other House of Parliament, when the Act for the abolition of the House of Assembly was being passed, in 1866, Lord Taunton said—

"In the first place, there was vested in the Jamaica House of Representatives a power of originating money votes without the sanction of the Crown. . . . What had been the result? They had ruined the finances of the country utterly."—(3 Hansard, [182] 124-5.)

That was said by a Nobleman who had been at the Colonial Office, and who ought to have known better. The House of Representatives had no such power. He (Captain Price) had here the Act of the Constitution of Jamaica of 1854, which would set the matter at rest. That Act—17 Vict., c. 29, s. 23—provided—

"That the Executive Government should continue to be discharged by the Governor in the same manner as before, and that the exclusive power of proposing any vote of money should vest in and be exercised by him on his sole responsibility."

It was, therefore, absurd to say, as Lord Taunton did, that the House of Assembly had the power of originating Money Votes. It was also a mistake to say, as Lord Grey did, that the House of Assembly had secured the right of expending the grants made for the Public Service. Not only did the Legislature of Jamaica not possess the power which was ascribed to it, but it had never sought to obtain it. An attempt was once made to endow the popular Assembly with the right of originating money grants; but the origin of the attempt was not to be found in the Assembly itself, but in the Representative of the Crown, Sir Charles Darling. That this was the case was proved by a despatch of the Duke of Newcastle, dated January 29th, 1861, from which he would read an extract—

"I find in these Papers" (relating to the controversy which had been raised) "voluminous arguments, conducted on both sides with much ability, respecting the theory and principles of the system of government established in Jamaica by the Act of 1854, but scarcely any information as to the origin of the disagreement which has broken up the harmony with which, for more than six years, the Legislature and successive Governors of the Colony, much to the credit of all, had co-operated for the public good. . . . I regret that the controversy respecting these principles was provoked by your requiring from your Executive Committee a concurrence in what I conceive to be a very erroneous view on your part of the Governor's position in respect of his responsibility for acts done in Executive Committee."

He had quoted this to show that down to 1862, at all events, the Secretary of State for the Colonies had not considered the House of Assembly to be corrupt or effete; that he was satisfied with the working of the Constitution Act, and that harmony prevailed. But he would show what was the opinion of the Governor of the Island from that date down to within a few months of the abolition of the House of Assembly. In his speech on opening the House of Assembly in November, 1862, Mr. Eyre said—

"The general revenue of the Island has improved, and an increase exceeding the estimates has been yielded. . . . With a flourishing revenue, I rely with confidence upon your making adequate provision," &c., &c.

In opening the Session in the following year, he said—

"I am happy to acquaint you that the revenue of the country has on the whole exceeded that of last year."

And again, in 1864, after a lengthened tour throughout the Island, he spoke in the same way of the satisfactory state of the finances, and described the people as being

"One and all animated by the same spirit of warm loyalty, considerate kindness, and generous hospitality."

The same people whom a few months after it suited him to describe as little less than devils, and the country as being on the brink of a volcano. With this testimony, then, what grounds were there for charging the late House of Assembly with being corrupt, and with having played "ducks and drakes" with the Public Revenues? There had, in modern times, been three crises in the history of Jamaica. There was the crisis of 1854, when the new Constitution was granted to the Island, which was brought about by the laudable wish on the part of the Representatives of the people to keep down expenditure, the Crown having insisted on the maintenance of extravagant establishments which at that time were quite unsuitable. A similar crisis occurred in 1865, when the House of Assembly was abolished. The questions which had occupied the attention of the Legislature during the two or three years before that event were chiefly questions connected with the misappropriation of the Revenues of the Colony by the Representatives of the Crown. The third crisis was that which was taking place at the present time, and this also had been brought about by the extraordinary expenditure for which the Representatives of the Crown were responsible. In connection with the extraordinary misconception existing in England concerning the Legislature of Jamaica, he would mention the remark made by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse), on a former occasion, to the effect that the old House of Assembly, abolished in 1865, was "little better than a bear garden of shouting and screaming Negroes and Jews." To show how completely erroneous such an idea was, he (Captain Price) would quote what had been written on the subject by a gentleman who had a thorough acquaintance with the Island. In that account it was stated that out of the 47 Members of whom the House consisted at the time, no less than 37 were Whites, 34 had been educated in England, and a very large majority were men who had been appointed Justices of the Peace. Ten were Coloured men, and only three were Black. People in this country who had not lived in the East or West Indies were often very sensitive as to what they called a "touch of the tar-brush." And the late Mr. G. W. Gordon, of whom this House had heard so much, was generally set down as a sort of Oetewayo, when, in reality, he was only slightly coloured. It was absolutely untrue, therefore, to describe the Assembly as having been composed of Negroes; and as to the Jews, he would leave the hon. Member (Mr. Wodehouse) to discuss that matter with Gentlemen of that persuasion in this House. He (Captain Price) could not help remarking, however, that it was somewhat strange to hear from the Liberal Benches that we were to be guided in this manner by considerations of race and of creed. That might be one of the doctrines of esoteric Radicalism; but he ventured to think it was not to be found amongst the generally accepted principles of the Liberal Party. Then it had been said that the Island had voluntarily given up its Constitution. When, in a former debate on the Florence affairs, it had been said that the inhabitants had their Representative Constitution taken from them for reasons of State, the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had said—"No; it was surrendered." He (Captain Price) maintained that it had been taken from them by a coup d'état. It might be said that he ought to bring documentary evidence of such a charge; but it must be remembered that a coup d'état was only arranged and brought about by confidential despatches, not accessible to private Members; but he thought he could give the House conclusive evidence upon this point. He would refer to the words of Mr. Cardwell himself, in 1866, on the question of whether the Jamaica Government Bill should be a temporary or a permanent measure. Mr. Cardwell said that—"The view which he himself had always entertained was that a permanent measure was necessary for the welfare of Jamaica, and before the disturbances he was engaged in prosecuting inquiries, which he hoped would lead to the appointment of a Committee and consequent legislation."—(3 Hansard, [18:] 1177.)

Captain Price

What did that show? If it proved anything, it proved that long before the House of Assembly ever dreamed of making even a temporary surrender of its privileges, the Secretary of State had been in communication with the Governor of the Island, with a view to overthrowing the Constitution of the Colony, and of getting its affairs entirely into the hands of the Colonial Office. But there were despatches in the Parliamentary Blue Books which would throw additional light upon this. There was the despatch of Mr. Eyre to Mr. Cardwell, of April 19th, 1865, in which he strongly condemned Representative Institutions for Jamaica. His despatch of May 6th, in which he recommended Her Majesty's Government to abrogate the existing Constitution, and also a despatch from Mr. Cardwell to Mr. Eyre, dated July 7th, 1865, in which he said—

"If the majority of the House of Assembly could be induced to pass enactments in amendment of its own Constitution, Her Majesty's Government would be ready to give these enactments its most favourable consideration."

These despatches were written long before the matter was suggested to the House of Assembly, and conclusively point to the coup d'état he (Captain Price) had described, and to the fact that the Colonial Office were seeking to defraud the Island of Jamaica of its Constitutional privileges, so as to get the management of the Island into their own clutches. It was quite true, in some sense, that the Constitution of Jamaica was surrendered by the majority of the House of Assembly; but it was surrendered as a fortress might be surrendered, when starved out and incapable of further resistance. Let them look at the history of the question as known to Parliament. When the Bill was introduced, in 1866, it was represented as a temporary measure; and it passed its first and second readings and its Committee stage as a temporary measure. Mr. Cardwell, on every occasion, explained that it was necessary that the Bill should only be a temporary measure, as inquiries were to be made as to the strange circumstances of the self-abolition of the House of Assembly. On the Report of the Committee, Lord Norton—then Mr. Adderley—moved, in a very thin House, that the Bill be made permanent. Mr. Cardwell hesitated for some time, and coquetted, and, "vowing he would ne'er consent, consented," and the Constitution of Jamaica thus became permanently abolished without the slightest reference to the people of Jamaica, whose wishes had never been consulted, and without one syllable of that inquiry which Mr. Cardwell had declared to be necessary. What were the events which led up to this extraordinary act of political suicide? What had been occupying the attention of the Legislature immediately previous to this act? There were two important subjects that occupied the attention of the House of Assembly shortly before it was abolished. There was the great Tramway swindle, in which officers appointed by the Crown improperly used the public monies with the approval of the Government. For this the House of Assembly passed a Vote of Censure on the Governor, and proved themselves effective guardians of the public purse. Then arising out of this was the Esquent case, which would be found amongst the Parliamentary Papers. This was a case in which a Member of the Assembly, who held an office under the Crown, opposed the action of the Governor on the Tramway matter, and was called upon by the Governor to give up either his office or his seat. He declined, and the Assembly backed him up, treating the matter as a question of "Privilege." The House of Assembly insisted that the matter should be referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, and Sir Roundell Palmer and Sir Robert Collier gave the matter entirely in favour of the House of Assembly. These were the two matters, and the only two, which seriously engaged the attention of the Legislature during the three years immediately preceding the fall of the Constitution, and in both cases the popular Chamber had been proved to be absolutely in the right. Then the disturbances occurred, and, in a moment of panic and despair, the House of Assembly agreed, under strong pressure, to make a temporary surrender of their Privileges. He did not say that they were justified in doing that. On the contrary, he thought they were wrong. But there was some excuse. They had seen that, in all their struggles, the Representative of the Crown was backed up by the Colonial Office at home. All their representations were ignored. They saw one of their Members, who had been prominent in opposing the Governor, arrested, tried by a mock court martial, and hanged. No wonder that, in utter despair, they were induced to throw up the sponge and fall an easy prey to the machinations of the Colonial Office. Thus fell a Constitution which had existed for 200 years, and against which no definite charge had ever been made. He doubted whether, in modern history, there was any parallel to this extraordinary occurrence. Certainly Ireland, though it had sometimes been quoted as a case in point, offered no resemblance, for she was not deprived of representation. Perhaps the case of Denmark furnished the nearest parallel, when, in the 17th century, her House of Representatives, worn out by its struggles with the Nobles, voluntarily surrendered its privileges into the hands of the Crown. Surely, with such an example as that before them, the people of Jamaica should have foreseen that, in making even a temporary surrender of their privileges, they were abandoning liberty, and that, in striving to escape from the Scylla of bad government, they were only precipitating themselves into the Charybdis of a Government absolutely despotic and wholly unsympathetic. But what was the form of Government which had replaced the old Constitution? That would bring him to the third argument which he had to answer, and to a consideration of the Papers now on the Table of the House. The House was asked to believe that the Government which had existed in Jamaica for the last 17 years was the most appropriate one for the country, and had been completely successful. One of the charges against the old Constitution of Jamaica was, that the House of Assembly had increased the Debt of the Colony. Lord Russell, in 1866, gave as one reason for abolishing the House of Assembly that "it had very much increased the Debt of the Island." But what were the facts? In 1866, after 200 years of Constitutional Government, the Debt of the Island was about £600,000; whereas now, after 17 years of beneficent Crown management, the Debt of the Island had been nearly trebled. The Debt in 1866 was not a large one for a Colony of the importance of Jamaica. It was one well within the powers of the Colony to deal with, and the interest upon it had been paid to the day, and to the uttermost farthing. Let him examine the items of the present Debt. About £500,000 had been incurred in taking over the existing railway. He had nothing to say against that as an act of policy; but he objected strongly to the raising of such a loan without the consent of the taxpayers; and as to the way in which the loan was being dealt with, he would only point to the Report of the Royal Commissioners, who said—

"We consider that financial operations of this kind tend to impair the credit of a country."

Then something like £180,000 had been raised to pay for the Rio Cobre irrigation scheme, which everyone knew was an utter failure; and a sum little short of £300,000 for the Ewarton extension of the railway. As to this last item, if they took the dictum of the Commissioners, that the necessary charges to be defrayed before any profit could be looked for would amount to about 13 per cent on the capital monies raised, they would have to look for earnings of at least £39,000 a-year; but he had it on the best authority that the receipts could not be more than £5,000 yearly. Were the taxpayers of Jamaica to have such a burden imposed upon them without their consent? On this point he had asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies the other day if he would produce the estimate of receipts on which this work was undertaken; and the reply he got was that it was—

"Undesirable to produce Papers respecting the details of public works in a Colony, unless there has been some serious controversy on the subject calling for the interference of Parliament."

He (Captain Price) must be permitted to say that Questions of that kind were put, not as the outcome of serious controversy in the House of Commons, but to prevent serious controversies out-of-doors. He ventured to remind the hon. Member (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) that it was precisely the refusal to produce Estimates for examination in a similar case in Jamaica some years ago which led to that "serious controversy" between the Jamaica Legislature and the Crown on the Tramway Case—a controversy which shook the Constitution of Jamaica to its foundations, and brought about those State intrigues to which he had referred in the earlier part of his speech. But turning from questions of expenditure, which he hoped would be dealt with more fully by those who followed him, he would make one quotation from the Report of the Commissioners as to the education question. After stating that the expenditure in 1881 was six times as great as in 1861, though the number of children attending school, and the number of those able to read and write was only twice as great, they say—"This is a most unsatisfactory and discreditable state of affairs." But far more important than any of these matters was the discontented state of the people of the Island, in regard to which very ample evidence was forthcoming in the shape of reports of meetings which had been held in the Island, and Memorials which had been sent by the inhabitants to the Home Government from several parts of it. He believed there was not a town in Jamaica where public meetings had not been held upon the subject, and all were unanimous as to what they required. The House must remember that it was not a revival of the old Assembly that was being asked for, but an extension of the unofficial element in the Council. In November last he had the honour of presenting a deputation to Lord Derby, and his Lordship had promised that he would make some change in the form of Government, and he suggested that the unofficial Members should henceforth be elective instead of nominated. This was a step in the right direction, but a very short one, for the elected Representatives would still be in a hopeless minority, the official Members being of equal number, the Governor, as President, having two votes in addition. Lord Derby had also provided that, "as a general rule," the official Members should not be required to vote against the unofficial, providing that six of the latter were present and agreed. But the official Members were always at hand, whereas the elected Members had to come up from distant parts of the country, so that the latter would often be at a great disadvantage. Moreover, this majority of two to one, which Lord Derby required amongst the elected Members, in order to entitle their views to due consideration, would have to be increased to three to one in the case of the absence of a Member, and to as much as six to one in the event of the absence of two elected Members. The fact was, all power of legislating rested absolutely in the hands of the Crown. It was Poyning's Law over again. Lord Carlisle had been sent out to Jamaica in the 17th century to administer that law, by which the Assembly was required to pass, without alteration, laws which had been prepared by the Crown. They were to have the semblance of being Acts of the Legislature of Jamaica, when, in truth, they had been previously framed by the Ministry in this country. This was rejected by the Assembly, and the Imperial Parliament was forced to abandon it. And now, so long as the Acts passed by the Council should meet with the approval of the Governor for the time being, the pleasing fiction of their being passed by the Representatives of the people would be kept up; but, immediately that the Governor should choose to consider the measure unadvisable, he might suspend the "general rule," and, wheeling his official battalion into line, could outvote the Representatives, informing the Colonial Office of what he had done with the full certainty of being upheld by that Body. And now let him show the House how absurdly inadequate and unnatural the proposed system of representation must be as regards numbers. It was proposed to elect 9 Members, three for each "county;" but the division of the Island into "counties" was little known, and might be regarded as obsolete. The natural division of the Island was into "parishes," as they were there called, though they answered more nearly to the counties at home, some of these so-called "parishes" being as large as Bedfordshire or Huntingdon. Ask a Negro of average intelligence what county he belonged to, and he would not be able to tell you; but ask him what parish, and he would tell you at once. For many reasons it would be far better to apportion the Representatives according to parishes, or "districts" as they ought to be called; and he hoped the Government would see their way to granting the wishes of the people—namely, to have one Member for each district, with an additional one for the important City of Kingston, making 15 in all. Even then, the proportion of representation would be smaller than was allowed to many Colonies of less importance, and which had not been accustomed to Representative Institutions. Take, for instance, West Australia, with a population of only 30,000. The number of elected Members there was 14, as against 6 official and 4 nominated Members. In Natal, with a much smaller population than Jamaica, there were 23 elected Members, as against 7 official, and the same proportion existed in many other Colonies. He might be told that the movement in Jamaica was not bonâ fide, but was only got up among a certain class in the Island. That he denied most emphatically. He would ask the House to consider that the 9 Gentlemen who had been appointed unofficial Members of the Assembly, and who were appointed by the Governor, must be considered Gentlemen of considerable intelligence, integrity, and patriotism. They had unanimously resigned their office, because they contended they had no power whatever of representing the people of Jamaica, and because they would not be parties to such a sham. The movement was going on in every corner of Jamaica, and if there had been any unreasonable or intemperate representations made, as had been alleged, he asked Her Majesty's Government to treat them as the froth which invariably accompanied every ebullition of popular feeling, and, sweeping this lightly on one side, to look down into the clearer depths of this agitation, in order to discern there what were the real causes of those grievances of which Jamaica now complained. If they would do that he felt assured that they would see the necessity of restoring to the people such a control over their own affairs as would prevent a recurrence of those baneful results which had been brought about by Crown Government. What those results were he would sum up in half-a-dozen words, and then his task that evening was done. The results were these—the present form of Government in Jamaica had nearly trebled the Debt of the Colony; had enormously increased the public expenditure; had made a hash of the question of public education; had shaken the credit of the Colony, and had spread broadcast throughout the Island the gravest dissatisfaction. That was the case he had to lay before the Government, and which he asked them to meet; and the burden of proof lay upon the Government to prove that the people of Jamaica were not fit to have Representative Institutions. It now only remained for him to apologize to the House for having occupied so much of its time, and to thank the House sincerely for its patient attention. He could not hope to have interested many in this question. The subject was a dry one, and there were but few who, in these days, were interested in the affairs of Jamaica. It was but a little Island in a distant sea; but it was an Island whose history recalled to them memories of great events connected with the discovery, the growth, and the development of the Western World. It was a Colony which had taken no small part in developing the wealth and the greatness of this Empire. Its people for 200 years had enjoyed the same Constitutional privileges as ourselves. Of these they had been wrongfully deprived. They now cried aloud to us for justice. He asked the House of Commons not to turn a deaf ear to the passionate prayer of these people—not to crush out aspirations which were ennobling, and which were the very birthright of every British citizen; but to restore to them that control over their own local and financial affairs which could alone be adequately exercised by the chosen Representatives of a free and enlightened people.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON: Sir, at this late hour of the night, and after the exhaustive speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Devonport (Captain Price), I shall not detain the House at any great length. I shall not touch the historical—I had almost said, the pre-historical—part of the question. I will simply remind the House that for two centuries, down to 1865, Jamaica had possessed and enjoyed the unspeakable benefit of Representative Government. Down to that time she had been accustomed to manage her own local affairs, to make her own laws, to raise and appropriate her Revenue in accordance with the views and the wishes of her people, expressed through their elected Representatives in the House of Assembly. In the panic which arose out of the Insurrection of 1865, she was induced to part with her ancient Constitution. Seizing the occasion of the panic, the Governor (Mr. Eyre) appealed to the House of Assembly. He called upon them, in order to avert “a mighty danger which threatened the land," to "immolate themselves on the altar of patriotism." Under the influence—I may say the pressure—brought to bear upon them by the Governor, the House of Assembly surrendered their ancient Constitution. This was done without any appeal to the electors, and, as I have always considered, without any legal Constitutional right. The House of Assembly, which was elected for the purpose of making laws for the government of the country, had no right, in my judgment, without a special appeal to the people, to put an end to its existence. In doing so, however, the House was by no means unanimous. It was only after much discussion that the act of self-annihilation was carried by a majority. I have gone into this matter, because it has been objected that the Assembly, having surrendered the old Constitution, are, to use the words of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Captain Price), "out of Court;" that Jamaica has no right now to ask for the restoration of what has been surrendered by her own Representatives. I have shown how this was done, and what led to it. But it is only due to the late Assembly to state that, in surrendering the old Constitution, they had no idea of parting with the right of self-government. When they passed the Bill putting an end to the old Constitution, they proposed another Representative Institution in its place. The old system of government had become too elaborate and too complicated for the then condition of the country; and many of the most intelligent of its inhabitants, for many years prior to 1865, had been of opinion that a simpler machinery, still representative, would be preferable. Accordingly—and I may say it was with this object in view—that the House of Assembly passed the Bill which has been mentioned, at the same time, as I have said, proposing a new and a small Representative Council. Her Majesty's Government refused to sanction the new proposal, and, instead, established the system of Crown Government, "pure and simple," which has prevailed to the present time. From the moment of its establishment the people have protested against it, and from time to time since they have memorialized the Government, praying for the restoration of Representative Institutions. These appeals have not succeeded, until necessity has brought about the modification lately proposed. Let us now see what the system of Crown Government has been, and what are its results. It was said that the affairs of Jamaica had been so grossly mismanaged by the old House of Assembly that a strong Government had become necessary, in order to save the country, especially its finances, from ruin. With the permission of the House, I will test for a moment or two this statement. Under Crown Government, a Governor was sent out with a salary of £7,000 a-year, and other officials receiving salaries, considered by the Royal Commissioners lately sent to investigate the matter of expenditure, in many instances too high. There was to be a Legislative Council composed of these officials and nine unofficial Members nominated by the Governor. The official Members had, and could possibly have, no knowledge whatever of the country, or its requirements. They had no stake or interest in it, no concern in its welfare. Their connection with it and its inhabitants was purely official. Yet these gentlemen, drawing large salaries from the hard earnings of an impoverished community, were so placed as to over-ride the nine unofficial Members, who were gentlemen belonging to the country, having a knowledge of its people and of their wants, and whose presence in the Council was intended as a means of informing and guiding the official Members in matters of legislation, and of finance especially. With such discordant elements, differences of opinion were sure to arise between the Governor and his official staff on the one hand, and the unofficial Members on the other. Conflicts of this kind from time to time did arise. The Governor presided at the Council, and, as I have been told, sat in great state on a daïs wearing his Windsor uniform and a cocked hat on his head; and at the conclusion of a debate he would reply all round, knocking down the arguments of the unofficial Members like "nine pins." Of course, the House will see how impossible it was that such a system could long work, especially in a community accustomed to self-government. No man of spirit would consent to retain a seat in a Council so constituted, and, so to speak, so manipulated. The House will remember the case of the Florence, which was discussed last Session. The case of the Florence brought matters to an issue. The unofficial Members refused to sanction the Vote which the Governor asked for, in order to pay, out of the taxation of the people, for the errors and blunders of the Government, over whose Members they had no kind of control. The consequence was a complete deadlock. Persons holding situations under the Government were appointed to the Council upon the distinct undertaking that they were to support the Vote on account of the Florence. The Vote was carried accordingly, and the unofficial Members, in a body, resigned. In such a state of things the Government could not be carried on. It was impossible to persist in a system so repugnant to the feelings, the habits, and traditions of the country, and a modification of the Constitution is about to take place. But, before I go into the subject, I wish to say a word upon the question of finance. It has been said that under the old Constitution the finances had been greatly mismanaged. Let us see what has been done in this respect by Crown Government. I had the honour, the Session before last, to move for a Return of the Revenue of Jamaica, including Ways and Means, and the Expenditure for the 15 years prior to 1865, and for the 15 years since under Crown Government. This is the result. The Expenditure for the 15 years under Crown Government exceeds by £2,500,000 and upwards the Expenditure of the previous 15 years under the old system; and for the last two years there have been deficits, and another is expected in the current year. In 1865 the Public Debt was £607,739. It is now £1,132,710. And what is there to show for this vast increase of Expenditure and of Debt? It will be said that there have been railways and other public works. I do not deny the usefulness of some of these; but even here the Expenditure has not been justified by the results. Works have been undertaken which were beyond the means of the Colony, and which, in its present condition, and for a long time, I fear, will not be self-paying. Take the case of the railways. From 1879 to 1882 no less a sum than £540,000 has been expended on railways. The House would naturally conclude that there has been a considerable amount of railway communication established. As a matter of fact, the whole railways of the country consist of about 29 miles, and it is proposed to lay down some 20 miles more. Yet £540,000 is the expenditure for railways. How such a sum could have been incurred I am at a loss to understand. Again, the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Price) has mentioned the Rio Cobre Waterworks, a good undertaking if it had paid, but it has not. The Commissioners report it as a failure. Yet these works have cost £210,800 from 1869 to 1879; and since that year £7,000 more for repairs. I could go through other items in the Public Accounts with similar results; but I will not weary the House any further with figures. The House sees the enormous increase of expenditure in a very short time under Crown Government, and if hon. Members will take the trouble to examine the Report of the Commissioners, they will see how unjustifiable much of this expenditure has been. The increase of population cannot account for it. In the last 20 years that increase has reached about 150,000, or a little over. Such an increase, I say, can in no way account for such an excess of expenditure. As in matters of finance, so in general legislation. The District Courts were among the new establishments under Crown Government. The Commissioners condemn them as a failure and as an extravagance as well. In point of fact, the whole system pursued since 1865 shows the utter absence of knowledge of the country and of sympathy with its people on the part of those who have been sent to govern it. The gentlemen who have been sent out have been persons whose lives have been spent in official routine elsewhere. They have brought with them a mere official eye to bear upon public affairs, and a determination to carry out a particular policy, utterly regardless of the feelings of the country. A Governor goes out, and, before he has been a fortnight in the place, he reports that the country is not ripe for Representative Institutions. What on earth could he know or have learnt of the place, in one short fortnight, to justify him in making such a Report? He had, no doubt, heard it from some official who had been there a little longer. In this way the Colonial Office is misled, and kept in ignorance of the true state of the Colony. This system of government by experts is new to Jamaica; and, depend upon it, it will not succeed. But it will be said that the state of things will be changed by the new scheme. I have no doubt whatever—and I am glad of this opportunity to say it publicly—that I believe that it is Lord Derby's wish and intention to act justly, even generously, towards the people of Jamaica; and I can well understand how it is that he should move cautiously in the changes he proposes, seeing that the representative system has been in abeyance for 17 years. Time, no doubt, will be required to test the working of a Representative Council under these circumstances, and with a franchise entirely new and much extended beyond the old franchise. At the same time, I must observe that self-government is not new to Jamaica. The people have been accustomed to it. The great bulk of the present population have lived under it, and its traditions remain to all. Self-government, therefore, would not be a mere experiment; and if it is to be restored at all, I think it may safely be done now and completely, not by halves. Either the people are to be trusted or they are not. If they are worthy of trust, then, I say, trust them completely. Let the representation you propose to give them be a reality. What will the new scheme do? Will it give a real representation? It simply converts the unofficial element of the Council, who were formerly nominated by the Governor, into Members elected by the people. They are still to be in a minority. The official element is still to prevail. It is true that some concession is to be given to the representative Members in matters of finance, and that in general legislation the Governor is instructed to treat them with consideration. Yet, after all, the power of the Crown remains in the Governor and the official element. So long as there is no vital question, and the representative Members behave themselves in a becoming manner—for this is really what it amounts to—they are to be considered; but woe be unto them if they should take a strong view upon a vital question of Imperial policy. Englishmen though they be, Representatives of the people, of their wishes and their interests, which they have been sent to enforce and to watch over, they are to be over-ridden, as before, under Crown Government. This for a time might not happen. Under a Governor like Sir Henry Norman—who, I believe, from all I have heard, will exercise a wise discretion and a conciliatory spirit—difficulties might not arise; but who can speak for his Successor, or for the Successor of the noble Earl now at the head of the Colonial Office? Of this there is no manner of doubt—the people of Jamaica have received the new scheme with intense disappointment. They have had experience of Crown Government, and they know how a Council, composed as the new one is to be, is likely to work. From one end of the country to the other, and among all classes of the community—Whites, Coloured, Blacks, planters, merchants, traders, peasant proprietors, and others—the Island has been ringing with one loud protest of disappointment since the announcement of the new scheme. At one meeting, among the speakers were four Black men—peasant proprietors—and everywhere, as I have said, men of every class and complexion are protesting against the new scheme. Among other things, they protest against the Governor's presence in the Council. Under the late system, it was bad enough that he should be in conflict with his own nominees. Under the new scheme, if differences arise, he will be in conflict with the people themselves, through their Representatives. Surely it is not wise to place the Queen's Representative in such a position. I would suggest that the Council should appoint their own President, and that the Governor should be kept free from political discussions, and that the right of veto should be reserved to him. If the new scheme is to have a fair trial, I believe this to be a vital point. The Governor should not be brought into the Council to overawe them by his presence, or be made to assume the character of a public debater. The people of Jamaica have never been accustomed to this sort of thing. It lowers the Governor in public respect, and does not, and cannot, advance the interests of good government. Sir, I shall no longer detain the House. I have endeavoured to lay before it, to some extent, the grievances of a country which is one of the most ancient and most loyal, as it was formerly one of the most valuable, Possessions of the British Crown. Its prosperity has, for a long time, passed away. For many years its people have suffered under vicissitudes for which they were in no way answerable. Imperial legislation brought about suddenly a social transition which entailed widespread misfortune. Still, they have borne up, striving to do their best under the new conditions. I believe that prosperity is yet in store for them; but it will largely depend upon the wisdom displayed at head-quarters here whether, and for how long, better times shall be delayed. I undertake to say that there are no people under the sun who might be more easily governed than the people of Jamaica. They are a warm-hearted, generous people; but they love freedom, and they value the exercise of it. They are devotedly attached to the Mother Country, and are proud of being born and of living under the British Flag. When a Jamaica man proposes to visit England, he talks not of going to England, but of going "home." They send their children to this country for education, and they return with a cultured intelligence, which fits them for the various avocations of life. I have known men in Jamaica—coloured men, too—whose abilities and attainments would have done honour to any station in this country. There are such men there now. England must not turn a deaf ear to their appeals. She has not always dealt wisely or fairly by her Colonies. At one time she has spoilt and caressed them; at another she has treated them somewhat like a step-mother. She has found out her mistake. Let her not repeat it now. I have spoken of the people of Jamaica as I know them from long personal knowledge. It is the land of my birth; and although I have not now any pecuniary interests there, I feel, and shall always feel, a deep interest in her welfare, and in the well-being of her inhabitants. I trust that this discussion will lead Her Majesty's Government to reconsider the position they have taken; and if they do not see their way at the present time to give that complete representation which the people of Jamaica ask for, and to which I think they are entitled, I hope they will hold out some hope of it hereafter; and, in the meantime, announce such modifications of their new scheme as will render it less objectionable and more likely to conciliate the disappointment which it has occasioned.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he was not prepared for the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Captain Price) entering into a justification of the late House of Assembly; and he thought that, perhaps, it was fortunate he was not prepared, because, otherwise, he should have thought it his duty to detain the House by statements of a detailed character. The hon. and gallant Member opposite, and other hon. Members, had pointed out that the House of Assembly and Representative Government had lasted over 200 years, and that during that time there had only been three crises. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) would point out that, no doubt, until slavery was abolished in Jamaica, their Representative Government was a very simple affair. It was purely a White oligarchy, and, therefore, there was no reason why difficulties or conflicts should arise. The difficulties began when the slaves were emancipated in 1839. Then came the first real embarrassments in the Island. They were brought about very much by the anger of the planters at that emancipation, and their refusal, in effect, to accept offers of money to promote emigration into the Island. Then there was the crisis in 1854, and what did that arise from? That arose from anger on the part of the Assembly because England, the Mother Country, had got rid of the differential duties, and the crisis then was very severe; and, although he did not want to argue this point, he would remind the House that the action of the House of Assembly on that occasion struck most directly at the credit of the Island. If they referred to the Papers on the subject there would be found an indictment made by the Governor, in which he said the people were proposing almost to repudiate their obligations under statute, for the payment of their debt, and that it was only by the action of the Council, who refused to pass the Bill sent up to them, that the discredit of that was avoided. It was because of the action of the House of Assembly, in 1854, that the power of initiating Money Votes was taken away from them. Then the last crisis was in 1866. He would not argue with his hon. and gallant Friend as to whether the surrender was unanimous or not on the part of the House of Assembly; but his impression was that the surrender was unanimous. At any rate, when hon. Members talked about the success of the late Assembly, they ought to lay the whole state of the case before the House; but hon. Members who had spoken that night had taken good care not to inform the House that the House of Assembly, which they seemed to consider a model that should be imitated in the new arrangements, was the result of the election by an electoral roll, which, in 1866, had a total of only 1,700 souls out of a population of over 450,000; while some Members of that House represented only four, or five, or 10 voters. That was not a model, he thought, that anyone could wish to follow. Without taking up time and arguing the matter, he must say that anybody who had studied the history of Jamaica from the emancipation in 1839 until the collapse of the House of Assembly in 1866 must see that the old system had broken down completely, and that the final collapse was the direct result of years of erroneous legislation, reckless jobbery and bribery, and the impossibility of obtaining the services of a sufficient number of competent and independent men as Members of the Assembly. That last difficulty had been one of the great difficulties of the old Assembly, and had been the cause of waste of time, of squabbling and bickerings; and that was really the indictment to be brought against the old House of Assembly; and the inhabitants of Jamaica had felt absolutely convinced of its justice, or they would not have surrendered as they did. The Black population had absolutely no interest whatever in the old House of Assembly; and, as the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) had said, during its last three years there was not a single Black man in the Assembly, although at one time there had been three. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Captain Price) had said these men were not Black, but Coloured men; but he (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) ventured to assert that the Coloured men in Jamaica were as distinct and separate in interest and sympathy from the Black population as the White people were. In fact, he would go further, and say that the Coloured population were further removed than the White in feeling and in sympathy from the Black population. He would draw attention to the figures on this point, because nobody could judge of the question unless he was in possession of those figures. The population of Jamaica at the present day was 580,000 in round numbers. Of these, 14,400 only were White, and 110,000 were Coloured; while the Black population numbered nearly 450,000. In 1861, when the last Census before the surrender of the Constitution was taken, the White population was 13,800, the Coloured population was 81,000, and the Black population 346,000. Those figures showed that while the increase of population during the last 20 years had been only 4 per cent among the White population, it had been nearly 30 per cent among the Black population. Whenever hon. Members came forward and asked for the restoration of the old system, there had always been associated with that demand the old high property qualification for elected Members. [Mr. Serjeant Simon: Not necessarily.] On that point he should like his hon. and learned Friend, before denying it, to communicate with his friends in Jamaica. Such a high property qualification would exclude anything like Black representation in the Assembly. As to the general question, it must be remembered that the result of establishing a high franchise in Jamaica would be that political power would be at once handed over to a particular class; while, on the other hand, if the franchise were made low, that would let in the agitator, and would lead to the disturbance of all social and industrial interests, bribery and jobbery, and, in the end, to riot and bloodshed. As to the want of education, he would point out that some of the items which had led to increased expenditure since 1866 were items which he might boast of. One of these items was education, which had risen from only £3,000 in 1864 to £26,000 in 1880. [Captain Price: With what result?] With a great result; for the Negro population had risen greatly in the social scale. No doubt, faults in the system had been discovered; but Inspectors were not sent to praise a system. They did not, however, say that good work had not been done; and he must confess that he considered the Report of the Commission on the Island very satisfactory. The Commission were sent out as critics, to put their hands on weak points. Another item of increased expenditure was that for immigration; and public works and railways were other elements. He did not deny that there had been increased expenditure, but there had been a large increase of population; and, at the same time, the income had greatly risen. The hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury had referred to there having been deficits during the period of Crown Government; but he (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) had only been able to find two or three years of deficit. Up to the time of the assumption by the Crown of the Government of the Island, he thought it would be found that a deficit was always the order of the day, and that the Expenditure always exceeded the Revenue. As to the Debt, no doubt there was an increase in that; but that was owing to the works of which he had spoken, and the Debt in Jamaica was by no means larger in proportion than the Debts of many of the surrounding countries. When the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite talked of the credit of the Island having gone down under Crown Administration, he did not know what the test of credit was. He was not a mercantile man, nor a man who had influence in the City; but he had always been told that the rate at which money could be borrowed was the real test of credit; and, if that were so, he must inform his hon. Friends that the credit of the Island—that credit which existed in the money market—was better under Crown Administration than it was before, and the last Government Railway Debentures were issued at 4 per cent. He would now leave the subject of the defence of the Crown Government, or the attack upon the old state of things, because, as his hon. and learned Friend behind him had acknowledged, the Colonial Office had come to the decision that a change must be made. Now, it must be obvious to everybody who considered the history and antecedents of Jamaica, with its population of different races, different sympathies, and different interests, that what Jamaica wanted could be summed up by saying that it ought to have a form of Government in which the Crown would in ultimate resort remain supreme. There was too much risk of collision between classes—too much risk of excitement and agitation—to allow it to be arranged that the Crown should not be supreme in the last resort. But there ought to be a strong Government for all classes and interests, and that Government should have the confidence of the entire community. Now, he denied that the old Government of Jamaica—the Government which ceased in 1866—had the confidence of the entire community. He denied that totally, and he declared, emphatically, that that Government had not the confidence of the great masses of the people of the Island. Under these circumstances, the Secretary of State had proposed, and was about to put into the form of an Order in Council, a new form of Government for Jamaica. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) would ask, was that new form of Government a sham, or was it not? He would, in a very few words, state to the House what were the provisions for this new form of Government; and he thought hon. Gentlemen would come to the conclusion that what was proposed was not a sham, but a real bond fide extension, in the words of the Motion on the Paper—

“To the people of Jamaica, of a material share in the management of their own local and financial affairs.”

First of all, he would take the nominated portion of the Council, which would partly consist of ex officio Members, who, by virtue of their office, would be Members of the Council. One of these would be the senior military officer in command, and he was not an official who would necessarily be at the bidding and order of the Governor. Indeed, the senior military officer was a thoroughly independent man, and just as likely to take a view contrary to that of the Government as favourable to it. There would be 4 ex officio Members, and then there would also be certain other nominated Members. These nominated Members were not to exceed 9 in number, at the option of the Governor; and he might say that Sir Henry Norman, than whom a better man could hardly be found, was naturally anxious to give the largest possible interpretation to the instructions which the Government gave him, and he was determined not to appoint more than 6 official Members at first, and it was hoped that it would never be necessary to appoint more. Sir Henry Norman was authorized to appoint 9; but he was not going to appoint more than 6. There would be, it was true, 7 at first; but that was because there was a person already there who would be retained; but when a vacancy took place it would not be filled up; and, therefore, there would in future be not more than 6, so as to insure that there should not be a majority of official Members. The nominated Members would form the official side, and then there would be the elected side. There would be 9 elected Members, and the franchise would be a much lower one than under the old form. The franchise had been recommended to the Government by the Royal Commissioners—all of them residents in Jamaica—and the franchise which had been adopted on their recommendation was one that would give about 15,000 electors.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, continuing his remarks, said, the 9 elected Members would be chosen by an electorate of 15,000. They would not be elected by counties. His hon. and learned Friend behind him had amused himself by laughing at the geographical knowledge of the Colonial Office for adopting counties; but it was not they, but the Royal and Resident Commissioners, who had adopted election by counties. However, the Government had overruled that, and agreed that it would not be satisfactory to take counties, the population of which was so unequally distributed that it would not be at all a good arrangement. Nine districts would be taken without breaking up any parishes—in some cases they would be single parishes—and each of these nine districts would send one Member. He now came to the important matter of the powers of these elected Members. It would be embodied in the Order in Council, and not merely confined to the instructions given to the Governor, that whenever 6 of the elected Members should be united in opposing the passing of any law or Resolution affecting taxation or finance, they should have their way, and the official majority should not be employed to overpower them, except in any case where the Governor might consider and declare that the matter was of paramount importance to public or Imperial interests, and might so report to the Home Government. The same rule would apply to Ordinances apart from finance—the Governor would be directed by instructions, not embodied in the Order in Council, but contained in a document sent side by side with it, and kept on record that wherever the elected Members were united on a question of legislation, the official Members should not be employed to form an adverse majority unless he felt himself in a position to come forward and publicly state that it was a matter of absolute Imperial and paramount public importance. Now, that was not a sham concession; it was a real and vital concession, because nobody could pretend for one moment that the Secretary of State would send out to Jamaica, or that a man of the character of the Governor would desire to carry out an arbitrary act by defining a matter of genuine local concern only as a matter of paramount public importance. If such a thing were ever to be attempted, this House would take care that such an attempt was not successful. The fact of having to go through such a form—of having to make a declaration of this sort—was absolutely a check upon the Governor. It was clear that the Governor would not use the power of putting in operation the official vote in a matter where he had to make so solemn a declaration, unless he felt himself absolutely compelled by circumstances to do so. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) believed he was right in asserting that this scheme formed a distinct move in the direction of restoring control over their own affairs to the people of Jamaica. It would be a very great mistake to take too large and sudden a step all at once; and he believed it would also be a very great mistake at present to enlarge the numbers, as had been suggested by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite. If the people of the Island had a majority in the elected Members, there was no good to be got by increasing the number to 14; whereas the experience of former periods had shown the difficulty of finding efficient and proper men to fill the places. He cordially agreed with the eloquent peroration of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Serjeant Simon), that the people of Jamaica had proved their loyalty on many occasions, and he only hoped that they would now prove their common sense, which had also been proved already in many cases, and would see that this was a scheme which, if honestly worked, as it would be, would give them, for the present, a very considerable and a very important advance in the control and management of their own local affairs.

MR. WODEHOUSE said, that as the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite had made a pointed reference to him, he hoped he might be allowed to contribute a few words to the discussion. So far was he from agreeing with those who condemned the Government for the insufficiency of their concessions to the demands of the Jamaica Memorialists, that he was more inclined to wish that the Government had been somewhat less yielding to those demands. The substitution of elected Members of the Legislative Council for nominees of the Crown had been spoken of as an insignificant and unsubstantial concession; but it was the grant to Jamaica of a privilege not possessed by Colonies of such importance as Ceylon, Hong Kong, the Mauritius, the Straits Settlements, and Trinidad. Trinidad, which had always been a pure Crown Colony, was second to none among the West Indian Colonies for good government, progress, and general contentment. If, then, Trinidad, Ceylon, and the other Colonies which he had named could flourish and be content as Crown Colonies, why should not Jamaica? To listen to some of the speeches which had been delivered that night about the ancient Representative Institutions of Jamaica, one might suppose that there was some innate superiority in the people of that Colony; but those Representative Institutions were a mere accident of history. He would explain what he meant. During the 17th and 18th centuries, down to the time of the War of American Independence, England freely granted Representative Institutions to all her Colonies, even to the smallest of them. So long as she retained a strict monopoly of their trade, she granted them the fullest measure of self-government, and was indifferent to the cruelties they practised on aboriginal races. But after the War of American Independence, and when the conscience of England had been awakened about the treatment of barbarous races, she was no longer willing to leave such large powers in the hands of Colonists. Jamaica, being a Colony of ancient foundation, acquired her complete Representative Institutions as a matter of course, in common with much smaller Colonies. The existence, therefore, of ancient Representative Institutions was no proof of superiority. The old Colonies were in no degree better than our more recent acquisitions, such as Ceylon and Trinidad. A great deal had been said in condemnation of Crown Government, and it had been unfavourably contrasted with the former Government of Jamaica; but with regard to that ancient Constitution, which disappeared in 1866, he would only ask hon. Members to read the debates which took place in both Houses of Parliament on the Jamaica Government Bill of 1866. Not a voice was lifted in any quarter of either House of Parliament to utter a single friendly word for that Constitution—from Whig and Tory alike there was an unanimous chorus of unmitigated condemnation. Secretaries of State and ex-Secretaries and private Members, who knew the West Indies well, united to declare that the Constitution had lived too long, because it had only lived to be the curse and bane of the Colony, and that the only act of real wisdom which illuminated its long career was the act by which it put an end to its own mischievous existence. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite had referred to some remarks of his (Mr. Wodehouse) as to the composition of the Jamaica House of Assembly previous to its extinction. If he had unwittingly exaggerated the extent to which that House was composed of Black or Coloured men, he regretted his error; but, whatever might have been the predominant hue and complexion of its Members, that Assembly bore an evil name throughout the West Indies for disorder and gross mismanagement of Public Business. However, it might be said that there was no question now of restoring the old Constitution, and that all that was asked for was such an increase of the elective element in the Council as would give them a majority over the official element. He trusted that no such concession would be made. Let them suffer the elected Members to have a majority in the Council, and then, while they would leave them free from all real responsibility as to the consequences of the votes they might give, they would arm them with the power of obstructing and paralyzing the whole administration of the Island. Of all Colonial Constitutions, the worst and most prolific of trouble were those intermediate Constitutions, which had neither the strength of pure Crown Institutions, nor of what was called Responsible Government—that was, Constitutions in which controlling power was dissociated from true responsibility. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) had said, a little while ago, that if the new scheme of Government was found on trial to give an inadequate measure of control to the popular element in the Legislature, there would be no reluctance in the Colonial Office to reconsider it; and he added that it was of the utmost importance that, in the meantime, all parties combine to give the scheme a fair trial. But when the hon. Gentleman himself thus held out the expectation of readiness on his part to re-open the question, he might rest assured that the scheme would not have a fair trial. Similar language had been addressed to the Transvaal Boers, in regard to the Pretoria Convention, when it first came into operation, and the House knew what sort of a trial that Convention had had, and what its fate had been. He (Mr. Wodehouse) anticipated a continuance of what was called “Constitutional agitation” in Jamaica; and, for his own part, he believed that there was no Colony in which the Government should make concessions to agitation with more care and circumspection than in the Colony of Jamaica. Agitation was an old story there; and he hoped the Government would be slow to surrender an effective control over the affairs of the Island. Lord Derby had told a deputation introduced to him by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Captain Price) that the proximity of Jamaica to the United States was a reason why stringent Imperial control over the Island should be only provisional and transitory; but he (Mr. Wodehouse) should have thought that the proximity of the United States rather pointed to an opposite conclusion. Jamaica was so situated that it might easily become the scene, or the occasion, of international complications; and when the Canal through the Isthmus of Panama was constructed, the importance of the geographical position of the Island would be greater than it was at the present time. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite had spoken of the patriotism of the unofficial Members of the Council who had resigned their offices in connection with the Florence case. He (Mr. Wodehouse) believed that one of those gentlemen, Mr. Michael Solomon, was in this country the year before last; and on his way home through the United States he was reported to have expressed to New York journalists the opinion that the real solution of the troubles of Jamaica was to be found in the annexation of the Island to the United States. He (Mr. Wodehouse) could not pretend to vouch for the accuracy and authenticity of that statement, which he had read in The Pall Mall Gazette; but if it were correct, the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite might form his own estimate of the depth and fervour of the Imperial patriotism of the gentleman in question. As he had said, he did not vouch for the authenticity of the report; but, be that as it might, he maintained that, whether they looked at the past, the present, or the future of Jamaica, there was every reason why Her Majesty's Government should not be too ready to yield to the clamour of agitation there, and why the House should not hastily approve such views as those which had been advanced by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he asked the indulgence of the House while he said a word in defence of an absent man. [Cries of “No, no!” and “Hear, hear!”] He had no right to address the House again, and could only do it by the indulgence of hon. Members. A most serious charge had been made against a gentleman whom he had the honour to know—Mr. Michael Solomon. When that gentleman was in England two years ago, which was the time referred to, he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) had a conversation with him respecting Representative Government in Jamaica; and, speaking of the franchise, he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) remarked—“You will be obliged to have a large and a widely extended franchise; what do you say to that?” In reply, Mr. Solomon made this observation. He said—“Every shilling I have in the world is in Jamaica. I would risk all, and have universal suffrage, rather than live under such a system as the present.” Mr. Solomon, then, he thought, was not the kind of man who would be likely to express such a sentiment as that which had just been attributed to him,

Mr. W. REDMOND said, he did not wish to prolong the discussion at that hour of the night; and he merely rose for the purpose of saying that he was extremely sorry that the Forms and Regulations of the House would not allow a Division to be taken on a Motion advanced by the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price); because, if a Division could have been taken, it would have afforded him (Mr. Redmond), and many hon. Members who sat near him in that quarter of the House, much pleasure to have gone into the Division Lobby and supported the Resolution of which Notice had been given. They would have done so, because this question was one that involved the principle of self-government, the principle he (Mr. Redmond) and hon. Gentlemen with whom he sat were charged to support, not only in the case of their own country, but in the case of people all over the world who were asking that right. What was the state of the case as to Jamaica? Why, some 17 years ago the Representative Government of that Colony was abolished. The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) had made a very strong point of the fact that the Representative Assembly of Jamaica was abolished by the almost unanimous vote of that Assembly itself. But the hon. Gentleman had completely nullified that statement by going on to say distinctly that that Assembly was one which did not possess the confidence of the people of Jamaica; and he had also gone on to show that the old Body, which abolished itself by its own vote, did not, as a matter of fact, represent the people of Jamaica, but merely some 1,700 voters. The House therefore saw that, in abolishing itself, the Assembly was not speaking on behalf of Jamaica, but simply on behalf of some 1,700 people who had the right of voting for the Assembly. That brought them to the conclusion that the majority of the people of Jamaica had never surrendered the right which had been theirs to some extent in the past, and which ought to be theirs again—namely, the right of self-government and the guiding of the destinies of their own country. The hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. Wodehouse) seemed to have a decided objection to any Black or Coloured persons occupying a position in any Legislative Assembly. Well, in many respects, Black people were defective; but, at any rate, they were not defective in the love of liberty—a quality which appeared to be not yet born in the breast of the hon. Gentleman.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at half after One o'clock till Monday next.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—RELIEF OF BERBER.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he wished to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which he had given him private Notice. The Question was as to the correctness of a Reuter's telegram, dated Cairo, April 26, 8 P.M., which he (the Earl of Galloway) had seen in The Observer of yesterday, and in that morning's papers, to the effect that the reply of the British Government had been received to the proposal to send an expedition for the relief of Berber, and stating that such an expedition would not be possible at the present time, and could not, in fact, start for four months hence; that this decision had been communicated to Hussein Pasha Kalifa, Governor of Berber; and, at the same time, he had been told that he might withdraw from the town if he was in a position to do so. If that telegram were correct, would the noble Earl have any objection to state to the House what ground there was for saying that such an expedition was deemed by the Government to be impossible?

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, it would be very inconvenient to answer the Question until the Government had received official intimation of the receipt of the reply. He hoped, therefore, that the noble Earl would postpone the Question.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he would postpone the Question until tomorrow.

NAVY — LIEUTENANTS OF OVER TEN YEARS' SENIORITY—HALF-PAY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF BELMORE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, with reference to the promised increase of pay to the lieutenants of the Royal Navy of ten years' standing and upwards, How it is proposed to extend the benefit to those officers when on half-pay? He thought he might say, on behalf of those whose cause he had advocated, that the increase promised by the Admiralty to these officers when on full pay was substantial, and, as far as it went, satisfactory. He hoped that if the noble Earl held his present Office much longer, he would see his way, before he left it, to extend the benefit to lieutenants of eight years' standing and upwards, who ranked as field officers.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK, in reply, said, that lieutenants of over 10 years' seniority who had seven years' service in that rank, three of which had been at sea, would be entitled to the highest rate of half-pay—namely 8s. 6d. a-day. He would add that that rate was the same as that allowed to Commanders, with the exception of the first 100 on the list.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—BALTINGLASS UNION.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, as President of the Local Government Board (Ireland), a charge of misconduct on the part of Mr. Dagg, Returning Officer, and George Driver, Poor Rate Collector, has been brought under his notice, in regard to the election of a Poor Law Guardian for the electoral division of Rathdangan, in the union of Baltinglass; whether the complainants have applied to the Local Government Board for a sworn investigation; and, whether their application will be complied with?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Local Government Board think it necessary that a sworn inquiry should be held in this case to investigate complaints made both by the Guardian returned and by the defeated candidate. The inquiry will be held on the 7th May.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE OXFORD COUNTY COURT—THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can now make any further personal explanation on the subject of the claim against him for flowers supplied during the Oxford Election; or, whether he would prefer that Notice should be given of a Question on the matter?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, if the House desires a personal explanation on a matter of this kind, and thinks it consistent with the dignity of Parliament to receive it, I shall be delighted to give it. With the help of my family, I have now investigated the matter as far as I can, and brought all the knowledge I can to bear upon it. A good many things have happened since 1880, and it is rather difficult to trace out the whole of this profound mystery. I learn from my private secretary that, last year, he received a claim of £4 15s. without any statement of what it was for; and with the discretion which becomes a good private secretary he wrote to ask for particulars. Then a bill was sent in some time early in the year, and it was put aside—[Laughter.—hon. Gentlemen laugh too soon—to be paid at the end of the current spring quarter. It was actually filed, with others, to be paid in the month of April, with the rest of the small bills of the establishment. As far as I can learn, this was the only bill that reached me on the subject; and it was filed with the rest of the bills to be paid in April. In the meantime, it appears, proceedings were taken in the County Court at Oxford. The hon. Member wishes to know why I never heard of them; and I will explain. He will remember that the House rose for the Easter Holidays on Tuesday, the 8th of April. I left town early on the morning of Wednesday, the 9th of April. It appears that a summons was sent to my house on that Wednesday; and I naturally asked why I did not receive it. It appears that the summons was delivered to a young footman at my house, and, with the intelligence characteristic of the race, he left it on the hall table. It appears also—as the hon. Member desires that Parliament should be informed of this—that the second housemaid, with the assiduity peculiar to that class of persons, hid it away with the advertisements and newspapers, from among which it was unearthed this morning. That was how I did not come to know of it, and how this profound and important mystery came about. But the hon. Member would like to know about the flowers themselves. The mystery of the flowers, as far as I can remember or ascertain, is this. I was residing at Oxford at the time of the election in March or April four years ago. I am informed by my family that we were walking together through the market, when we saw some nice fresh flowers which they thought they would like to have, and these flowers appeared to have been ordered, I am informed by my son, for himself and the rest of the family, and they were supplied to us for our own use during the fortnight or three weeks we were there. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Guildford is in the habit of indulging in flowers for purposes either of personal adornment or of entertainment; but, if so, he will probably find that they are not very cheap things at this time of the year. That is really all that I know. If he supposes that these flowers were bought with some dark design of corrupting the constituency of Oxford, I can assure him that is not the case; they were supplied entirely to my own family, and not to the electors; and while I am sorry to think that my connection with the town of Oxford should have terminated, the fact is, though the vase is shattered, the scent of the flowers will cling to it still.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS, 1866-9—LEGISLATION.

MR. STANSFELD asked the Secretary of State for War, When he proposes to introduce the Government measure for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, 1866-9?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that as soon as the state of Public Business appeared to afford any prospect of making progress with it, he proposed to introduce a Bill which would be substantially in the same form as that of last year (the Detention in Hospitals Bill), with the exception of the 5th clause, which provided for examination in certain circumstances which had not been previously provided for. It would virtually repeal the greater part of the Acts.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF gave Notice that he should move the rejection of the measure on the second reading.

MR. PULESTON asked whether, in view of the recent Returns, the noble Marquess had not seen fit to modify the provisions of the measure of last year?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it would be more convenient that he should postpone any explanation until he moved for leave to introduce the Bill.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) ACT, 1882 —CASE OF JAMES GAFFEY, CO.
ROSCOMMON.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. HEALY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that James Gaffey, of Scardane, county Roscommon, a tenant of Captain W. J. Burke, J.P., obtained, with the consent of the landlord, the benefits of the Arrears Act on paying half-a-year's rent, but that the landlord afterwards executed against him an old decree for rent wiped out by the Arrears Act; that the tenant tendered the sheriff, who came to eject him in June 1882, the half-year's rent from November 1881 to May 1882, which the Arrears Act did not extinguish; that this was refused; that Gaffey was thereupon evicted, and has since been homeless; whether the Government gave the sheriff an armed force to carry out such eviction; and, whether there was any ground of legality for it; and, if not, will the Government proceed against the landlord, or do they intend to take any steps?

MR. TREVELYAN: It appears that before any order for payment was made by the Land Commission a representation had been made to them by the landlord complaining of the proceedings under the Arrears Act instituted by his agent and the tenant, and insisting on his decree. The Land Commission, notwithstanding, made the order for payment; and I am advised that nice questions may arise between the landlord and the tenant, who, if the proceedings were irregular, has his full remedy by action, and can enforce his restoration to his holding. Under these circumstances, it is not a case in which the Government should interfere. Four policemen attended at the eviction, at the requisition of the Sheriff.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WESTMINSTER HALL (THE WEST FRONT).

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is now able to state to the House how it is proposed to treat the west front of Westminster Hall?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I am unable to state as yet what the Government propose to do with the West Front of Westminster Hall; nor, in fact, has Mr. Pearson sent in his final Report and drawings. I hope, however, to be in a position to submit a Supplementary Vote for this purpose before the end of the Session.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF RATE COLLECTOR FOR THE BOYLE UNION.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether John M'Williams was elected rate collector for the Croghan division of the Boyle Union, on 5th April, by a majority of three votes, at a cost to the ratepayers of eightpence in the pound on his collection, notwithstanding that his opponent, Mr. Mahon, offered solvent security for the collection of the rate at fourpence in the pound; how many ex-officio guardians and how many elected guardians supported the two candidates respectively; whether it is the fact that the late rate collector, Mr. Corry, resigned before the amount of his warrant for seed and poor rate was collected, at the instance of Mr. M'Williams, in order that the new appointment might be timed to take place on the same day on which the ex-officio guardians would muster for the re-election of the Chairman of the Board, Colonel King-Harman; whether the father of Mr. M'Williams was a rate collector in the Boyle Union, and absconded with the moneys of the Union; and, whether the Local Government Board will, under the circumstances, sanction the election?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers this Question, I would ask him, Whether he is aware that the advertisement for the collectorship did not mention the poundage rate as 8*d.*; and whether the day fixed for filling the office was not the 8th of April, whereas the day fixed for the election of chairman was the 29th March?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. M'Williams was elected to collect the rates in the Boyle Union at a poundage rate of 8*d.* The arrangements for the election were made by the Guardians, and publicly advertised. The Board did not think it necessary to accept the candidate who offered to collect for 4*d.* in the pound. For Mr. M'Williams, who was elected, there voted 19 ex-officio and eight elected Guardians, making, in all, 27. For Mr. Mahon there voted two ex-officio and 22 elected Guardians, making a total of 24. It is stated that the former collector resigned before he closed his collection. He was over 90 years of age, and unable to discharge the duties of the office. The Local Government Board knew nothing of the suggested arrangement as to the time of his resignation. With regard to the father of Mr. M'Williams, the records of the Local Government Board show that, in 1862, the rates outstanding in his district were collected and lodged by his sureties. It is therefore probable that he had left the Union. The Local Government Board did not think that such an occurrence, which happened 22 years ago, in any way affects his son's appointment, whose election has been duly sanctioned.

MR. O'BRIEN: I beg to give Notice that on going into Committee of Ways and Means I will call attention to the action of the Local Government Board, in permitting the Orange ex-officio Guardians to override the will of the elected Guardians of the Union by appointing the son of a swindler—[Cries of "Order!"]

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Mr. Speaker, I ask you whether such language is in Order?

MR. O'BRIEN: To do at 8*d.* in the pound what another solvent man offered to do for 4*d.*

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. Member is in Order in referring to a gentleman, unjudged and unconvicted, who has been duly elected to an important and responsible office, as the son of a swindler?

MR. O'BRIEN: I was referring to a fact admitted by the Chief Secretary for Ireland in this House only a moment ago—namely, that this man's father disappeared with the moneys of the Boyle Union. I am impugning the action of the Local Government Board in permitting the election of such a person at the rate of 8*d.* in the pound, to do what a solvent Nationalist offered to do at 4*d.*

MR. SPEAKER: It is very inconvenient, when Notices of Questions are given, that insinuations reflecting on the character of individuals should be made. I have not an opportunity of knowing the exact terms of a verbal Notice; but

I have heard enough of the Question to request the hon. Member for Mallow to expunge language which he knows would be disallowed by the Clerk at the Table in a written Notice.

MR. O'BRIEN: I respectfully submit that I have not used one word which might not be submitted to the Clerk at the Table, and which I have not a right to have inserted in the Notice Paper of the House.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I would like to ask, with regard to the insinuation that Mr. Corry had not closed his account before resigning, whether the amount of rates left outstanding was but 8s. 9d.?

MR. TREVELYAN: Perhaps the hon. and gallant Member will put the Question on the Paper.

MR. O'BRIEN: I may say that my Question does not impute that Mr. Corry disappeared with the funds of the Union, but simply that he timed his resignation so as to have the election of his successor on the day that the ex officio Guardians could muster for the election of Chairman.

CRIME (IRELAND)—THE TYRONE SHOOTING CASE.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. HEALY) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the recognizances of M'Kelvey, the Orangeman, who absconded in the Tyrone shooting case, have been estreated; and, whether any steps have been taken against his bailmen?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, an order had been made for estreating the recognizances in this case, and it would be enforced.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE RIOTS AT LONDONDERRY.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Government, being aware of the evidence of Sub-Inspector Dunning, at the magisterial investigation in Derry in November last, in which he stated that he believed that the shot which took effect on Kelly came from the roof of the Corporation Hall, any prosecution has arisen therefrom; whether Sub-Inspector Bernard also states on oath at the same investigation that the first shots which were fired came from the Corporation Hall windows; whether a man named Rankin, who was charged with having flung missiles from the roof of the Hall on the passing processionists, was produced before the magistrates, and his case, on the application of the County Inspector, not decided, as it was then stated by the County Inspector a more serious charge would be preferred against him; whether he has since been produced on that more serious charge; whether a young man named Waller, the son of a City official, has been charged with having firearms on the roof of the Hall on the 1st November; and, if the Government have taken any steps to bring to justice those who can be sworn to and who were identified by Sub-Constable Daly as having flung missiles at the processionists, and having fired revolvers on the occasion, or if it is the intention of the Government to institute further inquiries into the matter, and prosecute those who were then and there identified as taking part in the Town Hall affray?

MR. TREVELYAN: Both Sub-Inspector Dunning and Sub-Inspector Bernard stated as mentioned in the Question; but only as matter of belief, and were not able to identify anyone. A man named Rankin was charged with having flung missiles from the roof of the Hall, and the case was adjourned, as it was stated a more serious charge might be preferred against him. The matter has been inquired into, and no evidence can be procured sufficient to sustain the charge. It was stated that Waller, who is the son of a rate collector, had a revolver on the roof of the Hall; but it was not shown he in any way used it. No person has been identified by Sub-Constable Daly as having flung missiles, or fired revolvers. Several persons, both in the Lord Mayor's procession and in the Corporation Hall, were alleged to have fired shots and thrown missiles; but no sufficient evidence has, up to the present, been obtained to justify a prosecution against either party, save in the case of Doherty, who has been convicted for the shooting at Durnion.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether there are any, and, if so, what grounds why the Civil Service Commissioners have not more clearly defined the examination courses in Mental and Moral Philosophy, Jurisprudence, and Political Economy, in the preliminary India and Class I. Examinations; and, whether it would be possible to make the Royal University Degree courses and the Civil Service requirements in these subjects more closely approximate, so that Irish candidates for Civil Service appointments shall labour under no disadvantages as compared with candidates from English Universities in presenting themselves before the Civil Service Examiners?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, I will answer the Question for my right hon. Friend. I have received a Memorandum from the Civil Service Commissioners in this matter, which states that the examination in these subjects left no candidates from any particular part of the Kingdom at a disadvantage. It has been purposely left open, so that candidates, wherever trained, might enter under the same conditions. There is no approximation to any course in any English University, any more than to any Scotch or Irish University.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—CASTLEBLAYNEY PETTY SESSIONS DISTRICT—CATHOLIC MAGISTRATES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many Catholic magistrates are there in the P. S. District of Castleblayney, county Monaghan; is it the fact that, although the vast majority of the magistrates are non-Catholic, another Protestant magistrate has been appointed within the last few months, and that the Lord Chancellor has it in contemplation to still further increase the disparity, by creating another non-Catholic justice in the town; is he aware that a strong feeling prevails amongst the majority of the inhabitants of Castleblayney on the subject; and, is it the case that there is no Catholic in the town fit to be made magistrate?

MR. TREVELYAN: There are no Roman Catholic magistrates in the Petty Sessions district of Castleblayney. On the 9th of January last, there being then much need of a magistrate in the district, a gentleman in every way qualified for the Commission of the Peace was appointed. He is a Protestant. The name of no Catholic gentleman has been submitted to the Lord Chancellor either then or since.

Mr. O'Brien

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) ACT—PROSECUTION AT MULLINGAR.

MR. O'BRIEN (for Mr. HARRINGTON) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a prosecution under the Public Health Act instituted by the Board of Guardians at Mullingar against a millowner in that town named Scott; whether Colonel Cooper, J.P., an ex-officio member of the Board, opposed the prosecution, and declared that, in his opinion, the matter complained of by the sanitary officer of the Board was not a nuisance; whether, when the Guardians, at a subsequent meeting, came to consider the propriety of appealing from the decision of the local magistrate, Colonel Cooper again opposed the prosecution, and proposed an amendment to the resolution of the majority of the Board for that purpose; whether it is true that, notwithstanding this opposition and the fact of his being a member of the Board, which was plaintiff in the case, Colonel Cooper took a seat on the Bench with the County Court Judge on the hearing of the appeal, and by his vote nullified the judgment of the County Court Judge, and rendered the prosecution abortive; and, whether, if these facts be true, any representation will be made to the Lord Chancellor of Colonel Cooper's conduct on the occasion?

MR. TREVELYAN: The facts appear to be as here stated. Colonel Cooper and the Chairman differed; and the case was adjourned till next Sessions. It was arranged that, in the meantime, the defendant should increase the height of the chimney, and change the fuel for his furnace. Mr. Cooper appears to have acted within his legal right in taking part in the adjudication, though it might have been more judicious, as he was the only magistrate sitting with the Judge, to have abstained from voting. It is not a case in which any representation should be made to the Lord Chancellor.

MR. O'BRIEN: Does the right hon. Gentleman lay down that Colonel Cooper is at liberty, as a magistrate, to carry a job which he failed to carry as an ex officio Guardian?

MR. TREVELYAN said, it was a matter that rested with Colonel Cooper himself.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE POLICE FORCE AT OMAGH.

MR. HARRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that, in the town of Omagh, the county inspector of constabulary, the sub-inspector, and the head constable are all Protestants?

MR. TREVELYAN: I understand that two of the officers mentioned are members of the Church of Ireland, and one is a Wesleyan Methodist. The Inspector General informs me that all these officers were sent to Omagh in the ordinary course of filling up vacancies, and irrespective of their religion.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS—HYDE PARK CORNER—THE WELLINGTON STATUE.

MR. PULESTON asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is prepared to confirm the statement made in the Report of the Committee on the Wellington Statue, that the Duke did not sit to the sculptor, and that Copenhagen was dead before the statue was commenced; whether the order for a new statue has been given to Mr. Boehm; and, if so, whether such order will be countermanded; and, whether he will advise the reference of the whole matter to a Select Committee of this House? He might say, in explanation, that he had no intention in putting the question of casting any reflection upon the distinguished character of Mr. Boehm as a sculptor.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked when it was proposed to take the Report of the Vote?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I received on Saturday a letter from the present Duke of Wellington, to the effect that a letter had been laid before him by the Duke of Rutland, from his father to Mr. Wyatt, the sculptor, written in 1838, offering to show himself on horseback to that gentleman; and he adds that he thinks it probable that this took place. He says, however, that the head of the statue was taken by Wyatt from a bust of the Duke by Nollekens, who had modelled the Duke at the time of Waterloo; and he adds that in some important respects the statue does not represent the dress which the Duke wore at that battle. There is no doubt that the horse Copenhagen died three years before the statue was commenced, and that a well-known horse, called Recovery, was the model for the statue. In any case, the present Duke's opinion is not altered as to what should now be done; and he has renewed to me his approval of the scheme now before the House. No order has yet been given to Mr. Boehm for the statue. As all the facts are before the House I think there is no necessity for a Committee. The Report of the Vote will not be taken to-night.

MR. PULESTON: Does the Chief Commissioner confirm the statement in the Report that the Duke did not sit to Mr. Wyatt; and has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been called to the Report of the Committee of 1839 to this effect—

"His Grace has been so kind as to comply with our wishes in sitting to the artist in the clothes he wore at Waterloo?"

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I think there is no doubt that the Duke did sit, not for the statue, but for the sketch to Mr. Wyatt, in 1838 and 1839. But it is equally true that Mr. Wyatt found it more convenient to take the head from the bust that had been made by Nollekens.

PRISONS (ENGLAND AND WALES)—CONVICT PRISON WARDERS.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any action has been taken; and, if so, of what nature, by the Home Office authorities, in reference to those grievances of the Convict Prison Warders, respecting which the House of Commons was informed in February 1883, that it was "hoped a decision would shortly be arrived at?"

MR. HIBBERT (for Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT): A Departmental Committee, of which the Earl of Rosebery was Chairman, was appointed in January, 1883, to inquire into the subject, by whom a number of Governors, warders, and other witnesses were examined, and all the Petitions presented by warders carefully considered. The main objects desired by these Petitions were four in number—(1) the eight hours' system; (2) an increase of annual leave; (3) a readjustment of pay and allowances; (4) increased superannuation. After full consideration by the Home Office and the Treasury of the recommendations of the Committee, the following concessions have been granted:—(1.) An increase of staff has been experimentally made in three large prisons as regards night duty, which has much diminished the amount and length of hours on this duty. This has been found to work well, and the Secretary of State hopes that it will be generally introduced. (2.) The higher ranks of subordinate officers have had an addition of leave, which also involves an increase of staff. (3.) It was thought that certain officers acting as principal warders, but not paid as such, should receive some pay for the higher duty. This has been accorded, the number of principal warders having been increased by an addition of 22 such officers. The total increase of expenditure on account of these changes will be £3,478. (4.) The Treasury are of opinion that if it be desirable to alter the general terms of retirement for the convict service it should be done by special legislation. This the Secretary of State is not prepared at present to undertake.

In answer to Mr. R. H. PAGET,

MR. HIBBERT said, that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department stated last year that the Report was a confidential document which he was unable to lay on the Table.

AFRICA (WEST COAST) — THE RIVER CONGO—RUMOURED DISTURBANCES.

MR. A. H. BROWN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the report that fighting and disturbances have taken place on the Lower Congo or the adjacent district?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There have been disturbances at Maculla, Cabenda, and Nokki, particulars of which will be found in the further Papers relating to affairs in the Congo district, which will be laid before the House.

MR. BOURKE: When?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Very shortly.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE ON THE NORTH-EAST COAST—REPORT OF THE SUB-COMMITTEE.

MR. RAMSAY (for General Sir GEORGE BALFOUR) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When will be made public the Report of the Sub-Committee on the Northern Harbours of Refuge?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The Report has been agreed upon by the Sub-Committee. It has now been printed for consideration by members of the General Committee, and I hope it will not be long before it comes to my hand.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CRIMINAL TRIALS—CHALLENGES OF JURORS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the case of James Johnston, a Protestant, tried in the Commission Court, Green Street, Dublin, on a charge of having murdered Philip Maguire, a Catholic, the Crown, in view of the fact that the murder had proceeded from party feeling, arising out of difference of religion, removed the venue from Cavan; but, in Dublin, counsel for the prisoner challenged every Catholic juror who came up to be sworn, and counsel for the Crown, on the other hand, so acted that the jury was exclusively composed of Protestants, the prisoner being also of that creed; whether this jury having, after four minutes' consideration, declared the prisoner not guilty, the Crown immediately thereupon entered a nolle prosequi in the cases of three other persons sent up to be tried on the same capital charge; whether, upon the trials, which closed on Wednesday last, in the same Court, of Catholic prisoners charged in what is known as the Barbavilla conspiracy case, the Crown, acting by the same agents as in the case last cited, made no objection to Mr. Amos Vereker, a juror who admitted that he was a personal friend of the gentleman whom the prisoners were charged with conspiring to murder, and a member of the same Orange lodge with that gentleman; whether the Crown, however, challenged thirty-two jurors, thirty of them being Catholics, and one of those Catholics a gentleman who holds the commission of the peace; and, whether the courses pursued by counsel for the Crown in the two cases cited were authorised by their instructions?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is the fact that the Crown, for the purpose of securing an impartial trial, changed the venue in the case of James Johnston from Cavan to Dublin. Counsel for the prisoner exercised their right of challenge to the full extent, and it is believed challenged Catholic jurors. The Crown has no control over the action of the prisoner's counsel. The fact that the jury was composed of Protestants was not due to any action of counsel for the Crown. One juror, a member of an Orange lodge, was ordered by the Crown Solicitor to stand aside, as the prisoner was an Orangeman. The other gentlemen composing the jury were persons to whose impartiality no exception could be taken. Upon a verdict of acquittal being given, the Crown did enter a nolle prosequi against the other prisoners, as the one against whom the evidence was strongest had been acquitted. With respect to the trial of the prisoners in the Barbavilla conspiracy case, the counsel for the Crown were not aware that Mr. Amos Vereker was an Orangeman when he was called, and the objection to his serving was taken by counsel for one of the prisoners. When that objection had been taken, the regular and legal course was followed of appointing triers, who found him to be impartial. He was then challenged by the prisoner, and accordingly did not serve. Among those ordered to stand aside by the Crown were five Protestants, including one Orangeman. One of the prisoners was a Protestant and Orangeman. The religion of the jurors called in no way influenced the action of those representing the prosecution. It is not known that any Catholic ordered to stand aside was a Justice of the Peace. He may have been so; but we have not been able to ascertain whether it was so. Counsel for the Crown had no special instructions in this matter. They acted on their own discretion and responsibility with the sole object of securing an impartial trial.

MR. SEXTON: Is it within the competence of counsel for the Crown, when a magistrate comes forward to serve as a juror, to order him to stand aside?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Is there the slightest foundation for the insinuation that the gentleman against whose life the attempt was made, Mr. Barlow Smythe, was or ever had been an Orangeman?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he did not know.

An hon. MEMBER: Who said so?

MR. TREVELYAN: I never said so.

MR. SMALL: After the prisoners had exhausted their challenges could not the Crown go on challenging, and thus secure that Catholics shall not go on the jury?

MR. TREVELYAN: It would be a gross impropriety if a man who impartially was believed in by the Crown should be ordered by them to stand aside on account of his religion.

ARMY—EXAMINATIONS FOR PROMOTION—OFFICERS FAILING TO PASS.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that the Lords of the Admiralty have decided to allow those officers of Royal Marines who qualified in each subject but failed in the aggregate (at the examination for promotion held in January 1884) to pass; and, whether he will grant the same indulgence to those officers of the Army who, at the same examination, qualified in each subject but failed in the aggregate?

EARL PERCY asked, whether a major in the Royal Marines, who was suspended for not passing his examination in June, 1883, passed last January, and was reinstated?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am informed that the statement of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Colthurst) is correct; but that the Lords of the Admiralty have intimated that the indulgence now granted is not to be taken as a precedent for future examinations. I am not prepared to adopt the course which has been taken by the Admiralty; but some points raised by the noble Earl the Member for North Northumberland (Earl Percy) are still under consideration, and as soon as a decision has been arrived at I will inform the House.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, STROKESTOWN UNION, CO. ROSCOMMON.

MR. LYNCH asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that, on the 3rd inst., the Irish Local Government Board received from Mr. Thomas Holden, of Strokestown, county Roscommon, a declaration made in the presence of Mr.

Richard Hague, a Justice of the Peace for said county, in which declaration Mr. Holden charged Mr. Flynn, clerk and returning officer of the Strokestown Union, with having acted illegally in reference to the recent election of a Poor Law Guardian for the division of Ballygarden, in the said Union, by having refused to record in favour of the said Thomas Holden, eight votes tendered for him on the part of six voters who had duly paid their Poor and Seed Rates, and by having allowed to the other candidate, Mr. Cox, seven votes on the part of four voters whose Seed Rates are still due; whether the returning officer, after having agreed with Mr. Holden to appoint a day to decide on the votes objected to—to submit the proxy votes, 40 or 50 in number, to the scrutiny of Mr. Holden, subsequently refused either to go over the objections or exhibit the proxy votes, and declared Mr. Cox elected by a majority of six votes; and, whether the Local Government Board will order a scrutiny or a new election?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is the case that the Local Government Board received a declaration from Mr. Holden containing complaints of the character mentioned as to the actions and decisions of the Returning Officer at the recent election. The complaints having been referred to the Returning Officer, he furnished an explanation which appeared to the Board to be satisfactory; and this explanation was sent to Mr. Holden, who has not since made any further communication or complaint on the subject. If he shows any ground for questioning the accuracy of the statements in the explanation of the Returning Officer, or affords any sufficient reason for doubting the validity of the Return, the Local Government Board will make further inquiry; but at present they cannot order a new election.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POSTAL ACCOMMODATION IN LEITRIM.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Postmaster General, If the Post Office authorities have received a memorial from the inhabitants of Buncreeagh, Moher Gregg, and other townlands in the district of Augh-a-Cashel, county Leitrim, praying that a post office may be established in that district; and, if it is contemplated to establish a post office in that district, in view of the fact that the nearest post office is over five miles off?

MR. FAWCETT: I have carefully considered the Memorial to which my hon. and gallant Friend refers. I regret that the correspondence is not sufficient to warrant the opening of a post office. In order, however, to meet the wishes of the Memorialists as far as possible, I have given instructions that there shall be a delivery from Drumshambo to the districts referred to three days a-week.

IRISH CHURCH ACT—IRISH GLEBE PURCHASERS.

MR. BERESFORD asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any reply has been received by His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, in answer to the questions submitted by him to them with reference to the case of the Irish glebe purchasers, in fulfilment of the understanding given to the deputation which waited on him on 31st January last, and referred to in his Letter to the honorary secretary of the Glebe Purchasers' Association?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency has not yet received their Lordships' reply to his letter; but I understand that it may be expected within the present week.

INDIA—THE BANDA AND KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.

SIR JOHN HAY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the sum of £276,000, with interest, retained by the Indian Government as proceeds of the movable estate of the captured Ex-Princes of Kirwee, and not yet distributed to the Forces of the Crown, ought to be carried over to the Consolidated Fund, under the Act 1 Vic. c. 2, sections 2 and 12, if not divided as prize money to the Troops; and, whether, in reference to the payments to India, on account of the Grant in Aid for the Afghan War, he proposes to recover that sum from India for the public Exchequer?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDEES): The money referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay) in the first part of his Question represents, I presume, the value of the promissory notes issued by the East India Company and held by the Raos of Kirwee. On the rebellion breaking out, the Indian Government, on the 9th of January, 1858, gave the usual notice that these notes, the numbers of which were known, had been stopped. The captors of the Raos claimed to have the value of these notes distributed as prize money. The Indian Government refused, and it has been decided by the Board of Treasury, after hearing counsel in 1869, and subsequently in the Law Courts, that the captors' claim was inadmissible. The cancelled notes were never found by the capturing force, and never formed part of the booty. They never passed into the possession of the Crown, nor has the Crown any right to them. I do not propose to take any steps to recover the amount from India.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—RATHDRUM UNION, CO. WICKLOW.

Mr. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that, at the recent election of Poor Law Guardians for Rathdrum Union, county Wicklow, voting papers were not in some cases distributed to persons entitled to vote whose political opinions were known to be on the popular side; whether it is true that voting papers were not supplied to two voters named Kane and Toner in the Newcastle Electoral Division of the Union; whether, when they went to the workhouse, a distance of fourteen miles, and applied for them, they were refused by the returning officer on the ground that the application was too late; whether such refusal was in accordance with the law; whether the returning officer, Mr. Bernard Manning, is the person who acted as returning officer in the election of a guardian for the Killiskey Electoral Division of same Union in 1882, when it was found on a scrutiny, that forty-seven votes were received by him in the Conservative interest in excess of the lawful number; and, whether, if it should appear that the returning officer has not properly discharged his duty on the present occasion, he will, as President of the Local Government Board in Ireland, take any and what steps to secure the holding of elections for Poor

Law Guardians in Rathdrum Union in an impartial manner?

Mr. TREVELYAN: I must ask for further time for inquiry into the matter.

Mr. W. J. CORBET: I will postpone the Question till Thursday.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—VESTED AND NON-VESTED SCHOOLS.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the National Education Commissioners have made a rule under which assistance is refused towards the erection of any school, even though vested in local trustees, if the teachers employed in it are religious men or women; and, if so, what is the reason of the rule?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Schools for the erection of which grants are made constitute what are called vested schools. Since the year 1855 a rule has existed under which Convent schools receive aid only as non-vested schools. Hence the principle of building grants since that year does not apply to them.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: My Question does not refer to Convent schools, but to schools belonging to local Trustees who employ as teachers Christian Brothers.

Mr. TREVELYAN: I have given the hon. Member the answer I have received; but I can gather myself there are few such schools, and I take the answer of the Commissioners to mean that, but I will refer back to them.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I shall renew the Question on Thursday.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

Mr. GORST asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he can now announce a date for the Second Reading of the Merchant Shipping Bill; and, if not, whether he will indicate a day upon which he will be prepared to make such announcement?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I propose to ask the House to proceed with the second reading on the first Government night which the exigencies of Supply may leave free after Mr. Speaker has been got out of the Chair on the Representation of the People Bill.

EGYPT (ARMY OF OCCUPATION).

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Secretary of State for War, If the Egyptian Government has any control over the movements of the British troops stationed in Egypt and supported by Egyptian revenues?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; it has not. I should, perhaps, explain that Egyptian revenues are only charged with the excess of cost of the maintenance of the troops in that country over and above what they would cost in this country.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE HIGH SHERIFF OF DROGHEDA.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. John Maugan, the present High Sheriff of Drogheda, is the holder of a licence to sell beer, cider, and spirits, "to be consumed on the premises;" and, whether, since section 13 of the 3rd and 4th William 4, chapter 68, enacts that a sheriff or sub-sheriff shall not be capable of "receiving or holding" such a licence, what action the Government intend to take in the matter?

MR. SEXTON asked whether the Statute referred to was not obsolete?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is not obsolete. The case stands thus—The 13th section of the 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 68, does enact that no Sheriff shall be capable of receiving or holding a licence to sell beer, cider, or spirits by retail, to be drunk or consumed on the premises. There is nothing to prevent such a person being appointed Sheriff; but, on becoming Sheriff, he is disabled from acting under his licence. As it is probable that Mr. Maugan, if he has so acted, has done so in ignorance of the law, his attention will be called to the matter.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL—FLOODS PREVENTION—LEGISLATION.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the subject of Floods Prevention is dealt with in the County Government Bill, which he stated was prepared; and, whether he would have any objection to lay it upon the Table, so that it may be well considered in the Country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Local Government Bill, as at present drawn, does not deal with the subject referred to by the hon. Baronet. It was contemplated that that question would be dealt with in a separate Bill. It is not deemed desirable to introduce the Local Government Bill until there is some probability of its receiving the attention of Parliament.

IRELAND—EXCISE BONDING WAREHOUSE, LIMERICK.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is a fact that the Government are going to close their Excise Bonding Warehouse, Henry Street, Limerick, against the public, and hand it over for the exclusive use of one distiller in that city; and, if so, what warehouse they will substitute in place of it for the general body of traders in that district?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): No, Sir; a proposal on the subject of the Excise bonding warehouse in Henry Street, Limerick, which is not the property of the Government, but is in a very bad state of repair, has been made to the Board of Inland Revenue, and is under their consideration. There are two sides to the question, and the matter will not be decided hastily.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES (IRELAND) INQUIRY COMMISSION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can now communicate the names of the gentlemen appointed to serve on the Queen's Colleges (Ireland) Inquiry Commission?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Government are still in correspondence with regard to the selection of the Commissioners. At a late hour on Thursday night, in answer to the hon. Member for Longford's (Mr. Justin M'Carthy's) Motion for certain Returns, I stated I did not expect to be able to name so early a day as to-day; and the hon. Member put off his Return for a week from that date. I hope to be able to state the names in a day or two.

In reply to a further Question from Mr. SEXTON,

MR. TREVELYAN was understood to say that one gentleman had been decided upon,

MR. SEXTON: Can he be named now?

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not see him in his place. I think I had better not name him.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— RELIEF OF KHARTOUM AND BERBER.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the information that Khartoum is hemmed in by insurgent Arabs and that General Gordon's palace is daily riddled with Arab bullets, that General Gordon has telegraphed that the situation is desperate, that General Gordon has asked that voluntary subscriptions for £200,000 and 3,000 nizams are necessary for his release, and that Hussein Khalifa, with his garrison and over 2,000 refugees, mostly women and children, are in great peril of massacre at Berber, Her Majesty's Government will now state that a relief expedition is being prepared for the relief of Berber and Khartoum? He would also ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether Her Majesty's Ministers have decided to send an expedition to save General Gordon and to relieve Khartoum; and, if he cannot now inform the House at what time Her Majesty's Ministers will be able to make such a statement? He would further ask the Premier, Whether it is true that the Government have ordered the abandonment of the garrison of Berber; and, whether the people of that town are now retiring upon Korosko?

MR. GLADSTONE: Apart from the addition which the hon. Member has made videlicet, the two first Questions are mostly repetitions of Questions which I answered on Thursday last, and I have nothing to add to the answers I then made. In truth, as regards Berber, there are very special reasons for not making any addition to those answers, because we have no final intelligence with regard to that place; and we might, by giving an answer, be compromising the interest either of those persons who are in the place, or of those who have quitted it. As regards the addition made in the last Question of the hon. Member, I have to say that no such instruction has been issued by the Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: We have no decisive and final intelligence on that subject. We are informed that a certain portion of the troops and other persons have left Berber; but we do not know anything more, and no account is given of the garrison.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Will the right hon. Gentleman inform the House whether General Gordon has been consulted with regard to the evacuation of Berber in any way?

MR. GLADSTONE: This Question proceeds, I think, on a misapprehension. There has been no power of obtaining an answer from General Gordon since the new intelligence was received that Berber was in difficulties.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I wish to ask the Prime Minister, seeing that he did not answer the last part of my Question, Whether he can inform us at what time Her Majesty's Ministers will be able to make a statement in regard to the despatch of an expedition; and perhaps the Prime Minister or the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will tell us what is the date of the last despatch or message from General Gordon?

MR. GLADSTONE: I thought the hon. Member would see that it would be quite impossible to make any answer to that Question, or to the request for such a statement. I have already stated that we hold ourselves responsible with regard to the security of General Gordon. We have heard nothing to the effect that General Gordon is insecure, and it is perfectly impossible for me to make any such answer as the hon. Member seems to expect. I may say, with regard to the Question so obviously put without the object of obtaining information, I must, if the hon. Member persists in putting it, most reluctantly fall back on the privilege which belongs to any Member of this House, and not affect to give an answer to such a Question.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: The Prime Minister has just informed the House that communication with General Gordon is cut off—

MR. GLADSTONE: No.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I understood him to say that; and I beg to ask the Prime Minister, or any Member of the Government, if the communications with General Gordon are not out off, how the Government are going to fulfil the responsibility which they state they feel themselves to be under with regard to him? In view of the statement of the Prime Minister, I shall feel bound on an early occasion to call attention—I shall not do it to-night—to the abandonment of General Gordon by the Government in the only way open to me.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked whether, in the event of a sufficient sum being raised by public subscription, in response to General Gordon's appeal to organize a volunteer force to proceed to his relief, Her Majesty's Government will afford all necessary facilities for the expedition? He would mention that he had already an offer of £1,000 in one sum for the purpose.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member has kindly made me aware of the practical and philanthropic view with which he puts his Question. I am very glad to receive in any way a further expression of his views if he see occasion; but, for the present, I must only say to him that, in our opinion, the safety of General Gordon, being a matter which would involve us in an obligation to consider the question in a practical view, we do not see how we could devolve that upon any volunteer effort. It appears to me that it is a matter which would devolve upon us.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether the obligation which the Government have accepted, in respect of the safety of General Gordon, extended to the garrison and the population of Khartoum?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I would also ask whether Colonel Stewart has not reported of these people that "their political creed is to side with whichever party is strongest;" and, whether this garrison is not partly composed of troops whom Colonel Stewart, writing on April 28 last year, described as—

"Plundering and harassing the population, being no better than highway robbers, and being held in universal detestation and abhorrence?"

MR. GLADSTONE: I must say that this latter Question of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) is a reasonable one. The Questions which have come from the other side of the House have been put with a view of obtaining some declaration from the Government in favour of the interests of the garrison at Khartoum, and the Question now put from this side of the House is asked for a contrary purpose. The duty of the Government is to abide by the statements which they have already made. It is their belief that it would not be conducive to any of the interests involved if they were to go further.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Has the Government, in abandoning Berber, acted under military advice; and, if so, is there any objection to lay on the Table the opinions of distinguished military officers who were consulted?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My right hon. Friend has already stated the reason why the Government do not consider that it would be desirable to make any statement with reference to Berber. As to the advice on which the Government have acted, we have, of course, availed ourselves of the best advice which was obtainable; but I think it would be altogether without precedent and extremely inconvenient that we should undertake to make public the advice which we have received. The decision is one for which the Government is responsible; and the advice, and the grounds upon which it was given, are altogether different questions.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he should not have asked the Question, had it not been stated that distinguished military advice had been given that the road to Berber was open some time ago. He wished to know whether it was true that Osman Digna was now threatening Suakin with 2,000 men; and, if so, whether the Government contemplated dispersing the Arab tribes by an armed force?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the Government were in constant communication with Colonel Ashburnham, and they had received no information that such was the case.

EGYPT (MILITARY OPERATIONS IN THE SOUDAN) — VOTE OF THANKS TO GENERAL GRAHAM, ADMIRAL HEWETT, AND THE OFFICERS.

MR. ONSLOW asked, Whether it was the intention of the Government to move a Vote of Thanks to Admiral Hewett, General Graham, and the Officers under their command for the recent operations in the Soudan?

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My right hon. Friend stated, a short time ago, that this subject would be considered by the Government in connection with that of the rewards or honours which might be conferred upon the officers and men who took part in the operations in the Soudan. This part of the Question is now under the consideration of the First Lord of the Admiralty and myself; and as soon as we have come to a conclusion as to the steps to be taken—and we hope to come to a conclusion shortly—we will communicate our intentions to the House.

MR. ONSLOW: The noble Marquess does not say whether the Government intend to move a Vote of Thanks or not. I would remind him that there is nothing in the Standing Orders of the House to prevent a private Member doing it; and also that a Vote of Thanks takes precedence of any other Motion. If the noble Marquess will not state positively to-night whether he intends to move a Vote of Thanks, I beg to give Notice that I shall do so myself.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. CORRY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, seeing that his proposals on Thursday did not enable the House to arrive at any decision on the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, he is now prepared to name an early day for the Second Reading?

MR. T. A. DICKSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the fact that the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill was not reached on Thursday or Friday last, he will state what arrangements he proposes to make in order that the House may have an opportunity of arriving at a decision on the Second Reading of the Bill?

MR. R. POWER: Before answering these Questions, will the right hon. Gentleman permit me to ask if he has seen the report of a public meeting of the St. David's Temperance Society, held at Cardiff on the 15th instant, under the chairmanship of the Roman Catholic Bishop, at which the Rev. Father Richardson made the following statement respecting Sunday closing? He said:—

"It had become a practice for women to get in on Saturday night as many barrels of beer as they could smuggle past the police, and that such places existed all over the town. Yet the police did not, or could not, or would not, or dare not, find them out. A more terrible sight could not meet the eyes of a clergyman than the scenes which were to be found in such places. The room was full to suffocation; there was a cask in the corner of the room, another stowed under the stairs, and probably another elsewhere. The neighbours handed their jugs over the backyard walls, and they were supplied more freely than they could be in a public-house. They saw young girls sitting on the knees of young men, with their arms round their necks, and both the girls and the young men the worse for drink. Not only that, but little children were taken into the room and dosed with beer until they became drunk. A more abominable effect of closing public-houses he could not conceive possible. It was one of the most terrible things that afflicted the town. This was the result of Sunday closing."

And the Rev. Father Butler added his testimony to the like effect, as follows:—

"Father Butler, in seconding the resolution, wondered that the Sunday Closing Bill for Wales had not been called Sunday opening. Whereas there were only five clubs before the Act came in force, there were now 30. In his district, the place was infested with them. They were paying, and consequently increased. They promoted drunkenness among young people, and caused people to drink who never drank before, and people who did drink before to drink more. If the Act were repealed, and repealed it must be, things would get better. He thought it was a misfortune that the Act ever passed. There was now more drunkenness, more sin, more iniquity of every kind committed in Cardiff than ever there was before."

And whether the right hon. Gentleman thinks that great haste is required for legislation to place Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Waterford, and Belfast under a Sunday Closing Law similar to that which, according to the testimony of the Catholic clergy of Cardiff, has produced such evil results in that town?

MR. GLADSTONE: My attention has not been called to the various statements referred to by the hon. Member for Waterford; but it is a fair subject for discussion on the Bill in question; and I hope, therefore, it may be the means of making us still more desirous of providing time for the discussion of it. With regard to the two other Questions, the House is aware that, on Friday last, owing to a proceeding in which the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) took a principal part, not only was the Bill not reached, but the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill was not finished. I am extremely disappointed with the proceedings, because the effect was not only to make it impossible to proceed with the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill, but also to render it doubtful whether any good can be achieved either for that or any other Business, at a Day Sitting, by an exact repetition of those proceedings. The Government will, therefore, carefully look out for the first opportunity that may offer itself to call the attention of the House to the Rule whereby Bills are prevented from coming on again.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. BRODRICK asked the Prime Minister, Whether there was to be a Morning Sitting to-morrow?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that, as already announced by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Dodson), there would be a Morning Sitting to-morrow for the discussion of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill.

MR. BRODRICK asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether he was aware that there was on the Paper for to-morrow night a Motion of vital and paramount importance to the elementary school teachers throughout the whole Kingdom; and, whether he proposed on every Tuesday and Friday after Easter to put down measures of national importance, without regard to the rights of private Members, in order to secure the freedom of Government nights for measures of Party urgency?

MR. GLADSTONE: I believe the House is extremely anxious to have a decision on the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, and I do feel it my duty to ask for a Morning Sitting to-morrow. I am informed, and believe, that there will be ample time for the discussion of the subject to which the hon. Member refers at the Evening Sitting.

MR. BRODRICK: May I ask if the right hon. Gentleman will give any facility for making a House in the evening?

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot undertake to depart from the established usages of the House with regard to the making of a House.

MR. BRODRICK: I beg to give Notice that on the Motion for a Morning

Sitting to-morrow, I shall move that the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill be put down for Thursday.

EGYPT—MR. O'KELLY, M.P. FOR ROSCOMMON.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any confirmation has been received at the Foreign Office of the report that Mr. O'Kelly, the Member for Roscommon, had been arrested by the Egyptian authorities?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Foreign Office was informed on March 10 that Mr. O'Kelly was said to be in the Nile Valley with the intention of going to join the Mahdi. On the 24th of the same month Sir Evelyn Baring telegraphed that Mr. O'Kelly was at Dongola, and that orders had been sent by the Egyptian Government to prevent him proceeding further on his journey. I have no other information.

MR. PARNELL: With reference to the reply of the noble Lord, I beg to ask the noble Lord, whether he is aware that Mr. O'Kelly's expedition to join the Mahdi was undertaken in consequence of an engagement or commission for that purpose which he received from a newspaper?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; I have received no such information.

MR. PARNELL: Will the noble Lord telegraph to Cairo to ascertain whether it is the fact that Mr. O'Kelly has been placed under arrest by the authorities at Dongola?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have no objection to communicate with the Secretary of State on the subject.

FRANCE AND ANNAM (TONQUIN).

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will explain his assertion, as given in The République Française, that correspondence of a strictly confidential character has taken place with the French Government on the subject of Tonquin, seeing that, since M. Challemel-Lacour was French Minister in London, no communication has passed on that subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Member has made a mistake in taking the account from The République Française, and not from The Times newspaper. If he had referred to The Times he would have seen I never used the expression "confidential correspondence." I said that certain confidential communications had taken place, and that was perfectly correct.

EGYPT—THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister, Whether there is any truth in the report that negotiations are going on for the purpose of assembling a Conference on some of the affairs of Egypt; and, whether it would be possible to state the purposes for which that Conference is to be assembled?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that is a Question which I may fairly ask the right hon. Gentleman to place on the Notice Paper. I will communicate with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the subject.

EGYPT (THE EXPEDITIONARY FORCE) —THE 60TH RIFLES AT SUAKIN.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any truth in the report in the papers, to the effect that the 60th Rifles, at Suakin, have insufficient camping-ground and are in want of water, and that that gallant regiment is thereby being reduced to a condition anything but creditable to the authorities?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have not seen the statement referred to by the hon. and gallant Member. But the hon. and gallant Member for Thirsk (Colonel Dawnay) has given me private Notice this evening that he will put a Question to me to-morrow upon the same subject, and I will make inquiries and give all the information we have.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—MORNING SITTINGS AND SELECT COMMITTEES.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked Mr. Speaker, Whether, when hon. Members are engaged on Private Bill Committees, they have the right to call on the Chairman to adjourn the Committee, so that they may attend in their places in the House, when a Division takes place at a Morning Sitting; and, further, if so, whether the same right will extend to Standing Committees, so that Members engaged on Private Bill Committees can have them adjourned for the purpose of attending such Standing Committees?

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think I am called upon to answer theoretical Questions; but I assume from the statement of the hon. Baronet that a case is likely to arise immediately. In answer to the hon. Baronet, I have to say that there is no inherent right in a Member to call upon the Chairman of a Private Bill Committee to adjourn the Committee, in order that they may attend the House, when a Division takes place, or for the purpose of attending a Standing Committee.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL PROPOSALS—PROPOSED RESTORA- TION OF THE GOLD COINAGE.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he proposes, during the next three months, to exchange full-weight sovereigns against light-weight half-sovereigns?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): May I ask the hon. Member to repeat the Question to-morrow? I have had no Notice of it.

ARMY—FALL OF BARRACKS AT PORTSMOUTH.

In reply to Colonel MAKINS,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had just received some information upon the subject of the accident at Portsmouth; and from that it appeared that one man had his leg broken, and two others were reported to have been hurt. The accident was caused by a brick wall and some iron girders falling down. He had no other information beyond that.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE INCOME TAX.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD gave Notice that he would, on the first available opportunity on the introduction of the Inland Revenue Bill, move—

"That it is expedient that, at the earliest opportunity, the administration of the Income Tax should be amended conformably with the definition of annual value as legally determined by the House of Lords."

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
BILL.—[BILL 119.](Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr.
Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

COMMITTEE. [FIRST NIGHT.]

Order for Committee read.

MR. RAIKES, who had given Notice of the following Motion :—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision for the redistribution of seats between the existing constituencies, and for the representation of populous urban sanitary districts at present unrepresented, by the transfer to them of seats from the less populous borough constituencies," said, that on the last occasion that he had had the honour of addressing the House upon this subject, he had expressly to remark upon the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister through serious indisposition. He was now very glad to be able to congratulate the House upon the re-appearance of the right hon. Gentleman, and was confident that with him in his customary place they would find their discussions much more profitable and practical. There had been a disposition in some quarters to represent the Amendment he was about to move, and also another of which Notice had been given by the hon. Member for Knaresborough (Mr. T. Collins), as merely repetitions of the Motion of his noble Friend the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners); and he wished to state to the House the reasons which led him to believe that it should be regarded from a different point of view. The Motion of his noble Friend the Member for North Leicestershire invited the House to reject the scheme because it was incomplete, whereas his own Motion was to invite the House to complete the scheme; and it seemed to him that, although it might be supported by those who supported the previous Motion, it really was the converse of that proposition, and was in no degree bound to defeat the Bill, or cause its rejection, or even its delay. They all knew very well that the question of redistribution as connected with the representation of the people had been, as a rule, considered inseparable; and it was only when in the hands of the right hon.

Gentleman the Prime Minister that there had ever been an attempt made to sever the two questions. He was of opinion that there could not be a more fatal mistake made by those who were anxious for a really good Reform Bill than to attempt to separate the question of the franchise from that of redistribution. The question of redistribution must always be one of extreme difficulty; it bristled, in fact, with difficulties, for it was impeded by all sorts of personal and local considerations. It could only make progress when strengthened by the motive power of an extension of the franchise. The Bill now before the House was going to give an enormous addition to the county electorate; in fact, the Bill appeared to proceed very much on the familiar doctrine of the rights of man. That principle was to be so far restricted that a vote was to be given, not to every man, but to every man who lived in a house. In the opinion of those who carried the second reading of the Bill by so large a majority, every householder ought to have an equal right to vote, whether he lived in a borough or a county. But on the same principle every man who had a vote ought to have a right to an equal vote—that was, a vote having about the same amount of influence in returning a Member of Parliament. At the present time the value of a county vote and of a borough vote was about the same. In England and Wales the present borough electorate numbered between 1,500,000 and 1,600,000 voters; the county electorate numbered about 900,000. The borough electorate returned 297 Members and the county electorate 187, which was a tolerably fair division according to the number of voters. But this Bill would add 1,300,000 voters to the county electorate of England and Wales, and there would then be 2,200,000 voters returning 187 Members, while 1,600,000 returned 297. Such would be the anomaly and injustice created by a Bill which professed to adjust the franchise with a special view to fairness. The necessity of a Redistribution Bill in regard to Ireland was, at least, equally necessary. They had to bear in mind not merely the question of the share of representation which Ireland should possess as compared with the other parts of the Kingdom, and the propriety of so altering the franchise as to swamp the only class in Ireland attached to the English connection—they had to consider the extraordinary anomalies which had been perpetuated in Ireland in consequence of the unwillingness of the Government of 1869 to complete the task of their Predecessors. Thus there were at present 16 towns of less than 10,000 inhabitants who returned a Member each, while large counties of 200,000 persons, like Galway and Mayo and Donegal, only returned two Members each. The senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) in his latter days had become enamoured of the Act of Union, and said he would take his stand upon it in considering the proportion of representation to be allowed to Ireland. The Prime Minister was equally positive in his declaration that he was not prepared to diminish the share of Ireland's representation in that House. The present 105 Members sent from Ireland consisted of 100 Members as fixed by the Act of Union, and five added by the Act of 1832. There would, he thought, be no disposition to act in a manner that might appear harsh towards Ireland, by making an enormous reduction in its representation. But there would probably be but one opinion in that House—however that opinion might be expressed in the Division Lobby—that if five Members were added in 1832, these might well be surrendered now to Scotland, who was under-represented. As to Scotland, there was a special necessity for the question of redistribution to be dealt with without delay. The Scotch borough representation was full of extravagant eccentricities of grouping. He should like to give the House one or two examples. He found that the Falkirk district had boroughs in three counties—Stirlingshire, Lanarkshire, and Linlithgowshire. The Stirling group contained boroughs situated in Stirlingshire, Perthshire, Fifeshire, and Linlithgowshire. The Kilmarnock Burghs included Kilmarnock, in the county of Ayr; Dumbarton, in the county of Dumbarton; Renfrew, in Renfrewshire, and another town in the county of Lanark. Those who formed those constellations had, no doubt, their own reasons for so disposing of them, and for making political districts overlap each other. Probably those very astute politicians thought that by throwing as many difficulties in the way of a new classification they would perpetuate the arrangement they were then making. He believed this matter was not dealt with at all in the Reform Bill of 1867. The question of Scottish borough constituencies, he thought, was one which required the attention of the politician, even in a greater degree than the arithmetician or the statistician. At all events, the question was one so congenial to the tastes of the right hon. Gentleman himself that he sincerely hoped he would be the person who would provide the house with a scheme for reforming it. Coming to the case of Wales, the first thing that struck the observer was the great disproportion in the representation of Wales. At present Wales contained 12 counties, represented, he thought, by 30 Members. Those Members represented in each case a constituency, taking it on an average, of at least 10,000 less than a constituency in England. They found in Wales some of those extraordinary anomalies in the way of borough representation which existed in a more glaring manner in Scotland. They found mere villages grouped together; and he believed the smallest borough in the Kingdom was to be found in Wales—the borough of Radnor, which had very recently the honour of being represented by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War. He need not add that this seat had for long been a safe Liberal preserve. Other examples were to be found in the petty constituency of Haverfordwest, surrounded, or, he might say, hemmed in, by the Pembroke district of boroughs, which contained from 20,000 to 25,000 persons, and which embraced four or five large towns, and in the Carnarvon district of boroughs, with 30,000 inhabitants, of which two-thirds resided in two considerable towns, while the remainder were divided among four or five small villages. It was not until such constituencies were analyzed that it was found they contained three or four towns containing less than 3,000 inhabitants, and which yet enjoyed the borough franchise by the mere necessity of having to be squeezed together in order to make up a tolerably adequate group of boroughs. If a limit was recognized below which a place should not be considered entitled to distinct urban representation, then the total number of Welsh district boroughs would be greatly abridged, and an opportunity would be afforded for the representation of important places, which were not at present represented. Then take the case of England. In the small boroughs there was not any marked preponderance of one political Party over another. As a matter of fact, 56 boroughs in England below 10,000 of population were still returning Members to the House of Commons. Those who had seen the very interesting and important Return obtained some time ago by the hon. Member for East Staffordshire (Sir Michael Bass) of the urban sanitary districts which were at present unrepresented in the House would have seen that their number was 187, containing a population exceeding 3,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), in his speech on the second reading of the Bill, told the House that he had been at the pains to ascertain that there were at least 30 constituencies among the county divisions returning 60 Members to Parliament, in which the urban element would predominate over the agricultural. Therefore, they were brought face to face with a state of things in which they would not only disfranchise the existing constituency by adding 1,300,000 voters to the present total of 900,000; but they would also, in the case of 30 counties and 60 seats, disfranchise the agricultural element by the preponderance of the urban element. In addition to that, they had also to consider that those persons in those populous districts who were to be placed on the register in this enormous number would be smarting under a sense of the injustice which excluded them from the urban representation, while it was preserved for the small and decaying towns at present enjoying the privilege. He did not wish to be suspected of a too great desire to obliterate all the tiny constituencies which existed in this country. They had given variety and interest to the character of the House, and they knew that the Prime Minister himself had represented one of those constituencies. But he wished the House and the country to know that as they proposed to go to work under this Bill immense masses of people would be enfranchised on the ground that they were householders; and, therefore, they must make up their minds to such a clean sweep of little constituencies as was not paralleled even under the Reform Bill of 1832. Then there was the case of London, which had six boroughs—Westminster, Marylebone, Finsbury, Tower Hamlets, Hackney, and Chelsea—containing a population of 2,500,000, and represented by 12 Members. If they took the electoral unit at 50,000, these boroughs would be entitled to 50 Members. But if they were to take the number at half that, and to adopt the extraordinary theory of the Prime Minister that, inasmuch as they were near the centre of affairs, and were familiar with Imperial questions, their representation should be less than that of persons removed from the centre of affairs, and who were presumably unfamiliar with Imperial questions. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] The right hon. Gentleman certainly laid great stress upon that point—that London could not expect to be represented in the same ratio as districts distant from the Metropolis. But supposing they gave London North of the Thames, say, 18 additional Members, increasing the number to 30. They had then to consider that in the South of London there were Lambeth, Southwark, and Greenwich, which contained among them another 1,000,000 of people. These places were at present represented by six Members; but, according to the population scheme, they were entitled to 20 Members. Liverpool, which is the largest borough in the Kingdom, and had a population of 552,000, according to the rule laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, ought to have 10 Members; while Manchester, with nearly 400,000 inhabitants, was clearly entitled to seven or eight Members; and on the same grounds Birmingham ought to have a similar number, and populous boroughs like Wednesbury and the district of Swansea ought to have additional representation. This would give a large increase to the representation of large and populous districts, in addition to the increased representation of Metropolitan constituencies and large and important divisions of counties. This would involve the transfer of close upon 100 seats if justice was to be done under the Bill; and he thought that in a question of the kind an attempt should be made to meet the difficulty as fairly as was possible. The question was whether it was the intention of the Government to do justice, or to make the Bill a mere mockery to the people whom they had announced their intention of enfranchising, but whom they were about to treat as though, like the tailors in the proverbial saying, it required nine of them to make a man. He did not remember a case in which the House had a stronger right than they had on the present occasion to ask that the Government should lay their cards on the Table. The Government might, perhaps, hope to pass this Bill without giving to the House any further light as to their intentions on the question of the redistribution of seats in all places which would be affected by the Bill. The question of proportional representation was, nevertheless, closely connected with the present proposal, though it had been said that the matter could not be dealt with in the Bill as drawn; but he could certainly see no reason why it should not be enacted in the event of the Bill passing that no person should be entitled to give more votes than any present elector had now a right to give. It seemed to him that the country could not accept with satisfaction or confidence a scheme like the present, which was going to give this enormous representation to new voters, who would outvote the old voters without leaving them one shred of their political power. His noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) said the other day that he did not care about checks and guarantees. Neither did he to any great extent; but it was not as a check or guarantee that he would stipulate for the representation of minorities—it was a matter of simple common justice. The future of the country was greatly bound up with the question of the representation of minorities. He could not contemplate without a shudder the prospect of a future electorate unredeemed by any variety, unbroken by any streak of light to recall the bright past upon which they were now turning their backs, and he would entreat the Prime Minister not to let himself be remembered as deserving an apostrophe to be found in some of the best known lines of Pope, when he wrote—

"Thy hand, great Anarch, lets the curtain fall, And universal darkness buries all."

The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Instruction with the exception of the words, "by the transfer to them of seats from the less populous borough constituencies."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision for the redistribution of seats between the existing constituencies, and for the representation of populous urban sanitary districts at present unrepresented."—(Mr. Raikes.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it may be generally convenient that we should state at this moment the view the Government take of their position in respect to this Motion. In the first place, I perfectly understand the reason why the right hon. Gentleman has dropped the words from the close of his Motion, "by the transfer to them of seats from the less populous borough constituencies." The right hon. Gentleman was in a painful state of mind. He told us at the close of his speech that he could not contemplate with anything else than a shudder the state of things likely to be produced if 2,000,000 more persons were added to the constituencies of the same stamp of people as those who have been already found by experience to be perfectly well qualified to exercise the franchise; but, being in this shuddering state of mind, he desires that this Motion should not present to the view of the country any painful ideas; and, therefore, he held out a pleasant conception of populous urban sanitary districts at present unrepresented, and dropped the disagreeable suggestion of the means by which those wants were to be supplied—namely, by taking away seats from other people. So far from complaining of the length of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, he exercised a great indulgence to the House in not making it longer; but upon the topics on which he founded himself he might very well have occupied the whole evening. What were those topics? There was not one word in the speech which did not belong to debates which have already been engaged in. There was not an argument on Ireland, Scotland, or Wales, on Birmingham, Manchester, or Liverpool, or upon proportional representation, not a solitary sentence which did not aptly belong to debates we have concluded, and upon which the House has pronounced a very solemn judgment after two nights on the introduction largely given to the subject of redistribution, and after five nights on the Motion of the noble Lord, almost wholly given to redistribution. The right hon. Gentleman, before we are allowed to advance an inch—being one of those who have been responsible for the conduct of the Business of the House—steps into the arena, and again proposes to begin from the beginning and discuss the entire question. I think it fair to the right hon. Gentleman to place before the House what I believe to be the construction put, at least by the majority of the House, on this proceeding. I myself was once so bold, and perhaps so rash, as to frame a general definition of what might be called obstructive speaking; and I defined it to be “speaking which is not addressed to carrying conviction to the minds of the House.” But though it is not addressed to that end, it occupies the time of the House, and is, therefore, naturally construed and taken to be adopted and addressed for the purpose of consuming that time. I frankly own that is the construction which I, for one, and others on this side of the House, have placed on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman; and I think very possibly some Members sitting on the other side may do the same. My object is not to go over the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in detail, and I shall not detain the House five minutes on that part of the matter. He began by deploring the enormous disadvantage under which we should place the subject of redistribution by separating it from the franchise. The right hon. Gentleman desires a sincere and genuine reform. He has had great experience of sincere and genuine reform. He sits in the region and belongs to the school which have made sincere and genuine reform the great business of their political life; and, therefore, he comes forward as a prophet and as an authority to expound to us this subject, and to tell us how we are to prove ourselves sincere and genuine reformers. I believe there are some of us who are not entirely disposed to yield to the right hon. Gentleman a monopoly of that claim; and it certainly is the conviction of the responsible Government that the truth will be found by turning inside out and upside down everything said by him on the subject. The mode to insure an absolute and effective redistribution of seats is to pass, and to pass promptly, the measure before the House. The right hon. Gentleman said—“What a cruel thing; you are actually going to pay off the county voters with such a share, it may be one ten-thousandth or one fifty-thousandth of the power over the representation; whereas in a trumpery borough a man no better, perhaps, was possessed of one five-hundredth.” He thinks that is a very clever argument, and I admit that is a very sad state of things; but I want to get forward, if the right hon. Gentleman, instead of stopping us, will assist us; I want to propose a measure for the better redistribution of the areas, and for equalizing the share of representation, as well as we are able. What is the position of the right hon. Gentleman? He says, because it is so hard that one man should have a one ten-thousandth part in the representation, while another has one five-hundredth part, therefore, he will stop the Bill, leaving the poor man with no share at all. That does not shock the right hon. Gentleman, nor cause him to go through the shuddering operation. Then he speaks of the unequal distribution as between different parts of the country, which I have said has been very fully considered upon the Motion of the noble Lord; and, again, will be largely considered at the proper time. But as the right hon. Gentleman insists upon debating again that question decided by the House after the devotion of so large a portion of time to that purpose, and as, while he has completely, no doubt, escaped a difficulty in connection with the Forms of the House by the phraseology of his Motion, the Motion is exactly the same as that of the noble Lord—What is our purpose, and what does common sense require us to do? Are we to play into his hands? No, Sir; we cannot consent to do that—we cannot, and we will not. I speak for the Government—and I rather think I am speaking for many others; they cannot, in that state of the Bill, debate the question which it was the very last operation of the House to settle. Such proceedings are fatal to the conduct of Business, and if they continue and receive the countenance of the House, and become systematic, will reach a point at which they will constitute a betrayal of the trust of this House; and for us, with the views we take, it would be a betrayal of our trust if we were to consent to be drawn afresh into a discussion of the details of redistribution. That much is necessary to say to show that it is from no disrespect that we decline, if we do decline, to enter into this consideration at the present stage. There may be Gentlemen on both sides of the House who have not been able to deliver their views on the subject of the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] Very good; there will be very fair opportunities for considering these matters and speaking upon them when the Lord Mayor moves that this House do resolve itself into Committee upon that day six months. That is what I call an honest Motion of a fair stand-up fight. Let the Motion by all means be made; if it is made, I trust the sense of the House will be taken upon it. What we say is that this Bill for the enlarging of the franchise, although an imperfect one—that is to say, a measure which, in the ordinary course, requires to be followed up by another measure, which we wish to introduce at the earliest moment—yet, as it stands, it is a good, and a great good in itself. That is the issue that we have not yet been able to decide. I thank the Lord Mayor for having given us the opportunity to decide it, as we shall, when we come to the discussion of his Motion. I think that will be an opportunity, if hon. Members are so minded, for renewing the discussion on the principle of the Bill, and that is the intention of the House in allowing the principle to be raised on the Speaker leaving the Chair. But, Sir, as to the side issue, I hope we shall not be drawn into it; and if the right hon. Gentleman thinks it right again, after the discussion of the other night, to refuse to allow us to advance a single inch, and endeavours to lead us back into the labyrinth of the infinite and innumerable details of redistribution, we will not be parties to any such proceeding, and we must decline to enter into it.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Sir, the House of Commons has just been treated by the Prime Minister to the first application, in its most rigid and barbarous form, of the oldture. The Prime Minister, no doubt, Sir, is vastly dissatisfied that his celebrated weapon for muzzling the House of Commons has not yet been put into practice by the Chair, and he has taken the opportunity of giving the strongest hint in his power to those who sit beside him to manufacture an amount of mechanical "evident sense," so sonorous and so terrifying, that you, Sir, may be intimidated into giving regard to it. After one speech only from a Member certainly as much entitled to speak, and I may say more entitled to speak, on the subject than nine-tenths of the Members of the House—a speech dealing with the whole matter of redistribution as plainly and as concisely as it could be dealt with—the Prime Minister says—"I decline to argue the matter; I decline to debate the question; I myself shall keep silence, and I peremptorily order all those behind me to keep silence too." I congratulate the Liberal Party on the servility to which they have been reduced. Four years of unmitigated adulation has reduced them to a state of servility which I venture to say would be degrading to a Hottentot Parliament. I shall be curious to see whether this peremptory injunction—the most peremptory injunction that any Prime Minister, including even Lord Chatham himself, ever issued—will be abjectly obeyed by every Member of that noble army. At any rate, if it is, it will be an interesting and instructive lesson to the country as to the state to which Parliamentary Institutions are reduced. But, after all, what has the Prime Minister said on the question? He has charged the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) with deliberate Obstruction—that is to say, resistance to the will of the House otherwise than by argument, as he defines it; and he has declared that the right hon. Gentleman in that able speech has been resisting the will of the House otherwise than by argument. Well, I should like to know has the will of the House been declared as to redistribution being included in this Bill? The House has not had an opportunity of giving a judgment in the matter. The Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners), which was rejected by a majority of 130—a majority which the Prime Minister never seems to be tired of bragging about—did not raise that question. Redistribution was only one small item in that Amendment. The decision of the House was that it would not negative the second reading of the Bill; but the House has had no opportunity yet of coming to a decision, "aye" or "no," as to whether the measure should include redistribution. This is the first opportunity we have had of deciding whether these two questions should be combined, or dealt with simultaneously or separately. The Prime Minister tells us—"We are very anxious to deal with the question of redistribution; but we utterly decline to discuss it, no matter how it might be brought forward. We wish to pass this Bill through the House without debate, and then deal with the question of redistribution." There would be something to be said for that argument if the Government were going to deal with the question of redistribution. For myself, I say that if I knew they were going to deal with that question I should take no part in the discussion at all, for I should not attach the slightest consequence to the Bill. As I said in the country, the other day, it is a Bill which anybody could bring in, and which any Minister could pass if he had a servile majority behind him; but no matter how servile the Liberal Party, or how peremptory the Prime Minister's mandate, the question of redistribution is not going to be dealt with. He has said something about dealing with it next year. Where will the Prime Minister and his Government be next year? He would be a very bold man, indeed, who would hazard a conjecture. I should say they may be possibly at Khartoum; but it is very long odds that they will not be on the Treasury Bench. At any rate, hon. Gentlemen like the Members for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) and Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who express such confidence now that the Prime Minister would be on the Treasury Bench next year, did their utmost to tear him off the other night. Only by a majority of 15 did the right hon. Gentleman retain his place on that Bench, and only by that majority did the House consent to vote Supplies to the Government. Under these circumstances, the promise of the Prime Minister to deal with redistribution next Session is the most wild and frivolous promise ever given to the House of Commons; and there is not the slightest security, good, bad, or indifferent, that it will be redeemed. The right hon. Gentleman cast the most unjust aspersions on the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge, because he said he wanted a genuine and sincere Reform Bill. I charge the Government that it is they who are insincere on this question—they, who are dealing with a little bit of the subject, and who utterly refuse to deal with the real difficulties which surround it. Why are the Tory Party to be called insincere in the way they deal with Reform? They passed a much larger Bill than the Prime Minister has ever done, and in face of the opposition of the Prime Minister. Many of those who now sit round the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge were then in Parliament. Why are they, who supported the late Lord Beaconsfield in carrying that measure through the House, to be taunted with insincerity? The Reform Bill of 1867 dealt so completely with Reform that those who supported that measure have a perfect right to ask now for a Bill which deals completely with the question. If the Prime Minister will say he will produce a redistribution scheme directly this Bill passes, he will find that the latter will slip forward much more rapidly than it is otherwise likely to do. Why is not the whole Reform Question to occupy the attention of the House this Session? Why is Parliament only to deal with the subject piecemeal? Why does not the Prime Minister decide to put off the Redistribution Bill till 1887? Why do not the Government announce their intention of dealing with the question completely this Session? They have a majority of 130 at their back on this subject. They do not know that they will have that majority next year. Why is the question of redistribution to be shelved, in order that the Home Secretary may destroy the Lord Mayor? The only valid reason that has been given by the Government for not dealing with redistribution is that they would have no time to deal with other matters. Why should not the Home Secretary be allowed to destroy the Lord Mayor next year? Why not give the unfortunate man one year longer? The Government must be perfectly well aware—I defy them to contradict me—that if they chose to deal with redistribution this year, and to sacrifice their other measures, there would be ample time to do so. This Bill would pass through the House by the end of the month of May if we knew that redistribution was to follow, and the Government would have June and July to deal with the question of redistribution. The Government have never given an honest reason for postponing the question of redistribution, and, in the absence of an honest reason, we have a right to say that they do not intend to deal with it in this Parliament. There can be no question whatever that the Party manipulators and Party jerry-manders who have influence on the Treasury Bench have made up their minds that the most favourable electorate to which the Liberal Party can appeal will be an electorate unredistributed. Her Majesty's Government are perfectly well aware, with the experience they have had of General Elections, that almost the entire county rural population is dead against them; that every single county which seceded from the Opposition at the last Election will be won back; and they hope and intend, if we are frightened by the attitude of the Prime Minister, to swamp the county constituencies with what they trust will be an overwhelming body of voters who are not rural, supposing that those voters will be on their side. That is a trick to which the Party on this side of the House, I do not imagine, can lend themselves for a moment; and not only is it a trick of an utterly impolitic nature, but it is one which Her Majesty's Government absolutely refuse to debate, or discuss, or explain. The Prime Minister has done a most unusual thing—made a speech only about 10 minutes' long. That is his contribution to the discussion, and he has ordered the Liberal Party not to speak even for that length of time. He expects that those who do not serve under his banner will adopt a similar attitude. I cannot imagine for a moment that the Leader of the Opposition will take part in the practices of the Prime Minister. I imagine that the right hon. Gentleman, with his experience of this House, has seen the Prime Minister try this game on more than once, and try it on unsuccessfully; and I cannot help thinking that a Party which numbers 250 Members of the House of Commons will know how to make the Prime Minister emerge from this obstinate and solemn silence, and debate this question of redistribution, not so much because we want to have it debated, as because the country wants it. Why should the Prime Minister be allowed to do that which no

Premier has ever done before? Why should he be allowed to introduce a Reform Bill without redistribution? The Reform Bill of 1832 contained an immense measure of redistribution, and that of 1867 included a large measure of a similar kind. It is perfectly idle to say that redistribution is not necessary now. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) has proved that a larger measure of transfer of seats will be rendered necessary by this Bill than by any Reform Bill ever introduced before; and to put off that question without giving any security that it will ever be dealt with is a condition that all the rights of minorities must be availed of to their last extremity, in order to break down. There will have to be a great deal of busy manufacture of "evident sense" before hon. Members on this side of the House will give up their attempt to prove to the country the hollowness and utter insincerity of the position taken up by Her Majesty's Government. I only want to say one word with reference to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge as to minority representation. He quoted me to the effect that I did not care for checks and guarantees. Well, I said I did not care for the particular kind of checks and guarantees which were involved in the popularly received notion of minority representation, because I know perfectly well that if the majority is bent upon having its way, those checks and guarantees will be swept away in a few hours. But your real checks and guarantees will be found in a measure of redistribution. That is why, attaching as I do enormous importance to this question, I cannot support a Bill which does not deal with redistribution, or a Government which refuses to do so. With respect to the minorities in the country—whether Conservative or Liberal—the real protector is the House of Lords. That is the Assembly which will prevent injustice being done to any class without the consent of the people of the country. I have always looked upon that House as the only efficient protector of the rights of minorities. At any rate, it is one which has lasted the longest and, as far as I can judge at present, seems to possess every element of endurance.

But I did not intend, if the Government had made any statement on the question of redistribution which could have been construed as in any way affording a satisfactory assurance that the question would be dealt with this Session, or that the Bill would not come into operation until it was dealt with—I did not intend to take any part in the debates in this House, or to have interposed to prevent the Speaker leaving the Chair; but I do believe now, seeing the attitude taken by the Prime Minister—which is an attitude that the House would never have tolerated from anyone but the Prime Minister—that hon. Members on this side of the House ought to persevere in the use of all their rights, and refuse, in the strongest possible manner, to become partners in the servility of the Liberal Party.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: I do not know if the speech we have heard from the Prime Minister this evening is a type of the sort of speeches we are to hear from time to time in these Reform debates. But it seems an amazing assumption that the Prime Minister should be entitled to get up and tell the House of Commons that he will not himself discuss, and that so far as his authority goes he will not allow them to discuss, one of the most important questions connected with the representation of the people. The right hon. Gentleman has said that an ample opportunity was given some time ago for the discussion of this question. He said that a further opportunity was to come very shortly upon the Amendment to be proposed by the Lord Mayor of London. The Prime Minister's speech reminds one of the nursery story, Alice in Wonderland. Wonderland was a land where there was always jam yesterday and jam to-morrow, but never jam to-day. The Prime Minister declines to discuss redistribution now, because, as he alleges, it was discussed on a previous occasion, and partly because it is going to be discussed when some other Amendment comes before the House. It is incorrect to say that redistribution was discussed in the former debates, because the Prime Minister would not discuss it, and only gave the House a hazy sketch of his own personal opinions about the subject—opinions which were promptly repudiated by Liberal Members, and did not find support from the right hon.

Lord Randolph Churchill

Gentleman's Colleagues. Practically, what took place in those debates enforced my hon. Friend's claim to bring this matter before the House now. It is precisely because the Government have shown that they have no distinct and definite purpose with regard to redistribution—and, if they ever had any such purpose, have quarrelled upon it—that it is necessary to bring this matter before the House. When the Lord Mayor's Amendment comes before the House the right hon. Gentleman may, with perfect justice, appeal to that majority of 130, of which the Home Secretary is never tired of boasting in his country excursions. But the Government having shown itself either unwilling or unable to lead the House on the question of redistribution, is it not the duty of the House to declare, before it goes into Committee, that this question must be incorporated in the Bill? There is one matter that has been referred to here again and again with regard to the effect of this Bill. We had certain figures put before the House by the Premier as to the number to be enfranchised under this Bill; but we have no satisfactory statistics. The only thing we know is that in the figures the Premier gave to the House he was quite wrong. The right hon. Gentleman said, in what have since been called the round figures of a rhetorical speech, that in Ireland 400,000 people would be enfranchised; in Scotland, 300,000; and in England, 1,300,000. These are, I believe, the figures originally given. The argument of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) was based upon them; and one of the right hon. Gentleman's Colleagues got up and said that they were erroneous to the extent of no less than 80,000 in the case of Ireland, where the number to be enfranchised would be 480,000 instead of 400,000. Whether the same margin is to be allowed in England and Scotland we have no means whatever of knowing; but, if so, the matter becomes serious indeed. When the Prime Minister was speaking I ventured to differ from him as to the proportion of agricultural voters to be added to the constituencies. I ventured to say that certainly not more than 500,000 out of 1,300,000 added in England and Wales would be engaged in agricultural pursuits. The whole number of agricultural labourers in England and Wales is 870,000; and when you deduct the number who are already on the Register, and the number who will not come upon the Register under this Bill at all, 500,000 would be the full extent of their enfranchisement under this Bill. Who are the other 800,000? They are the urban population, who are, practically, to invade the counties, and who are relied upon to change the character of the representation of these counties. Now, Sir, it is a very serious question for the House of Commons whether it should allow half a Bill to be taken in one Parliament, when, according to the Prime Minister, the only matter which prevents its being made a complete Bill is the fact that to do that you must give up the whole Session to it. As the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) has said, the only measure which disputes the time of the House with this Bill is the Home Secretary's Bill dealing with the Government of London, for the President of the Board of Trade has not yet settled his differences with the opponents of the Merchant Shipping Bill. But is there any reason why either measure should not be put aside in favour of this Bill? If they are not put aside, what will happen? The new electors under this Bill will not come upon the electoral roll until January, 1886. Why will the Liberal Party be asked next year to pass a Redistribution Bill? Will it be to take away the Party advantage which the Franchise Bill gives them? It is scarcely conceivable that when they have passed a Bill which gives them the control of 30 additional county constituencies, and of 60 seats, they will address themselves to pass a Bill which deprives them of that advantage. It is the manipulation of those constituencies which the Government has in view. Suppose the question goes over to another Parliament? Suppose those 30 constituencies should be dominated by the new Radical vote? Who can expect that the 60 Representatives of those counties would support any alteration in distribution? If the separation of the urban and rural populations were proposed, what would be the answer? It would be—"We get two votes for the county constituency; if we divide it into two portions, rural and urban, our opponents would get in for one of the divisions." I believe that a new Reform Bill is an early necessity; but it would have been better to let the question sleep for a while until other matters have been dealt with which it is quite competent for the House to discuss. There are matters of reform in the House itself which would be more useful for the country than the Parliamentary franchise. I therefore protest against this Bill because, while its first result will be to strengthen the Party opposite in 30 county constituencies, the effect then will be to disincline them to measures of redistribution which are necessary for the completion of the work, but which will probably, and I think certainly, deprive them of the Party advantage they have gained. These are matters about which there may or may not be differences of opinion between the two sides of the House; but surely they are matters it is reasonable to discuss. The right hon. Gentleman has been for weeks past denouncing his opponents for Obstruction which prevents this question being brought forward. Yet, what is his attitude the moment he is here? At an early period in the evening we are able for the first time to pass to a large question of this kind. We demand to know, as we are entitled to be told, whether the Government have any definite kind of purpose upon the matter, and the moment that real opportunity occurs up jumps the Prime Minister and says—"We will have no discussion at all." The right hon. Gentleman says we must go on to another Amendment, and then, of course, he will decline again, and decline upon much better grounds. I, for one, think that before any extension of the franchise is allowed to pass into law we should have some distinct scheme from the Government and a pledge that they will act upon it, or by some means or other an appeal to the people should be insisted upon. To alter the constituencies by this measure, and then to appeal to the people, will practically be to have arranged the constituencies for yourselves, and to have defeated any hope of a real scheme of redistribution. Not only will you have 187 Members representing 2,250,000 of voters and 280 representing 1,500,000, but of these 187 who would then represent the agricultural interest 60 seats would be elected by constituencies which would have been swamped by the invasion of urban voters. However impatient the Prime Minister may be, surely he cannot expect this measure will pass without resistance. Should it do so, the agricultural constituencies of the country would be absolutely betrayed by their Members. Neither the Prime Minister nor any of his Colleagues will venture to deny that you have a fairer representation now than you would have under this Bill if you pass it without redistribution. Why, then, should we pass a Bill of this kind to make anomalies worse, and to prevent their being remedied in any honest manner? A few years ago the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board published a book upon Parliamentary Reform, and in that book he quoted with approval certain observations that had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) at Rochdale. The right hon. Baronet said in his book—

"Many, indeed, view the assimilation of borough and county franchise as an immediate and pressing question, chiefly because that assimilation is a necessary first step to a just distribution of political power. They agree in the view put forward in 1869 and 1880 by Mr. Bright at Rochdale. Mr. Bright said that while to give a man a vote may be to please his sentiment of independence and equality, yet as regards legislation and government, the giving a man a vote or the giving 1,000,000 of men votes is of no value whatsoever unless what I should call the soul of the representative system be equitably adjusted."

Again he says—

"At Liverpool an aristocracy working with and through a mock representation is the most complete instrument ever devised to squeeze wealth from the toil of a nation under pretence of governing it."

In his words a mock representation, says the right hon. Baronet, it is from the context clear that Mr. Bright was speaking not of the deceptions of the franchise partly redressed in 1867, but of those of the distribution of political power which are greater now than they were at the moment at which he spoke. These points were put forward by the right hon. Baronet as being essential; and our complaint against this Bill is that while not carrying out a complete reform it will make a complete reform almost impossible. Under these circumstances, there will be no reluctance on this side of the House to face such unjust charges as the Premier has made against us for very obvious and transparent reasons. These charges are made to prevent Members of the Tory Party from showing to the country what a sham the Bill is, and that it is a mere political expedient, whose objects are, first, to secure the present Ministry in power until 1886, because they will be able to urge that it would be premature to appeal to the country before the new constituency has been properly registered; and, secondly, to throw enormously increased weight into that class of the representation which they now hold in their own hands. For whom are the denunciations intended which have so undeservedly been uttered this evening? Members on the Opposition Benches will not be thereby deterred from discharging their public duties. I suppose they are intended for Liberal meetings. They supply a kind of oratory useful in the Provinces. It is useful to withdraw attention from questions of foreign or commercial policy by general denunciations of Obstruction. It is to the country that the Conservative Party desire to appeal, and the Prime Minister may be quite sure that every charge of that kind made in the spirit and with the temper which has been displayed this evening will encourage rather than discourage the Party on this side of the House to carry the controversy beyond the walls of this House, and to those constituencies to which they will force the Government to appeal before this Bill passes through Parliament.

MR. BRODRICK said, he thought that the exceptional action of the Government would lead to the necessity of adopting some exceptional measures. That was not the first occasion, within his (Mr. Brodrick's) own short Parliamentary experience, on which the Government had endeavoured to stifle debate, and to gag their own Followers who were anxious to express their own opinions to the House. There was a large number of Gentlemen opposite who were anxious to speak on the second reading of the Bill, who were unable to do so. They had risen like a flock of birds at each stage of the debate; but they had now been removed, and were not allowed to speak. He maintained that it was absolutely impossible that the debate could be satisfactorily continued solely from one quarter of the House, and without any answer from the Government. It had been pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) that if the Bill was carried without redistribution, the practical effect would be to deprive agricultural constituencies of one-half of their representation; and, in the face of such a statement, the agricultural constituencies had the right to insist that they should receive explanations of the course the Government intended to take in order to avoid such a consequence. Appeals had also been made to the Government to give a reply upon the question of minority representation, and to furnish assurances which would enable the debates to proceed without difficulty, and yet they had not hitherto attempted to reply to these criticisms or the speech of the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) on the predominance that would be given to Irish representation. If Her Majesty's Government did not intervene and take part in the debate and answer the arguments addressed to them, there was but one course open to the Opposition, and that was to move the adjournment of the debate. That course he proposed to take. He had no doubt that the Prime Minister and his Supporters would endeavour, throughout the length and breadth of the land, to saddle the Opposition with Obstruction; but he, for one, did not care a rap for such a charge under the present circumstances. It was a canon of Parliamentary discussion that the arguments of your opponents had to be fairly answered unless they were stated at such a length that it was obvious they were put forward for the purpose of Obstruction. They had had speeches that evening by three Gentlemen holding high position in the House, and not one of them had received any reply except the determination expressed by the Prime Minister, that he would do his best to prevent any reply being made. Under these circumstances, the continuance of the debate would be simply a Parliamentary sham; to carry it on from one side would be simply playing into the hands of the Government by reiterating arguments that were not answered and letting the Opposition talk itself out. He felt personally very strongly on the matter, as he represented a county which, in respect of population, Income Tax, and registered electors, was properly entitled to more Members than any other county, and more than the whole Principality of Wales; and, whatever standard was adopted, the county of Surrey would be entitled to from 22 to 29 Members, instead of 11 as at present, and therefore he represented a strong interest on the question of redistribution. Under these circumstances, he would not submit to being told by the Prime Minister that he was guilty of Obstruction in bringing that question before the House. It was an ill-chosen time for the Government to intrench themselves in the reserve of silence at the opening of these discussions on the Reform Bill, and was eminently calculated thus to give a handle to and provoke scenes that all must desire to avoid. Hitherto there had been nothing done by the Opposition in the discussion of the measure that was not perfectly legitimate, and he challenged the Prime Minister, in the whole of his Parliamentary experience, to tell him of any Reform Bill of similar magnitude which had passed its various stages with less discussion. Why, the Reform Bill of 1867 occupied eight nights in the discussion on the second reading; and on the last night of the debate on the present Bill, great influence had to be exercised on the Opposition side of the House to prevent the debate being prolonged. Seeing no indication on the part of the Government of their intention to conform to ordinary Parliamentary practice, he begged to move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Brodrick.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Brodrick) seems to me to be extremely indignant without cause, and has taken an unusual course; but it appears to me that the position that my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government has taken is one which is perfectly feasible and defensible. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, if they wish to be answered, and have a debate upon the subject, perhaps hon. Members will allow me to state why I think so. Practically speaking, the question now sought to be raised has been already debated, having been under discussion for seven nights. ["No, no!"'] If you insist on having debate, do let a speaker on this side of the House finish a sentence; it is not encouraging to be interrupted in this way when one is making a simple statement. When the Bill was introduced, there was very little said by the Opposition on the question of principle. During the two nights devoted to the introduction of the Bill, and the five spent on the second reading, every possible reason was alleged why this Bill should not proceed singly, and why it should be connected with a Redistribution Bill. The knowledge of everyone in and out of the House will confirm the statement, that the staple of the seven nights' debate was the propriety and necessity of joining redistribution with franchise; and, therefore, to assert that, for seven nights, this question had not been discussed is to assert what is contrary to everybody's knowledge. In point of fact, the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) raised that distinct issue by his Amendment, and it was upon that Amendment, and not upon the question of extending the franchise, that the debate proceeded and the Division was taken—that Division which the last speaker will not allow me to be proud of. After seven nights' debate, on the question whether the franchise must be connected with redistribution, there was a Division taken by this House of an overwhelming character; the meaning of that Division—and no one can deny the proposition—was that the House was not of opinion that it was expedient to connect these two measures immediately in the present Session. ["No, no!"] The Opposition themselves tried to represent that it was not a Division against the principle of the Bill, but that it was a Division against the separation of redistribution from the question of the franchise; that was the light in which they desired it to be viewed. This House pronounced in favour of separation—["No, no!"] Do let me make my statement; you may contradict it in debate, but do not endeavour to clamour people down; you insist on our speaking, and the moment we make a statement you contradict it by clamour. I repeat the statement, that the Division on the noble Lord's Amendment was substantially a Division on the question whether redistribution should be connected immediately with the extension of the franchise. ["Oh, oh!"] The noble Lord did not demand that the two measures should be combined in the same Bill; he was more moderate than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Raikes). The noble Lord said he would be quite satisfied if we laid our redistribution scheme on the Table to be debated afterwards; but the House rejected that demand by 130; and now the right hon. Gentleman advances the demand that they shall be taken in the same Bill. Is that a reasonable course after the issue has been raised and a Division taken upon it? The last speaker is indignant, because we do not desire to give any encouragement to that course of proceeding. We say that there has been seven nights' debate, practically upon the necessity and propriety of combining inextricably together, at the same time, the questions of redistribution and of franchise. We say that, after full and ample debate on the subject, the House has given a decisive voice upon it. It was said by the hon. Member who has moved the adjournment of the debate (Mr. Brodrick) that my right hon. Friend has ordered hon. Members on this side who are anxious to speak to be silent. I do not observe that my right hon. Friend or anybody on this Bench is able to order hon. Members on this side not to speak, when the Government do not want them to speak. If such orders were given, they would not be obeyed. The real truth is, that hon. Gentleman who sit on this side of the House are as little disposed to play the game of delay as if they sat on this Bench. They knew perfectly well what was the intention of a Motion of this character, which is a reproduction, and nothing but a reproduction, of the point already decided. We have said, both in and out of the House, that we are willing that this issue shall be judged by the arguments we have advanced. Hon. Members say they have not spoken enough on the question of redistribution and the franchise being joined together; we think we have; if they have more to say on the subject, we must let them say it. We can only listen, for we do not desire to reproduce the arguments which for seven days we offered. We think that seven days' argument on this question, followed by a Division with a majority of 130, is quite enough, and that all beyond that is simply a waste of time. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) invites us to go into the question of minority representation.

[First Night.]

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I have done nothing of the kind.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No; he has settled that for himself. He says that the House of Lords represents the minority in this House.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: No, I did not.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: However that may be, they may represent the Conservative minority; but they are not very admirable Representatives of a Liberal minority. How often have they ever been found to be so? However, I am not going to be led into that question. What we say is, that this House has decided that it will not connect in one Bill, neither in the manner proposed by the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire, nor in that proposed by the right hon. Member for Cambridge University, the two questions of the franchise and of redistribution. They have determined, by that majority, that they will take the two questions separately, one after the other. That was the question debated for seven days; that was the question then decided. In our opinion we have said all we desire to say, all that requires to be said; and we will be no party to a further waste of time by reviving a discussion practically identical with that which has occupied seven days of the time of this House.

MR. GIBSON: Sir, I was in hopes, from the earlier utterances and the earlier tone of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that he was going to perform the function unfamiliar to him of pouring oil upon the troubled waters; but, whether he got some practical suggestion which we could not witness, or whether the strength of his nature asserted itself, I do not know, but, unquestionably, towards the close of his speech he adopted a tone and used expressions that I do not think are calculated to restore harmony to our proceedings, or to promote an easy transit of this Bill through its present stage. To my mind, my hon. Friend who moved the adjournment of the debate (Mr. Brodrick) was not only within his right, but acted discreetly and with wisdom in the course that he took; and I, unquestionably, if this debate is allowed to close without some speech more in accordance with what the House has a right to expect, shall support him when he goes into the Division Lobby. I venture to think also that my hon. Friend will be followed there by every Member of the House of Commons who feels himself at liberty to support the requirements of public discussion and the decencies of ordinary Parliamentary debate. What has been the course adopted in reference to this, the greatest Bill introduced into Parliament during this century—a Bill which will not only reform the constitution of Parliament, but which will change almost all the constituencies and make an absolute revolution in Ireland? On this, the second most important stage of this great and vast Bill of stupendous dimensions, a Bill for which you have demanded the sympathy of Parliament and of the country, on the ground of the grandeur of its conceptions and the vastness of its scope—on the very first day of this stage, when one who is not a novice in Parliamentary debate, but one who for many years has been an honoured and distinguished Member of this House, who presided with dignity in the Chair as Deputy Speaker for a long period, and who made a speech which attracted attention on the second reading of this Bill, and commanded even the respect and attention of the Liberal Press—when he, with the weight of his authority and with a gravity of diction which the subject requires, gravely moves an Instruction to the Committee, how is he met? He is met by the Prime Minister in a speech of unrivalled shortness. I believe the space of time occupied by the right hon. Gentleman was within 10 minutes. But did he, in that time, condescend to use one single argument or one word of courteous recognition that it was a matter as to which those who felt strongly had a right to their opinions? Not at all. The Prime Minister would not attempt to argue the matter himself, protested against it being brought forward, and urged, as a piece of advice, that his followers should not be led into argument upon it. Is that the way to meet an important Motion, one as to which men feel strongly, and on which they have a right to hold very strong opinions? Both right hon. Gentlemen, the

[First Night.]

Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for the Home Department, have stated that this matter has been fully threshed out in the seven days' debate on the second reading; but that stage of the Bill only occupied a part of seven days. Sometimes those days were very short periods, especially when the debate did not commence until 8 and 9 o'clock. And why was that? Because the Government, in the earlier hours of the Sitting, would not give clear and frank answers to Questions addressed to them about Egypt. Those seven days, of course, were taken up in debating the Motion of my noble Friend (Lord John Manners), but the debate also turned upon the whole scope of the Bill; and any hon. Member who rose addressed his observations exactly as they struck his mind in reference to the measure. Some dealt with the Irish Question, some with redistribution, some with proportionate representation, and some with other points. Compare the period of seven days with the time occupied in discussing other Parliamentary Reform questions, and you will see an immense moderation of debate shown. ["Oh, oh!"] How many days were occupied in the debate on the introduction of the Reform Bill of 1832? I believe more than have been taken up by the whole discussion on the second reading of the present Bill. Take the Reform Bill of 1866, which was not so large a measure as the present Bill, and on which the Liberal Government of the day were signally defeated. Two days were occupied on the introduction, and eight days were taken up on the second reading. The debate on the Motion to go into Committee on that Bill extended over four days, and the catastrophe which overcame the Government did not take place until the Bill had been in Committee four days. Now, what is the case with regard to the present Bill? On this, the first night of the discussion on the Motion "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," the Prime Minister says that he will not debate the first Instruction to the Committee which has been presented in a serious Parliamentary speech; and he invites all his Followers to enter with him into an absolute conspiracy of silence. Is that treating the House of Commons, the Opposition, and the rights of debate with that fair and legitimate courtesy which we have a right to expect? One of the Resolutions on the Motion to go into Committee the Prime Minister picks out, and says that it should be discussed, and that the speeches should be reserved for it. On turning to the Notice Paper, I find that the Resolution stands there in the name of my right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of London. What is that Motion? I was surprised when I saw what it was. I think I may clearly assume that the Prime Minister was not joking. The Motion is absolutely, Sir, that you do not leave the Chair for a period of six months. Is not the Prime Minister playing with the House in making that suggestion? The right hon. Gentleman could say, with greater force upon that Motion than he could upon the Motion now before the House, that the question had been discussed and affirmed on the second reading. Then, again, what was really the nature of the argument of the Secretary of State for the Home Department? He used the words, "the game of delay." Were there ever words more ludicrously absurd addressed to that House? Everyone knows that when the right hon. Gentleman was speaking at Derby he did not venture on that kind of rhetoric, or say that there had been any delay in regard to this Bill. He talked very glibly about Obstruction, and the inconvenience of putting Questions, and said how they could be shortened; and yet, this very evening, he has given an answer occupying nearly a quarter of an hour with reference to his domestic affairs. If the truth is confessed, it seems to me that the Government are rather afraid that the Bill is going forward a little too quickly. Everyone knows that great pressure was used to enable the debate on the second reading to close at the time it did; and that there were many hon. Members on both sides of the House who desired to deliver speeches which they had carefully prepared and thought out, and which their constituencies expected them to deliver. It is, therefore, simply absurd to talk about the "game of delay," and to use the expression "waste of time." Both right hon. Gentlemen opposite have suggested that this is a topic of Obstruction; but the Conservative Party are not going to be, in the slightest degree, frightened by that. One hears of the cry of Obstruction every day. Weare getting almost tired of it. We cannot take up a letter written by any of the Prime Minister's Private Secretaries that does not contain some reference to it. I believe that those who have put down Amendments have not the faintest desire unduly to prolong the time for discussing the Bill at this stage, and, therefore, the charge of Obstruction cannot be brought against them. It is suggested by the Government that the Opposition have started the Egyptian troubles in order to kill the Reform Bill. That, I think, is one of the Derby prophecies. I never retort; but if I were to do so, I would suggest that the Government are trying to flog up an interest in the Reform Bill in order to kill the interest in Egypt. I have had no desire since I entered Parliament, and as long as I have the honour of a seat in Parliament I hope it will continue to be so—to prevent a debate taking its natural course without prolixity. I very much regret that the Prime Minister did not try to meet the Motion of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Raikes) in a manner more respectful to the House, and less hurtful to hon. Members on this side. We had a right to think that the question would be adequately debated, while those who entered into the discussion would make short speeches. I hope even now that some observations will be made by the Government which will indicate a desire and a permission that this debate should proceed like every other debate conducted with propriety in the House of Commons, and if some such indication is not given I shall be obliged to support the Motion of my right hon. Friend.

MR. GLADSTONE: I will endeavour, in the few observations I shall make, to avoid all heated expressions. I may not be very successful in pouring oil upon the troubled waters, but I will not add to the heat. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) and some others entirely misrepresented the words used by me, and put into my mouth words I never uttered, and which I entirely repudiate. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) did fairly represent what I said—that we, the Government, intended not to debate redistribution on the present occasion, and I advised all who would listen to my advice that they would act wisely if they did not debate it. That is now said to be an outrageous proceeding, and the minority say that they must have recourse to extraordinary measures, and that it may have the effect of stopping discussion on the subject altogether. There are, no doubt, very serious differences of opinion between us. We think we have introduced a Bill of great simplicity and moderation; that we framed it so as to conciliate all that can be conciliated; and it may be that proposals might be made in Committee which we should endeavour to meet in the same spirit in which we have framed the Bill. That is our case for claiming that this Bill should be fairly dealt with and fully discussed. "But," says the right hon. Gentleman who has made this rather remarkable Motion (Mr. Raikes), "this is a debate in extreme circumstances." "And," says the right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, "Look at the moderation of our proceedings as regards this Bill compared with what has been done on former occasions." I accept that challenge. What Bills does the right hon. and learned Gentleman refer to? What examples does he quote to justify what he is now doing, except a reference intended to show that upon two former occasions his own Party have done still worse?

MR. GLADSTONE: I was not concerned in any of those proceedings. I certainly belonged to that Party when it was a very different Party indeed from what it is now—when it was a Party under Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, and Lord Aberdeen. I have never been ashamed before Liberal audiences to refer to my connection with that Party. I have always said that, though I may have given votes at that period which I now regret, that that Party, in its high and honourable conduct, in its patriotism, in its contempt for un-Parliamentary proceedings, in its incapability of condescending, by indirect and unworthy means, to obtain its ends, was as pure and high-minded a Party as ever sat in this House. Now I come back to matters of fact. All that the right hon. and learned Gentleman can do to show the moderation of his Party is to point to what they did on two former occasions. The hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick) was much bolder. He referred to the Reform Bill of 1867, and he told us that it was debated for eight nights.

MR. BRODRICK: That I believed so; I meant the Reform Bill of 1866.

MR. GLADSTONE: No doubt the hon. Member believed so. The Reform Bill of 1866 was killed by Obstruction. It was killed by Obstruction at a period when the art of Obstruction was not nearly so fully developed into a fine art as it is now. It was then in a rude state. There was not the smallest idea of that Obstruction which is now pursued. The only idea of Obstruction then entertained was direct Obstruction by waste of time on the measure itself, whereas now an indirect method is adopted. I will come presently to the Bill of 1867. It is natural enough that we should look back to the course taken in years when Obstruction was not practised. In regard to the Bill of 1830, I do not believe that seven nights' debate was too much, or that it was an obstructive debate. It was the first time when a Government, except when Mr. Pitt was hardly out of his nonage, had taken up a measure of Parliamentary Reform, and the Bill then introduced went so far beyond expectation that the effect produced in the country was, according to the familiar expression, "a revolution." The right hon. and learned Gentleman should have told us what happened on that Bill. There were two nights on the introduction and seven nights on the second reading—that is, one week and one day—because the measures of the Government were then allowed to go on from day to day. The second measure of 1831 was introduced in one night. The Bill which finally passed was introduced in one night. The Bill of 1854 was introduced in one night. The Bill of 1859, when the Liberals were in Opposition, was introduced in one night. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: And debated eight nights on the second reading.] The Bill of 1860 was introduced in one night. The Bill of 1867 was introduced in one night; and the solitary example that can be quoted on the other side is the brilliant precedent of 1866, when the methods of Obstruction were most successfully pursued to their conclusion. The hon. Member for West Surrey said that eight nights were spent by the Liberals on the Bill of 1867. [Mr. BRODRICK: I did not say by the Liberals.] There were two nights, not eight nights. That was the way the Liberals treated their responsible opponents. One night was spent on the introduction, two nights on the second reading, one night on going into Committee, and of that one night a portion was occupied by a Motion of a Conservative Member. Now, that being so, I am not so sensible of the great moderation of hon. Gentlemen in spending only seven nights on the discussion of this Bill on the introduction and second reading. The Bill of 1867 was a Bill of the most insignificant character as regarded its operative power ever introduced into Parliament; but it was a Bill that contained a principle of enormous consequence that might have been debated for a long time. This Bill is really a sequel to the Bill of 1867. It simply applies in the counties the principle of the Bill of 1867, not as it was introduced, but as it was finally passed, and as it was supplemented by the Bills of 1868 and 1869. Under these circumstances, it does not appear to us that spending seven nights before the second reading on a Bill which is in the nature of a sequel, is a great proof of moderation as regards the consumption of the time of Parliament. However, we did not complain on that occasion. We heard the question of redistribution discussed through those seven nights. It is impossible to deny that, by far, the greater portion of those seven nights was spent in discussing that point. The question of minorities and other matters occupied not, I believe, four-fifths of a night. At the close of those seven nights, the House by a majority of 130 decided, what?—that it would refuse a Motion which simply asked that the Government plan of redistribution should be laid before it, not that it should be embodied in the Bill. That was the last act of the last night on which the Bill was before the House. That being so, this is the very next night on which we approach the subject, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Raikes), in the face of that majority, will not allow us to discuss the question of the Speaker's leaving the Chair, but insists that we shall again discuss the question of the insertion of redistribution in the Bill, which is a larger demand than that which the House rejected by a majority of 130. There is no reason for being hot about that matter, but we entertain a very strong opinion upon it. We think that there is evidence which appears to be conclusive upon a certain point which I need not again develop. What I have said is that we are not bound to play into your hands by creating a debate for you. The majority has decided that the scheme of redistribution should not be produced, and, therefore, a fortiori should not be embodied in the Bill. You, the minority, thereupon immediately make a Motion insisting that redistribution shall be placed in the Bill; and not only does the minority stop, and arrest entirely, and bring to a deadlock, the Bill approved by the majority, but it actually insists that the majority shall, by making speeches which it does not want to make, provide material for the minority. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said he believed I was in joke in referring to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor. For my part, I believe the right hon. and learned Gentleman must have been in joke throughout his whole speech. We are only using such means of defence as we have—very feeble, and ineffective means, I am sorry to say—in declining to supply to hon. Gentlemen opposite pabulum and fodder with which to spin out speeches for which otherwise they could not possibly find material. I think our proceedings are moderate, and that the proceedings on the other side of the House are immoderate, and we must assert the view that we take, by refusing to agree to this Motion.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister says it cannot be expected that the Government should play into the hands of their opponents. I think that we may also fairly say that we cannot be expected to play into the hands of the Government. We cannot approve the very remarkable position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman in not only objecting to my right hon. Friend's (Mr. Raikes's) proceedings; but in picking out among the Amendments the one which he considers the best suited for discussion, from the point of view of the Government, and recommending us to delay further discussion until we come to the Amendment of the Lord Mayor.

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not recommend that course to the right hon.

Gentleman or his Friends, but to those who sit on this side of the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I thought that the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman was addressed to us as well. It may suit the purposes of the Government very well to take the issue upon that Amendment; but then they will say, if you vote for it, you will kill the Bill. My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge asks the House in his Amendment to discuss a definite proposition, and I deny that his arguments are so trivial that they do not merit an answer. He says—"Bring forward your proposition, and let us discuss it." That proposition may be a good one, or a bad one, and the House may or may not entertain it; but I absolutely deny that, by what the House has done up to this point, it has pronounced on the question of redistribution. I absolutely deny that the argument of my right hon. Friend is of so trivial a character as to justify the Prime Minister in getting up and saying that he is not going to make any answer himself, nor that anyone on that side will. I assert that is not the way in which this matter should be treated. The right hon. Gentleman acknowledged that there were many hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House who desired to take part in the debate on the second reading, but who were induced to abstain from doing so, in order that time might not be lost. I spent myself many uncomfortable quarters of an hour in using efforts to induce hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House to keep silence. I cannot go into these comparisons with regard to how many days were spent on this occasion and on that; but even, according to the statement that has been made, there have been many occasions upon which an equal length of time has been spent. But there is always something peculiar in these cases; and, in this case, we are dealing with a measure of which the larger part is kept and buried in darkness. My noble Friend (Lord John Manners) in his Amendment on the second reading said—"We ask the House not to go on in the dark, but to insist upon having the whole plan of the Government." The Government said—"We will not produce our whole plan, and if you agree to the Amendment of the noble Lord you will stop the Bill." Consequently, many hon. Gentlemen felt that they could not vote for the Amendment of my noble Friend, because they were told that by so doing they would prevent the further progress of the Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University says—"You have chosen to take that position, and as you have chosen to say that you will not have the whole plan of the Government produced, let me at least point out the consequences, that this matter cannot be dealt with without dealing with redistribution," which is not raised in the question of my noble Friend. My right hon. Friend asks to be allowed to prove that redistribution must come, and that power shall be taken to include it in the Bill. That proposal is not met by arguments, but by a refusal on the part of the Prime Minister to enter into any discussion, as if the subject were not worth consideration. I think myself that, under the circumstances, the course proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick) is not unreasonable as marking our sense of the manner in which the Government are inclined to treat this question, and if he goes to a Division, I shall support him. I still hope, however, that the arguments of my right hon. Friend may be answered. Anyhow, whether they are answered or not, I think it is right that we should put on record our protest against this manner of conducting a Bill of this enormous importance.

Question put.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. ELTON, in supporting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Raikes), said, he hoped that, without laying himself open to charges of Obstruction, he would be permitted to make a few remarks on the intimate connection between the questions of redistribution and the franchise. The Prime Minister had held it out, as a bid to the Irish Party, that no reduction should be made in the number of Representatives to which Ireland was to be entitled; and he had also, in the course of his Mid Lothian campaign, promised that Scotland should have several more Members. In the present political complexion of Wales, it was not to be supposed that any Members would be taken from the Principality to make up the required number, nor was it to be supposed that the large towns of the North of England would lose any of their Representatives. Therefore, he was led to the conclusion that the South and West of England would be called upon to make up the deficiency which would ensue in carrying out that arrangement, by giving up some of their Members. Being connected with that part of the country he was naturally alarmed, and therefore earnestly protested against such a course being adopted. It was because this plan had been suggested, that he thought the House was entitled to fuller explanations of the policy of the Government than it had yet received. He maintained that the House ought not to pass this measure without getting a clue to the redistribution scheme, and that it was unwise to blindly increase the power of the Irish Nationalist Party. He thought the Prime Minister might have moderated his wild denunciations of those who only wished to secure what they thought to be right.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he rose, in his capacity as a Scottish Member, to say a few words on a Bill in which Scotland had, at the present time, a more than ordinary interest, and, also, because he felt very doubtful whether, under present arrangements, Scotland would ever receive the additional Members to which the Prime Minister had acknowledged she was entitled. The reason why he claimed for Scotland an interest in the Bill beyond that possessed by England or by Ireland was that, in any scheme of redistribution, or, to speak more correctly, in any fair scheme of redistribution, she alone could claim, in her capacity as a separate country, a considerable number of additional Representatives. He said advisedly as a separate country, because, although there were many populous places both in England and Ireland which were insufficiently represented at the present time, a remedy for the evil might easily be found, he thought, within the limits of those countries themselves. The Government ought to take Members from the small, decaying boroughs, and give them to the populous city or county. Scotland, so far as he was aware, had never been considered to be over-represented. On the contrary, there were many places in Scotland either insufficiently represented or not represented at all. No one, he thought, would be found to deny that upon any fair computation, whether based upon either population, property, or taxation, Scotland was entitled to at least some 10 or 12 additional Members. The question then arose whence those Members were to come, and where they were to be found. Many people in Scotland, including the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), were simple and sanguine enough to believe that Ireland might, in that respect, be made to satisfy all the just claims of Scotland. He (Major General Alexander) honestly confessed that he had not shared those opinions. How the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and those who agreed with him, could have been so simple as to suppose that Her Majesty's Government for a moment seriously contemplated the withdrawal of a single Representative from Ireland passed his comprehension. When, some months ago, the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Chancellor of the Exchequer made the gratuitous announcement that he was prepared to govern Ireland, not with cold justice, but with "sympathetic" justice, he (Major General Alexander) was convinced there lurked danger in that mysterious phrase; and he accordingly told his constituents that whatever "sympathetic" justice to Ireland might be supposed to mean, he would not be far wrong in assuming that it meant the greatest possible injustice both to England and to Scotland. A few weeks before the opening of Parliament the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), the man who, beyond all others in the Cabinet, was to manipulate the constituencies, let the cat out of the bag, and told them just what they might expect with regard to the maintenance of Irish Representation in that House. That statement shocked and alarmed even Liberal Scotch Members; and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy himself wrote a letter to The Scotsman, saying it had always been understood in Scotland that, in any scheme of redistribution, Scotland should gain, and Ireland, with a diminishing population, certainly lose some of her Members. But the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board well knew that any measure of Reform which did not include Ireland would encounter serious opposition in the House, and so he deliberately bid for the support of the hon. Members from Ireland. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was at present the master of many legions, and he would be master of many more when this Bill passed; and they could scarcely wonder if he used the power which was gratuitously and recklessly thrust into his hands by Her Majesty's Government. Before the Prime Minister introduced the Bill, he was informed that a certain number of the Scottish Liberal Members were inclined to withhold their support from the second reading of the Bill, unless they got a distinct guarantee from the Government that the claims of Scotland to additional representation would be allowed. He would ask those hon. Gentlemen whether the vague declaration of the Prime Minister, admitting that Scotland was entitled to such increase, really afforded any indication whatever, in the way of guarantee, that Scotland would obtain her just rights in this respect? The Prime Minister admitted that he was only speaking for himself, and that he could not be supposed to be binding his Colleagues, or that he could expect them to acquiesce in his views. The Prime Minister, however, had not given any satisfactory indication as to the source from which the additional Members for Scotland might be expected to come. Ireland, it was said, was quite out of the question; and for this reason. The people were expected to require a larger share of representation, according to the proportion of their distance from the seat of Government. He would ask whether the Prime Minister had ever seriously considered to what extent the logical application of that principle might carry him? Might not Orkney and Shetland, for instance, or the sparsely-populated county of Sutherland urge distance from Westminster with as much propriety as Ireland? The Prime Minister proposed to satisfy the claims of Scotland, either by the immolation of certain small boroughs in the South of England or by adding to the already unwieldy number of Members in the House. But he (Major General Alexander) would predict that Scotch Members would have to wait until the Greek Kalends before either of these objectionable alternatives were realized for the enlargement of the representation of Scotland in the House of Commons. Exactly four years ago the Prime Minister said, in Mid Lothian, that if Scotland were represented according to her population, she would have 70 Members instead of 60. Were those words to be acted upon? The answer to that question depended in great measure on the action of the Scotch Members, both Liberal and Conservative, and especially of Scotch Liberal Members. He had not, however, much faith in Scotch Liberal Members, not even in the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy himself. They would have, it was true, the benefit of his voice, but could they at a critical moment depend upon his vote? He (Major General Alexander) exhorted the Scotch Members, without distinction of Party, to stand shoulder to shoulder upon this occasion, to press vigorously on the Government the claims of Scotland to additional representation, and so take advantage of an opportunity which in the lifetime of the present generation might possibly never recur.

MR. RANKIN said, he regretted, on personal grounds, that he was unable to follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Raikes) into the Lobby. But political duty must be placed before private feeling. As the Representative of a small English borough (Leominster), he (Mr. Rankin) deemed it his duty to say a few words on this subject. In introducing this measure the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister appealed to the Members who sat for small boroughs not to be selfish; and if it was only the Members themselves who were concerned, he (Mr. Rankin) would be ready to agree. But it was the constituencies that had to be considered; and, in his (Mr. Rankin's) judgment, they could not be fairly taunted with selfishness, if they made some struggle for existence. As representing one of the small boroughs of the West of England, he should endeavour to withstand every attempt to bring about their political extinction. He voted for the Amendment moved by the noble Lord on the Front Opposition Bench (Lord John Manners), because it asked the Government to place the whole of their redistribution scheme before the House; but he was unable to support the present Amendment, which evidently aimed at taking Members from the smaller constituencies and giving them to the large ones. That was a method which, on behalf of his own constituency, he could not altogether agree to. If Ireland was to be left unaltered as to her representation, it was manifestly unfair to deprive the small and loyal English boroughs in the South and West of England of their Representatives. Ireland had 16 boroughs where the number of electors was under 500. In England there were only 23 boroughs with less than 1,000 electors, and none with less than 500. Dealing evenly and justly between the three countries, and taking the four tests of population, taxation, number of voters, and rateable value, the figures worked out in the following manner:—

| | England and Wales. | Scotland. | Ireland. | Total. |
|------------------------|--------------------|-----------|----------|--------|
| Population .. | 490 | 70 | 98 | 658 |
| Taxation .. | 526 | 72 | 60 | 658 |
| Number of Voters .. | 547 | 66 | 46 | 658 |
| Rateable value .. | 534 | 72 | 52 | 658 |
| Mean of the above 4 .. | 524 | 70 | 64 | 658 |
| Present state .. | 493 | 60 | 105 | 658 |
| Difference of .. | 31 | 10 | 41 | |

Showing, as a conclusion, that England should gain 31 Members; Scotland should gain 10; and Ireland should lose 41. All he (Mr. Rankin) asked for was justice between the three countries, and that the English small boroughs should not be sacrificed to meet the wants of the larger centres of population, when the Irish constituencies were left undisturbed. Small boroughs had, in times past, been the means of bringing into public life many men of eminence who otherwise probably would not have succeeded in obtaining seats in the House of Commons, as, for example—

Again, it might be urged that the possession of Members by small towns had a tendency to keep up centres of population in the country districts; and that, in his opinion, was a very desirable object to be encouraged. He feared, moreover, that if they ceased to have Parliamentary Representatives, their interests would be liable to be overlooked, if not sacrificed.

MR. WHITLEY: After what has been said, we can hardly expect hon. Gentlemen opposite to listen to anything in the shape of argument; but I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who believe that the House does not realize sufficiently the importance of the measure before it, or the importance of the Amendment moved by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Raikes), and I regret this very much. I think what the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said some time ago has been forgotten—namely, that the Bill before the House was the most important that had been discussed since 1867; and I think it strange that the Government should find fault with us for endeavouring to bring before the House and the country the reasons why we think it inexpedient to pass this measure without a redistribution scheme. Representing, as I do, a very large constituency, largely composed of the working classes, I should be the first to welcome the admission of the working classes to the franchise. I believe they would exercise the franchise with wisdom and discretion; but, at the same time, I think it is important, with a measure which seeks to enfranchise 2,000,000 of our fellow-subjects—a larger addition than has previously been made to the franchise at any time—that we should consider well the point at which we have arrived. There is one point which it seems to me has been lost sight of in the discussion. It is continually said—"Why do you on that side fear a greater admission of the working classes to the franchise?" In answer, I deny that we have any such fear. But the House forgets that, in all former extensions of the franchise, the distinction was kept up between the county and the borough; and, whether the Reform Bill was passed by Liberals or Conservatives, it was always felt that one part acted as the counterpoise of the other. Now, however, for the first time, we are going to pass a measure which destroys all distinction, and makes an equal franchise. The question, then, the House and the country have to face is this—Are we to say that multitudes, and multitudes only, are, in the future, to exercise a controlling voice in the destinies of the country? The Prime Minister said that the object of the Bill was to strengthen the foundations of the country, and, by the addition of a large number of capable citizens to the franchise, to add to the greatness of the country. I agree in the wish that the foundations of the country should be strengthened by the admission of large numbers of our fellow-citizens to the franchise; but I think, when you are embarking for the first time on a new enterprise, and when the result may be perilous on account of the addition of numbers, we have a right to consider well our position, and to see whether the change should not be made in such a manner as to secure that which the Prime Minister said he desired. But to-night we have not one word from the other side as to any safeguard in the admission of these numbers. We have no statement whatever, and, therefore, we are driven to rely on former statements. The hon. and learned Attorney General, speaking some months ago to his constituents, said he could be no party to a measure which would destroy the rural votes of the country. But, under this Bill, will there be any guarantee that the rural votes will not be destroyed and out-numbered by the working-class vote of the great manufacturing centres of the North? For my own part, I believe the greatness, the wealth, the prosperity, and the contentment of the country depend on all classes being represented and having a vote, and, with that vote, the exercise of real electoral power. We were told by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War that, if he believed it would disfranchise the present voters, he would be no party to a scheme of electoral districts. To my mind, those were very assuring words indeed; but very soon afterwards, on the next evening, up jumped the right hon. Gentleman opposite the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), and told the House he was in favour of the principle of electoral districts, or, if the matter was left in his hands, he would manipulate a plan better still. I should be very sorry, for my own part, to leave the destinies of the country to the manipulation of the President of the Board of Trade, or to any other individual. I believe it is not the duty of this House to commit the destinies of this country to one individual; but I am prepared to entertain some form of redistribution of electoral power combined with proportional representation. Everyone, both on this side and the other side of the House, has a duty to perform; and I feel we should be failing in our duty if we did not insist, as far as possible, that we should have some statement from the Government on the question of redistribution. What will be the effect if we pass this Bill without any such scheme? Does anyone believe that, if the House passes the Bill, there will be a Redistribution Bill in the present Parliament? We do not think so. We believe there will be a Dissolution; and then do you think that the New Parliament will, immediately after its own Election, vote its own Dissolution? Nothing of the kind. For my part, if the Bill applies equally to the whole country, and if any scheme is propounded which can guard the interest of the rural population in which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Raikes) is so deeply interested, I should welcome the admission of the working classes to the franchise. I have trusted the working classes, and I know them well, and I believe they would exercise the franchise with wisdom. But it is a very different thing indeed when you come to transfer the voting power of the country to one class—namely, the working men. We do not believe this Bill will be of value to the labourer and the agricultural interest; and when you speak of the agricultural labourer being benefited by the measure, we do not believe they will be anything of the sort. We believe that they will be trampled upon and swamped by the vote of the great masses in the large towns, and that the labourers and the agricultural interest and the tenant farmers will feel that, while you have given them the promise of a vote, you have not given them any electoral power at all. I shall vote against the Bill, because I believe that will be the effect of it. I believe it is a dangerous measure in the interests of the country, which I am sure all love so well. I believe it is the duty of the Government and this House to strengthen the national institutions of the country. I believe that, in strengthening and expanding the boundaries of the Constitution, we are doing much to preserve our greatness in the future; because I am anxious to remove every complaint which could possibly arise. I do not object to any extension of the franchise in reason; but, at the same time, I ask the House to pause before it passes this Bill, which may be of advantage to enormous classes, but may destroy other classes. The greatness and prosperity of the country do not depend upon the simple mass of people, but upon all classes having a thorough and proper representation. Those measures are the wisest which secure the equal rights of all. Because I believe this measure will sacrifice the rights of many of our fellow-countrymen, I, for one, will not consent to pass this Bill, unless it is accompanied, as I have said, with a scheme of redistribution or some scheme of proportional representation by which the interests of all classes can be secured. For these reasons I shall vote against the Bill.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that, being among those hon. Members who had been crowded out on the second reading, he was anxious now to say a few words. As one of the few Members of that House who had steadily opposed and had voted against the Bill of 1867, he wished to enter his protest against this measure. In doing so he should be only proving his consistency. His view at the time was that Lord Beaconsfield made a mistake in bringing in the Reform Bill of 1867; but, owing to the course which was taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and his Friends, the Bill left the House as a Household Suffrage Bill pure and simple; but he had never attempted—not holding that there existed such a thing as finality in matters of Parliamentary Reform—to say that finality was reached when the measure of 1867 was passed. He was not, however, unreasonable, and did not stoutly oppose all necessity for change; but he thought the time had come when, if hon. Members thought the time had come at which a new Reform Bill was necessary, it should be passed—if passed at all—with certain Provisos by which the rights of property, intelligence, and, he might add, the just representation of the agricultural interest, should be preserved. The main fault that he found with the Bill was that it would enfranchise numbers at the expense of intelligence and property, and that it would intensify what already existed—namely, the inequality between representation and taxation. Let the House consider what it was about to do. If the Bill was passed it would increase the number of persons exercising the franchise from 2,000,000 to 5,000,000, of whom 4,000,000 would belong to what were described as the wage-earning or working classes; and what did they pay in the way of taxation? They contributed, undoubtedly, to the Customs Duties paid on tobacco, tea, and alcoholic spirits; but those were about the only forms of taxation which they bore, and the result of passing the Bill would be that the upper and middle classes would pay at least two-thirds of the taxation, and would be numerically not more than a fifth of the electors. He had no distrust of the working class as a class; but he could not help thinking that to put so great a power into their hands would not only offer to them an enormous temptation, but would have the same effect upon those men who led or professed to lead and guide them—among them being Mr. George and Mr.

Davitt, whose examples would not, he hoped, be followed. He hoped there was no danger, and he had sufficient confidence in his countrymen to believe there was no danger, of anything approaching to revolution; but he looked with apprehension on a proposal which would put the greater part of the political power in the hands of the working classes, leaving the middle and upper classes to pay the greater part of the taxation. That apprehension was heightened when he considered the extreme Democratic views which had been advocated by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and by some hon. Members supporting Her Majesty's Government; for instance, the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) had declared himself in favour of free education, a free breakfast table, and—

MR. SPEAKER, interposing, said: I am sorry to interrupt the noble Lord; but the noble Lord is going rather far from the Instruction to the Committee.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: I beg pardon if I have exceeded my bounds; but I understood I was at liberty to debate the whole question.

MR. SPEAKER: It is not in Order to refer to the whole question of the Franchise Bill, which is not now before the House. The Motion before the House is, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee," which is a substantive Motion by itself; and the discussion ought properly to be confined to the terms of that Instruction, which are the provision for the redistribution of seats and the representation of populous urban sanitary districts at present unrepresented.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, there had been very few opportunities of getting a hearing on the principle of the Bill, and he thought he might conveniently do so now. He had in vain attempted to speak on the second reading, and he was naturally not desirous of postponing his remarks until the third reading, or to some future stage of the measure. The state of Ireland was very far from satisfactory. They had not yet done with the Coercion Bill; it came to an end next year, and when that took place they would see the effect its removal would have. The land legislation of 1870 was by no means a success, otherwise further legislation would not have so soon be deemed necessary. Nor had the Disestablishment of the Irish Church had the desired effect of reconciling the people to their condition. Looking at the facts as they were, he could not say that recent legislation had done anything towards creating a better feeling and a more contented feeling throughout the country than that which existed in former days. He would not refer to the legislative Business alone in that House. Wherever they went, they had heard a great deal lately in the speeches of right hon. Gentlemen about the House of Commons not being what it used to be; that the Business of the House was interrupted in every possible way; that personalities and trivialities were indulged in; that there was a plague of Questions; and that there must be a very great change, for things could not go on much longer as they had been going on. A system of deterioration, almost of decay and a want of tone, had undoubtedly come upon them, and deserved the utmost consideration. But his point was, whether that state of things would improve under their new Franchise Bill. He believed the result would be quite the contrary, and he looked forward with dread to the change. He was lately comparing the opinions of Mr. Walter Bagehot, who died only a few years ago, as expressed in the last edition of his works, with the opinions of the present Liberal Party. Mr. Bagehot was considered a representative Liberal a short time ago; but now his opinions would be more suitable to the Opposition Benches, for he was opposed to the indiscriminate extension of the franchise. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) very properly dwelt upon the great change in the constitution of Parties since the carrying of the 1867 Redistribution Bill. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) confessed to sharing those feelings which the right hon. Gentleman had expressed with so much eloquence. He also had seen great changes. Within a very short time he had seen, on his own side of the House, surrender and compromise over and over again; and he had seen even a new Party arise there—a Party which had been termed the Tory Democratic Party. He knew what a Tory Party was, and what was a Democratic Party; and he understood opinions which, if expressed on the other side of the House, would be called Radical; but a Tory Democratic Party was an entirely new feature in political life. Again, he had also seen many changes on the other side of the House. He had noticed that there now was, in particular, on the Ministerial Benches, a want of that independence which they used to look for in all quarters of the House—a want he very much grieved for. Whether it was due to the action of the Caucus or not he could not say; but, undoubtedly, there was a lack of independence such as existed in former days, and which they had witnessed on that very evening. That was not the only occasion on which they had observed it. Both inside and outside the House, hon. Members submitted to the lash of the whip directly and indirectly, and in a manner that they would not have submitted to in former days. Were these things to be better in the future? He believed they would be worse, and that so-called Members of Parliament would sink their opinions, and become mere delegates. He deplored the absence of independence, as well as of dignity, and consideration for others, in their remarks. Now, he would come to the question of redistribution. Those who represented agricultural counties; who had always had among them farmers descending from the ancient tenantry, who had been upon the land for generations past, they, as well as the tenants, felt that they were to be swamped out of existence. He would like to call the attention of the Prime Minister to some language used by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War on March 24, admitting that this measure, if it passed into law, would terminate the supremacy which had till then existed in the county elections in such tenant farmers. In other words, the existing tenant farmers would be swamped; and yet those tenant farmers were just as fit as a class as the working classes, into whose hands the Government proposed to place so much power. Formerly the tenant farmers had some sort of counterpoise given them; but now they were to be deprived of what they had enjoyed for centuries, without any countervailing advantage. There was nothing in the shape of redistribution, as far as they had yet seen, that could be counted on and worked out, further than this—that they knew that the small agricultural boroughs of the South of England, which had represented the tenant farmers and the agricultural class, were to be taken away and given to Scotland, to Ireland, and to the North of England. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon had told them, the other day, that 35 constituencies, represented by 60 Members, were to be taken away from the counties and given to the urban population. When they looked at the number of county Members in England, Scotland, and Ireland as compared with the number of urban Members, they would find that both in Ireland and in Scotland the county Members exceeded the borough Members; but in poor England the county Members were in a minority of more than 100. The fact was that the English counties were most unjustly under-represented; and before the electorate was so largely increased as was now proposed he thought that the Prime Minister was bound first to redress that inequality as a mere matter of right. It would be something if the right hon. Gentleman would give the House some information—something that could be weighed and examined—as to what was to be done, for at present he had told them nothing. The Prime Minister had only said—"Put your trust in the people." He (Lord Eustace Cecil) would ask the right hon. Gentleman to trust the House of Commons, which represented the people; and if he did not put his trust in it, then he would ask him to dissolve it, and appeal to the people. But at present the right hon. Gentleman seemed to trust neither the House of Commons, nor the present electorate, and therefore it was that he brought in a Franchise Bill without a measure of redistribution. Could the right hon. Gentleman, then, be surprised at their making the resistance which they had made? In his speech in introducing the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman exhorted them "not to wander on the hill-tops of speculation"—in other words, that they were to swallow the Bill as a whole and take a leap in the dark. For his own part, he (Lord Eustace Cecil) had taken one leap in the dark, and he had no desire or intention to take another. The resistance of the Opposition had been magnified ten-fold by the manner in which the Prime Minister had approached the subject. If their fears were idle, as they were told by the supporters of the Government, and if the right hon. Gentleman really wished this measure to be accepted by the House, the country, and the agricultural Members, he should take them into his entire confidence, and not merely into a portion of it, and then he would not find the Tory Party so unreasonable as he thought. They were ready to let bygones be bygones, and adapt themselves to the times; but they did not like to be led blindfold to a precipice, and then thrown down without knowing what was at the bottom of it. The right hon. Gentleman could dispel that fear by putting the whole of his plan before them. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) might be told that he was too late, like all that the Government had done in Egypt, or that there was some other plausible reason, which the Prime Minister knew so well how to enunciate, why their pleading should not be listened to; but that he had heard in 1867, and would very possibly hear again. He maintained it would be found that the Bill of the Prime Minister, if passed in its present form, would, instead of removing the anomalies that existed, create others far greater than any that were now to be found. The Franchise Bill by itself left a number of anomalies behind it, and he could not help thinking that the Prime Minister's famous "flesh and blood" speech of 1865 was always coming back to his mind, and that either the Prime Minister, or his Successor on the Liberal side, whoever he might be, would find out that there was some very good reason why the anomalies of the Bill of 1884 should be redressed. In the anomalies of the service franchise, as established by the present Bill, it might be discovered that there was a good excuse, sooner or later, to go into manhood suffrage, and then to womanhood suffrage, and so on, perhaps, to childhood suffrage. The right hon. Gentleman told them it was a Bill founded on an Imperial basis; but he (Lord Eustace Cecil) must confess that after carefully listening to all that had been said, he thought the Government had not succeeded in refuting the charge made against them that that Bill was brought in for a Party purpose, and for a Party purpose alone. The Secretary of State for the Home Department not very long ago talked of something that had been done on the Opposition side of the House as "a dirty trick," and the right hon. Gentleman was very properly called to Order, as he (Lord Eustace Cecil) also should be, if he now made use of the same language. But he could not help thinking that the introduction of this measure had very much the appearance of a trick; and he could only hope that before the Bill had proceeded very much further there, either some alteration would be made, or some explanation on the part of the Government would be given. What hon. Gentlemen sitting on his side complained of was that, whatever arguments they put forward, they got little or no response. If they said they were not fairly dealt with, it was regarded as the idle wind. Indeed, he did not remember that any Opposition had been treated in the way they had been; because, whatever they said or did, they were always met with the parrot cry that they were guilty of "wanton Obstruction." Considering that that Bill was admitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be one of the greatest revolutions that had been proposed in this country since 1688, it was but right, but fair, but generous, that the Party opposite, who had been able to command—he did not say how—a majority of 180, should, at least, give their opponents credit for feeling strongly about that Bill, for desiring to put every aspect of it before the House and the country, so that, at all events, there should be no precipitate action in the matter, and that, if such should be the will of the country and of Parliament, they should arrive at a real and fair settlement of that question, for a mere one-sided settlement of it must either sooner or later recoil on its authors, or, perhaps, end in the practical destruction of all their Parliamentary institutions. He, therefore, hoped that the Government would not persist in the policy they had hitherto pursued, of refusing them information as to the redistribution of seats, but would take them into their confidence. As things, however, stood at present, he was unwillingly compelled to support the Resolution of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), because he felt that the action of the Government in this matter was fraught with injustice not only to property and intelligence, but especially to the agricultural interest, which, he was convinced, would be completely swamped if that Franchise Bill only was allowed to pass in its present shape.

Mr. ECROYD said, he intended to give his hearty support to the Instruction moved by the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes). In districts like that in which he (Mr. Ecroyd) resided, the effect of giving the franchise by the extension of the boundaries of boroughs, or by the creation of new boroughs in populous centres, would be extremely different, and, he thought, more just, as well as more acceptable to the working classes, than the bare extension of the franchise in the manner proposed by the Bill. It was popularly supposed that the Bill would place householders in country districts outside boroughs in exactly the same position as householders in boroughs; but, though theoretically that might be the case, it was not so in practice. A man, for example, who lived in a borough and owned his own and another house, would have a double share of political power as compared with the man who lived in the country outside a borough, and there owned his own and another house. There were tens of thousands of working men living in the country who were in that position, and who were just as worthy of a second vote as their fellow-working men in boroughs, and who would feel their position under this Bill, should it become law, to be a great grievance. In Lancashire they had outside the boroughs a population of 1,500,000, of whom 850,000 were an urban population, precisely similar in character and occupation to the inhabitants of the boroughs, and 650,000 were a rural population. Working men who, by industry and self-denial, had saved money and become owners of property could not understand why, in a Bill said to be founded on principles of absolute justice, and which was presented to the House as a final settlement of that question, their neighbours in the boroughs were to be left with a double share of political power as compared with their own. There was nothing of which the working man was more justly proud than of the second vote which he enjoyed as the owner of property; it was, so to speak, his patent of nobility; and nothing could be more calculated to strike a severe blow at the moral development of the working population than to reduce the provident and the improvident to the same political level. Again, there were two forms of taxation in this country—Imperial taxation and local rates. The burden of the former was gradually diminishing; while that of the latter was constantly on the increase. It would be a very dangerous thing to hand over the control of that legislation, which in many cases enforced an increase of local taxation, to a class which contributed little or nothing to that rapidly-increasing burden. Unless the measure was one which would establish absolute justice as between dwellers in town and country, it would not be acceptable to the working classes. There was no danger in the addition to the franchise of all householders, if this sufficient safeguard were provided, as had been done by the late Lord Beaconsfield in 1867. For 10 or 15 years he (Mr. Ercroft) had consistently advocated the extension of the franchise to every householder; but he hoped it would be extended as far as possible in the just and safe manner proposed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University. Unless some such course were adopted there would be great danger in passing the Bill. It was because he believed the Amendment of his right hon. Friend would tend in some degree to secure the end he wished to see gained that he should cheerfully vote for it.

MR. MACFARLANE said, that anyone who had listened to the opposition to the Bill, assuming it to be sincere, must have discovered that what hon. Members on the Opposition side feared was not the Bill before the House, but a Bill which was to come after it. They feared decimation, and did not know upon whom the lot would fall. He had a Motion which was preferable, he thought, as the smaller evil, to the other remedies for the difficulty which had been proposed; and that was, instead of taking Members from England, to add a small number to the Members of the House. When the present number was fixed the population of the country was only half of what it was now. In that way the controversies with respect to Ireland and the just claims of Scotland might be settled. If 10 or 12 Members were added, there would be no material inconvenience to the House, and a difficulty would be cleared out of the way.

MR. GREGORY said, that, so far as he had been able to gather from public opinion in the district he represented, the general feeling amongst those proposed to be enfranchised was one of indifference, of those who possessed the franchise one of apprehension. It could hardly be otherwise, and the constituencies there in the Southern counties of England could not but view the Bill with some feeling of dread. They were apprehensive of the very shadowy and indefinite character of the redistribution scheme which was set forth by the Government; and they desired to emphatically protest against Members being taken from the South of England in order that Ireland should be left as it now was. In the county which he represented there were several boroughs which had always been loyal to their country, and had done their duty in returning valuable Members to the House. One of them was now sitting on the Treasury Bench. Those constituencies were as worthy of consideration as any in the country. The larger boroughs must, no doubt, have an increased representation, and Scotland was fairly entitled to a larger number of Members. But they had been told that Ireland was still to retain her present representation. He protested against that determination on the part of the Government. He had been at some pains to ascertain the number of Members to which Ireland, taking population and contribution to the Revenue, was entitled. He had been much assisted by a pamphlet on the subject which had been published by a learned counsel, a friend of his own; and he was quite prepared to adopt and stand upon his calculations. Now, he would take three elements on which the representation of Ireland might be based—namely, the electorate, the contribution to Imperial taxation, and the population of the country. Taking the first of these on the new franchise, as far as the number of voters could be ascertained the proper proportion of Members for the Three Kingdoms would be as follows:—England, 488; Wales, 28; Scotland, 66; Ireland, 70. The second element of calculation—namely, the contribution to the burdens of the country—gave the following result:—namely, England, 522 Members; Wales, 18; Scotland, 69; Ireland, 43. The population test, no doubt, gave a somewhat different result, which was as follows:—England, 460 Members; Wales, 25; Scotland, 70; Ireland, 96. But by combining these different modes of calculation, and taking the mean of them, they arrived at a fair and legitimate result, which gave:—For England, 490 Members; Wales, 24; Scotland, 68; Ireland, 70. And this, he contended, would be the proper proportion of Members to be allotted to the three countries on any fair and just scheme of redistribution. Now, with respect to the Bill generally, it appeared to him to involve most uncertain and, it might be, dangerous elements. They were told to trust the people; but he could not place implicit confidence in a new electorate of 2,000,000, of whom they knew little or nothing. He already saw measures of a very Democratic, if not a Socialistic, character promoted and advocated in the House—measures affecting the rights of property and freedom of contract in the most vital manner—supported by those who were, or hoped to be, Members for large constituencies, and some of those on his own side of the House as well as on the other. He could not but contemplate with alarm and apprehension the action of the new constituency upon these and kindred subjects; and he feared that they might be supported by a pressure which would be irresistible. For these reasons, he thought that they ought to have some more definite knowledge as to the future redistribution, so that they might know how far they were going, and what would be the constitution of this Assembly when the work of Parliamentary Reform was completed.

Mr. THOMAS COLLINS, who had on the Paper a Notice of a Motion—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to enlarge the scope of the Bill so as to include the redistribution of Seats in the United Kingdom,”

said, he thought the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had made some uncalled-for remarks about the mechanical majority of the Government and the declaration of the Prime Minister as to silence being observed. Such silence never did any good to a Party with the country. In 1859, when a Vote of Censure on Mr. Disraeli was moved, word was passed in the usual way that the supporters of the Government were not to speak. It was a “mechanical majority,” and it obeyed; and nine Members spoke in succession from the side of the Liberal Opposition. One of those Members subsequently became a Judge in England, another a Judge in Ireland, and a third was elevated to the House of Peers; and he hoped some of the speakers of to-night would have equal good fortune. The Prime Minister said that speeches on the principle of the Bill might be reserved for the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor, that the House go into Committee that day six months; but the Lord Mayor might be induced by pressure not to propose that Amendment; and it was, therefore, rather hard that those who could not speak on the second reading should be charged with Obstruction for availing themselves of this, probably their only opportunity. It was very difficult, indeed, for a serious politician like himself to speak upon a Bill of this kind, because he considered the measure to be one which had been brought in by a weak, feeble, and discredited Government. Everybody inside that House, and everybody who occupied a seat in “another place,” and everyone outside Parliament, knew very well that the Ministry had produced a still-born child; that already it was as dead as a door-nail, and had no chance of finding a place on the Statute Book. He protested against the introduction of a Franchise Bill which did not contain clauses dealing with redistribution. In 1858 a certain right hon. Gentleman, speaking at Birmingham, urged that, whenever a Reform Bill was brought forward, they should never take their eyes off the subject of redistribution. And the same right hon. Gentleman said at Bradford, in 1859, that redistribution was the very soul and marrow of the question. That was the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the middle Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright). In short, there was a catena of authorities, from 1832 downwards, all coming to the same conclusion—that the two questions ought to be dealt with together. When Mr. Disraeli brought in his Bill, he tried to conciliate the county Members by retaining a high franchise for the counties, and to bribe the borough Members by saying—for he was a master of Parliamentary jargon—that “no centre of representation " should be wholly disfranchised. The consequence was that the Representatives of the small boroughs all supported him. The Prime Minister was now doing the same thing in an exaggerated form. His Bill was a thoroughly dishonest measure from end to end; but, at the same time, it was undoubtedly extremely popular with hon. Members opposite. It held out to the borough Members the prospect that, for one Election more, their seats should be left untouched. But the Bill went hammer and tongs at the county Members, who would come back by-and-bye—those who would come back rari nantes in gurgite vasto; while the borough Members would return untouched, because the Bill was not made for them. Conservative Members were not opposed tooth and nail to the extension of the franchise in the counties. That was not their game. They would go to the country upon the cry of a packed House of Commons. They would say that the borough Members shrank from any Bill which would interfere with their seats, and therefore they made a raid upon the county Members. Whether the majority was 130 or 300 was all the same. The Party opposite would not bring in a fair Bill, and the Party on that side meant to make them. He thought the Bill of Mr. Disraeli went too far so far as related to the extension of the suffrage in boroughs, but not half far enough so far as it related to the redistribution of seats. He would not say that it had improved the House, and he did not see any prospect of improving the House by an extension of the franchise. But after the Tory surrender in 1867 they must make the best of the circumstances in which they found themselves, and they would be obliged to give a large extension of the suffrage. A vast deal too much had been said of the over-representation of Ireland, and very exaggerated fears had been raised on the subject. He was disposed to recognize the right of Ireland to the number of Representatives fixed by the Act of Union. But he would take away the five extra Members which were given to Ireland by the Act of 1832. In England each Member, on an average, represented 53,000 persons; in Ireland each Member represented 50,000; and in Scotland each Member represented 62,000; so that Scotland was much under-represented. But Wales had a Member for every 45,000, and was manifestly over-represented. He would strongly protest against any Members being taken from England, which was the most intelligent, thriving, and industrious part of the Kingdom. Five or 10 Members ought to be taken from Wales, in addition to those from Ireland, and given to Scotland; but none from England, seeing that it was not over-represented, as the two former countries he had referred to were. When the redistribution scheme was settled, another thing they ought to get rid of was the system by which they got over-representations of majorities. He should, therefore, like to see the two-Member constituencies abolished, for he thought no two Members of the same sort should be returned from the same place. Why should a majority be doubly represented? As to the question of the representation of minorities, he knew it was a subject which many hon. Members did not like. It was said that among other great authorities, who had been opposed to this scheme of the representation of minorities was the late Mr. Disraeli, and there was a famous saying of his that minorities ought to make themselves majorities. But everybody knew perfectly well that Mr. Disraeli was one of those persons who thought that the good of his Party ought entirely to outweigh every other consideration. ["Oh, oh!"] Mr. Disraeli naturally conceived that the good of his Party was the good of the country; and that he was opposed to the representation of minorities was shown by the system he adopted, when he brought in his Reform Bill, of trisecting many of the counties, rather than bisecting those counties which returned two Members each—for instance, the counties of Essex, Surrey, Norfolk, and Cheshire were made to return six Members each, and those counties returned 24 Conservatives. But if Mr. Disraeli had gone on the opposite line of bisecting them, and had given a minority Member to each, those counties, instead of returning 24 Conservative Members, would only have returned 16 and counted for 8. Probably that would have been a much fairer representation; but it was one that was not satisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). He, therefore, waited until the Bill got into the House of Lords, and allowed Lord Cairns to insert an Amendment, giving these limited votes to constituencies returning three Members each, which afterwards became the law of the land. No one could doubt that it was unfair to carry out this system of representation of minorities in a few places only, and not universally. In the same way, it was unfair to the inhabitants of the borough of Leeds that they should count no more than the inhabitants of a large number of small boroughs whose representation was based upon a different system; but if the system had been carried out pretty universally, there would have been nothing unfair in it. He (Mr. T. Collins) lived in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and in the West Riding, at the last General Election, six Liberal Members were returned to Parliament—if, in reality, they could be called genuine Liberals. However, be that as it might, the West Riding returned six Members to Parliament; and the number of persons who voted for them was, excluding odd figures, 31,000; while the voters for the Conservative candidates numbered 25,000. Therefore, in round numbers, the Liberal electors in the West Riding had one Member for 5,000, while the 25,000 Conservatives had none. Would anybody contend that that was a bond fide representation, where 30,000 electors had one Representative to each 5,000, and the other 25,000 had none at all? If they had a system of minority representation, such as existed at Leeds, the minority would have returned at least three Members, which would have been one for every 8,000 voters, while the majority would have returned one for every 5,000 voters. Even in that case the majority would have been considerably over-represented; but the discrepancy would not have been so gross as it was at present. Therefore, he contended that what was really wanted was to deal with the question as a whole. He had some experience of the working of the minority system, because he had been a Member of the London School Board, and the School Boards were all elected on that principle, under the system of cumulative voting. The principle adopted there was that the majorities should rule, but that the minorities ought to be heard. There was another question which also merited some attention at the hands of the House—namely, the question of extending the boundaries of boroughs. A good deal might be done in that direction. To confer upon a man a vote was said to have an educational tendency. It made him a man and a brother, and had a good effect upon him. He wanted, then, to know, if it was calculated to have a good effect upon the voter, why the right hon. Gentleman opposite threw out the recommendations of the Boundary Commissioners in 1867? The Boundary Commissioners in 1867 proposed to enfranchise a large proportion of the people, and to add them to the boroughs. Lord Eversley—a Liberal—was at the head of the Commission; Sir Francis Crossley, who sat at the time for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and was also a Liberal, and the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), another Liberal, were Members of the Commission. In point of fact, the majority of the Commission were Liberals; but, in the most bare-faced manner, the Opposition refused to give effect to the recommendations of the Commissioners, and the result was that, for 15 years, a large number of those who were now to be enfranchised had been kept out of the franchise. He would give the House an instance. The Boundary Commissioners proposed to add the town of Leamington to the borough which was at present represented by the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair—namely, Warwick. Why was it that the inhabitants of Leamington had been deprived of the franchise for 15 years by the Liberal Party opposite? He thought they had a great right to complain. It was part of the jargon and cant of the Liberal Party in the House to talk of the wrongs to which their fellow-men were subjected, and then to rob them of their rights. The Liberal Party took very good care that Leamington should not be represented as a borough constituency, and in the teeth of the recommendations of the Boundary Commissioners in their Report they declined to connect Leamington with Warwick. They thought it would answer their purposes better, the borough of Warwick being already quite Liberal enough for those that liberalize the counties by maintaining large boroughs within them. They all knew what that sort of thing meant. He was himself a Party man, and of course, when he saw that this Bill was to be a single-barrelled Reform Bill, he could not believe it, because he thought the Government were far too good tacticians to bring in such a palpable fraud upon the people of England. He thought they would bring in a reasonable Bill, disfranchising any place with a population less than 20,000, and taking one Member from a place with less than 40,000; and when they submitted this single-barrelled Bill, he said at once—"The Lord hath delivered them into our hands." "Hoc Ithacus velit et magus mucentur Atreida." The same game was played in 1852. In 1852 the borough Members were sent to the country on the principle of Free Trade; while the county Members went to the country on the principle of Protection. They were doing the same thing now; but he could not have believed, if anyone had told him before the Bill was introduced, that it would have provided such a handle for electioneering purposes as the present Bill gave. It seemed to him that what they really wanted was to go to the country; and the Government could not have a better opportunity. They had introduced this wretched, contemptible Franchise Bill, which was a fraud upon the people from beginning to end. They had a muddle in Egypt, of which the most long-sighted man could not see the end; and they had Ireland coerced and groaning under tyrannical laws, brought about by their incapacity to govern. He would, therefore, invite the Government to go at once to the country upon this Franchise Bill, and take the opinion of the country upon these questions.

Original Question put.

MR. TOMLINSON, in rising to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to enlarge the scope of the Bill, so as to provide, where desirable, for the extension of the Boundaries of the Parliamentary Boroughs," said, he would express a hope that his Motion would be considered in a less acrimonious and less controversial manner than the one the House had been just discussing; and he hoped that the Government would not think that he had brought it forward for the purpose of Obstruction, but that they would be induced to give to the question the attention which was due to an attempt to amend the Bill. He took it as clear that a complete scheme of Parliamentary Reform must include proper provisions for determining the constituencies in which the householders who would be enfranchised ought to be registered. It had been admitted, in the course of the debate, that the Bill, if carried, besides enfranchising a considerable number of agricultural labourers, would also enfranchise a large number of artisans. The population of England had been going on increasing at a very considerable rate, and it would continue to increase at a rate of not less than 500,000 per year. But this increase was attracted principally to the large towns; nearly every large Parliamentary borough had its accretion. He said this without meaning to deny that the boroughs which did not receive direct Parliamentary representation at present were also largely increasing. In the part of England which he (Mr. Tomlinson) represented it was a matter of notoriety, so far as the large boroughs were concerned, that there was a considerable number of people just outside the Parliamentary boundary, whose interests were entirely bound up with those of the borough itself; and who, when votes were allowed them, ought to vote in the borough with which they were really connected. In the borough which he represented—Preston—this was certainly the case; and he was of opinion that all the inhabitants who were included within the municipal boundary ought to be brought within the Parliamentary borough. The same remark would apply to Wigan and other boroughs. When the question of redistribution came to be considered, the subject would, of necessity, be brought before the House, and each borough would have attached to it the population which naturally belonged to it; and if this step were taken in the first instance with regard to existing boroughs, the House would be in a much better position for seeing afterwards how to distribute the representation. He could not conceive what objection or difficulty there could be in attaching a boundary clause to the present Bill. They knew very well, from the experience of former

[First Night.]

Reform Bills, how to deal with boundaries. A clause would be inserted appointing a Boundary Commission. If the same course were taken now, a Boundary Commission would be able to go to work at once, and would complete their task, as regards existing boroughs, before the question of redistribution came on. For this reason he would be glad to know what objection there could be against introducing a clause into the Bill? If an event happened, which he sincerely hoped would not happen—namely, a Dissolution after the passing of a Franchise Bill, and before Parliament had dealt with the subject of the redistribution of seats—it would, at least, mitigate the calamity to have enabled, where possible, the new voters to record their votes in the boroughs to which they belonged, rather than in the adjoining counties. It seemed to him to be a matter so easy and simple that he would not enlarge upon it further, but would simply move the Instruction to the Committee which he had placed upon the Paper.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to enlarge the scope of the Bill, so as to provide, where desirable, for the extension of the Boundaries of the Parliamentary Boroughs."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member has stated, with perfect fairness, the case for the Motion he has made. No person can doubt that the consideration of the boundaries of boroughs must be a portion of the subject of the Parliamentary statement of the question of Reform; but the question really is, whether it belongs naturally to the franchise, or whether it belongs to the subject of areas. I will only point out that the very fact that the hon. Member has been able to move the Instruction indicates that the matter he has called our attention to belongs to the delimitation of areas; because, if it had belonged to the subject of the franchise, the hon. Member would have been able to propose it as a clause in the Bill. I listened to the speech of the hon. Gentleman in order to see whether there was any reason for detaching this particular point from the general question of the delimitation of areas, and I must confess that I did not hear or find that he gave any such reason. Of course, the question whether the delimitation of areas with a view to redistribution is to be comprehended in a Franchise Bill is a very large question which the House has previously treated as a question of principle, and which it has decided upon accordingly. But this mode of taking a small fragment of the question of the delimitation of areas, and thrusting it into a Franchise Bill, ought, after the decision which the House has given on the main subject, to be supported unquestionably by some very strong argument which should tend to show that it would be more conveniently dealt with here than in a Redistribution Bill, notwithstanding the general decision at which the House has arrived. I do not think that any such argument has been shown. It is plain that the question of the boundaries of boroughs is a question which belongs to delimitation. Moreover, it might, in some instances, lead to a great deal of inconvenience to alter the boundaries of boroughs, independently of redistribution; because, in particular cases—indeed, supposing a Dissolution were to take place, and I hope it will not—but if it were to take place with the boundaries of the boroughs altered without redistribution, it would greatly tend to augment the existing anomalies. But it is upon the general ground that clearly this proposal belongs, as a particular item, to that portion of the subject which the House has decided not to entertain, that I hope the hon. Member will not press his Amendment upon the attention of the House.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he was very sorry to hear the Prime Minister speak of this proposal in the tone he had. He had expected that if the right hon. Gentleman would not assent to it as an Instruction to the Committee, he would have held out some hope that steps would be taken by Her Majesty's Government to meet the difficulty pointed out by the Instruction. The Prime Minister said that it was a question which formed part of the question of delimitation, and must be dealt with at a subsequent, and, perhaps, a distant date, as part of the measure which was to relate to the redistribution of seats. But the settlement of boundaries was a matter which must take considerable time, and the effect of postponing it would be obviously and necessarily to entail also the postponement of the scheme for the redistribution of seats. He would point out to the House, if it would allow him, in a very few words, what the effect of the refusal of the Government to accept the proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. Tomlinson) would be. Assuming that the Franchise Bill passed in its present form, unencumbered or unamended, as the two sides of the House might choose to call it, by the addition of a scheme of redistribution, the new voters under it could not, unless some special arrangement were made in regard to registration, come upon the register until the 1st of January, 1886. There was no chance of the Bill, if it passed into law, becoming law before August, and before August the notices would be given for the register which would come in force next January. Therefore, it would be 12 months longer before the new electors could come on the register. If, next year, Her Majesty's Government brought forward a Bill for the redistribution of seats, it would be necessary to decide the question of the boundaries of the boroughs. They would not be in a position to issue a Royal Commission, or to deal with the question, until a Redistribution Bill should have been passed. So that, assuming a Redistribution Bill to be brought in, pressed forward, and passed into law by the month of June of next year, it would not then be possible to attach the boundaries so as to make them ready for the application of the new constituencies until the following 1st of January. Therefore, it was not possible, unless the Government took some prompt steps to appoint a Commission for dealing with the boundaries of the boroughs, to have the redistribution of seats and the new franchise coming into operation at the same time. But then there was another and a very serious point indeed. Suppose this Franchise Bill were allowed to pass; and suppose, during the early part of next year, in the months of April, May, or June, the political Parties throughout the country were preparing for the registration which would take place in the Autumn, for what register were they to prepare, and what register would it be with which the Revising Barristers in September would have to deal? They would have to add to the register of the counties

a large number of voters who would only be put there in order to be taken off again by a Redistribution Bill whenever it should be brought in. In that way the Revising Barrister would be settling, with regard to Middlesex, a very large register of voters who would afterwards have to be carved out again. Therefore, he said that to allow the Act to come into operation without re-arrangement of boundaries would be to create an extraordinary difficulty and an enormous expenditure, by putting a large number of voters upon the provisional registers, from which they would have to be removed when the Redistribution Bill passed into law. Then, if they allowed the Act to come into force without any redistribution of seats, the result would be to swamp the large rural and agricultural constituencies by urban voters, and they would be doing that, although they had now an opportunity of taking measures which would prevent the mischief. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had said it would be difficult in Committee to deal with any clauses which should affect the boundaries of boroughs. He might as well have said that this matter should be dealt with by Royal Commission—by Gentlemen nominated by the Ministry, and whose character assured the country of their fairness in dealing with that difficult and important question; and if the right hon. Gentleman were to say now that a Commission should be established in the Autumn for deciding the boundaries of boroughs in preparation for the Redistribution Bill, that would be the only assurance which could be given to Parliament that a Redistribution Bill would be brought in. It was possible that the borough constituencies might be made very large; but it was better to put a large number of voters in an urban constituency, which was to remain an urban constituency with added Members, than it was to put the same number of county voters into a county constituency, where they were not intended to be ranked as voters, but to be shifted to another register subsequently. He hoped they should have from the Prime Minister that evening a promise that a Boundary Commission should be at once appointed, in order that the House might feel secure that in the next Session of Parliament, if the present Parliament lasted until then, that they should be able to deal satisfactorily with the question of redistribution.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. E. Clarke) had placed his view of this matter very ably before the House; and his (the Attorney General's) reply would be very brief. The proposal which had been made involved the whole question of redistribution. If the House would consider for one moment, they would see the impracticable nature of the proposal. The suggestion was that there should be a Commission appointed to fix the boundaries of boroughs? But what boroughs? It was, of course, impossible to define the boroughs which might exist after the Bill had become law. They might be existing boroughs, or they might be new boroughs; or parts of existing boroughs might be amalgamated with counties. It resolved itself into this—that his hon. and learned Friend showed a desire to obtain a reversal of the decision already arrived at by the House with regard to redistribution; and for that reason the Government could not accept the proposal of a Boundary Commission.

MR. GRANTHAM said, the hon. and learned Attorney General had hardly done justice to the proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. Tomlinson), because, as far as he (Mr. Grantham) could see, it was not necessary to deal with the new boroughs. He wanted to know how they were to determine whether or not the existing boroughs were to be swamped, or grouped under the Bill? That must depend entirely on the area of the boroughs as they were found to be when the Redistribution Bill was brought in. Under the circumstances, he did not follow the hon. and learned Attorney General in saying that the scheme could not be carried out, because there were no materials for knowing what the boroughs were to be. They could only prepare for it by knowing what were the existing areas of boroughs at the time; because, until then, the House must be in absolute ignorance as to the registers of the various constituencies of the country and the way to deal with them. He hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would reconsider the decision arrived at, because the Prime Minister had admitted the other night that, as far as he was concerned, his wish was that the county constituencies should be kept to themselves, and the county voters not swamped by the urban voters. He (Mr. Grantham) was convinced that the best way to show the honesty of that desire was to have the redistribution scheme fairly considered apart from all Party views. He, therefore, hoped the Government would consider this really important question with a view to giving effect to the proposal of his hon. Friend.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 132; Noes 158: Majority 26.—(Div. List, No. 74.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS, according to Notice, rose to move—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to make provision for the due registration of all persons entitled to be registered as voters under the Bill.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) rose to a point of Order. He wished to take the opinion of Mr. Speaker whether it was competent for the right hon. Gentleman to move this Instruction, seeing that the Committee already had power

“To make provision for the due registration of all persons entitled to be registered as voters under the Bill.”

In a Bill dealing with the representation of the people, and affecting the franchise—placing new voters on the register—there must, of necessity, be a power to deal with registration. In the Representation of the People Act—a title similar to that of the present measure—of 1867, provision was made for the registration of the voters who came into existence under the Act. If, then, a clause dealing with the subject could be introduced in Committee, it was obviously unnecessary to move this Instruction; and he, therefore, asked Mr. Speaker whether the Motion was in Order?

MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I have to say, from the best consideration I have been able to give to the point raised, it appears to me that the subject of registration would be relevant to the Bill, and that, therefore, it will be competent for the Committee to deal with it. If the Committee is competent to deal with it, it will be out of Order for an Instruction to be moved, calling upon the Committee to do that which it is already empowered to do. Under these circumstances, I should think the course the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) ought to adopt would be to move an Amendment in the Committee of the Whole House.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I am glad to hear your ruling, Sir. I may say that my object has been entirely gained. I should like to ask, as it is competent for the House to deal with the subject, and as we know from the Prime Minister that the Government have a Bill prepared on the subject of self-acting registration, whether the Government themselves will not bring forward these clauses?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not prepared, at this moment, to state the course which will be pursued by Her Majesty's Government on this question.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): I beg to move that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Member is not in Order in moving "That the Debate be now adjourned," inasmuch as there is no debate now proceeding. The right hon. Member would be in Order in moving "That further Proceeding upon going into Committee on the Bill be adjourned."

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): Then I make that Motion.

Motion made, and Question, "That further Proceeding upon going into Committee on the Bill be adjourned," — (Mr. R. N. Fowler,) — put, and agreed to.

Further Proceeding upon going into Committee deferred until Thursday.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be further adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MR. WARTON: I object to the Bill being deferred until to-morrow at 2, and move that it be deferred till Thursday.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "To-morrow, at Two of the clock," in order to insert the words "upon Thursday," — (Mr. Warton,) — instead thereof.

MR. BRODRICK said, he thought there ought to be some general understanding as to the extent to which Morning Sittings should be taken at that time of the year, so as to protect the rights of private Members who had balloted for those days on which the Morning Sittings were taken four weeks a-head. The Motion was made at 10 minutes to 1 o'clock in the morning for 2 o'clock in the afternoon—that was to say, giving an interval of only 13 hours; and the Notice was quite insufficient to enable those Members successful in the ballot to make a House amongst their Friends for the next evening. The Government should give some assurance that, as the Reform Bill had been treated by them as one of urgent importance, further progress would be made with it on Government nights, and that it would not be taken on private Members' nights. If it were proposed on any future occasion to put it down for a private Members' day, he trusted the Motion would be strenuously opposed.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he was glad the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick) had made a protest against the manner in which the rights of private Members were infringed by Her Majesty's Government. He did not know whether the House had noticed the extraordinary inconsistency of the Prime Minister as to Morning Sittings and Evening Sittings during the past fortnight. The Government had deprived him (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) of a night he had obtained. He had appealed to the Prime Minister to make a House, and the right hon. Gentleman had refused point blank; but last week he had made three or four suggestions as to private Sittings, and ultimately, when asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) to make a House, he had done so, and had then come down and rated the right hon. Gentleman because there were not a large number of his Friends in attendance at 9 o'clock. To-night the Prime Minister refused to assist in making a House, even for such an important subject as the position of the Elementary School Teachers appointed between the years 1846 and 1851 with respect to pensions, which was to be brought on by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Surrey. That hon. Gentleman, therefore, was perfectly justified in the protest he had made, not only on the ground of the rights of private Members, but also on the ground of the advantage of the Government, and the Parliamentary time and advantage which these Morning Sittings afforded to the Government. Several of the last Morning Sittings taken by the Government had not advanced Public Business one iota, and it had not been the fault of hon. Members on that (the Conservative) side of the House. It was not the fault of the Conservative Party. The fact was that Morning Sittings, when taken by the Government from private Members, really afforded an invitation to what was called "Obstruction." Since he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had been in the House, he had never taken any part, direct or indirect, in Obstruction. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, he knew he had been unjustly and recklessly accused of it; but he challenged any hon. Member who jeered in that way to give a single instance in which he had either moved or seconded Motions for the adjournment of the House, or made dilatory speeches. The other day he was accused of Obstruction when he asked a question—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that the Question before the House is that of the postponement of an Order of the Day.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he was sorry to have wandered from the strict Question before the House; but he really thought the Government should give some more satisfactory reason than they had given, for, at a period of the year for which there was no parallel, taking private Members' days, and preventing hon. Gentlemen from bringing forward questions of great public interest.

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had thrown out a challenge which, even if it had been more in Order than it appeared to be, he should have hoped hon. Members on that (the Ministerial) side of the House would not have taken up, as it would have been a pity to prolong this discussion. He (Mr. Gladstone) had simply risen to notice what had fallen from the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick). It would be impossible for him to give any pledge as to Morning Sittings, or to say anything more than that it was only fair that due Notice should be given of them; but as regards the Motion of the hon. Member for West Surrey, he understood that the attention which it very properly commanded would insure it an audience on that evening. He had certainly understood that, on Friday last, it was stated that they would ask for a Morning Sitting on Tuesday. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had suggested that, in reply to an appeal that he (Mr. Gladstone) should assist the hon. Member to make a House on the evening on which he had a Motion on the Paper, a contemptuous refusal was given. That was not the case. He (Mr. Gladstone) had simply stated, without the least contempt, that the Government could not accept any obligation as to making a House at 9 o'clock. With regard to the Motion down for to-day, he understood it was on a very important subject, and that, from the interest taken in the question, there would be no difficulty in making a House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he did not think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had quite understood the difficulty. It was quite true that Notice had been given that a Morning Sitting would be taken; but no convenient opportunity had been given the House to decide whether there should or should not be such a Sitting. That was the real difficulty. At present, the practice was merely to announce that the Government intended to have a Morning Sitting; and all hon. Members could do, if they wanted to discuss the propriety of that course, was to sit up to all hours in the morning, to challenge the Motion that a certain Order be deferred till "this day at 2." To his mind, it was only fair that they should make it a Rule that, at this early period of the Session, before Morning Sittings were decided upon, a Motion should be submitted at half-past 4, which Members should have an opportunity of discussing. He recognized the fact that, by a long course of invasion on the privileges of private Members, the Government had secured almost a right to Morning Sittings from the 1st of June to the end of the Session. Morning Sittings, however, had never before been abused to the extent they had this Session. Private Members, clearly, had no means whatever under the existing system of standing up for their rights, and of putting their case before the House. This was a question not at all of Party politics. There were a large number of Radical Members who, in their time, had shown themselves as keen for the rights of private Members as any one on that (the Opposition) side of the House, and these hon. Members should, therefore, aid in the common cause. For his own part, he should put down a Motion for next Tuesday, to the effect that when a Morning Sitting was asked for before June, it should only be granted by Resolution of the House at 4 o'clock. He was willing to leave the Rule as it was after the 1st of June; but, certainly, before that date, he thought the House should have an opportunity, before half-past 12 o'clock at night, of protesting against the way in which the Government were slowly, but effectually, appropriating the privileges of private Members.

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE said, he would remind the Prime Minister that when the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had a Motion down as to the Irish Magistracy, the right hon. Gentleman, on taking his day, gave a pledge that, in consideration of that circumstance, he would not only make a House, but do his best to keep one. Considering, then, the importance of the question to be raised that day by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick), he trusted that the Government would strain a point in order to make a House for him.

MR. HICKS said, he had understood from the Prime Minister, that the Morning Sitting to-morrow was for the purpose of proceeding with the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill. The Order, however, which it was now proposed to defer was for the resumption of the Adjourned Debate on the Second Reading of the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, and he failed to see why the House, because it might, perhaps, be prepared to give the Government a Morning Sitting to-morrow for the purpose of passing a Bill of the very greatest and most urgent importance—a Bill which was far from likely to raise the price of meat, but which, on the contrary, in his opinion, would be likely to diminish it—["Order!"]—yes; which would diminish the price of meat, seeing that, at present, there was no security given to the breeders of stock—therefore, although the House might be prepared to give the Government a Morning Sitting, a practice which, contrary to all the Constitutional Rules of Parliament, the Government had carried on that year to an extent to which it had never been carried on before, and which, on almost every occasion on which it had been tried, had failed, should be controlled to some extent by the House; and, in that spirit, they should insist upon it that no Bill should be taken to-morrow but the one for which the Sitting was granted—namely, the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill. If the Morning Sitting should be more than sufficient to dispose of that Bill, then the ordinary Business should go on, just as if the House had met at 4 o'clock, with the only exception that there should be two hours' adjournment from 7 to 9 o'clock. He, for one, should therefore certainly vote in favour of the Amendment, unless the Government gave a distinct pledge that the Morning Sitting should be held solely for the purpose of carrying in the Committee the Bill he had mentioned.

MR. STUART - WORTLEY said, there was quite enough to justify the Motion in the fact that Morning Sittings were asked for at so early a period of the year. Not only that, but the Government were proposing these Sittings with most unjustifiable frequency. But that was not all—the House should look at the spirit in which this was done. Not only did the Government, at 4 o'clock on Thursday afternoon, propose to rob private Members of their rights, but when those private Members came down at 9 o'clock on Friday, the Government trampled upon them in their depressed condition, and jeered at their impoverished state.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Original Question again proposed.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished to ask a Question. It was understood by the Opposition that when the Morning Sitting was asked for, it was asked for to take the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, and that alone. He presumed that the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill would stand as the first Order at the Morning Sitting; and he would like to know whether that would be so or not? If that had been understood, there probably might have been no Division at all.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the intention, undoubtedly, was that the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill should be the first Order at the Morning Sitting, and it was only proposed to put the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill down also, in order to utilize any disposable time that might be left for its consideration.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished to mention another matter on which misapprehension seemed to have arisen. It appeared that there were certain matters connected with money that were moved almost sub silentio at half-past 4 o'clock, and fixed to be taken at the Morning Sitting. That, of course, disposed of the holding of a Morning Sitting, and compelled one to be held. No one was aware of what was being done at the time; for it was perfectly impossible for anybody to know what was taking place. There was no Notice; but the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) rose and made a Motion, which was agreed to without a word. He hoped that some assurance would be given by the Government that such a practice would not be resorted to again.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was not aware that anything unusual had taken place; for he was under the impression that it had been practically agreed that a Morning Sitting should be held for the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill. Of course, it would not be right that the Government should fix a Morning Sitting without Notice.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

FRESHWATER FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS AMENDMENTS.

Order for Consideration of Lords Amendments read.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION (REPEAL, &c.) BILL.—[BILL 55.]

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question-proposed, "That the Second Reading of the Bill be deferred till To-morrow at Two of the clock"—(Mr. Hibbert.)

MR. WARTON: I object.

MR. HIBBERT: Then I will put it down for to-morrow; the hon. and learned Gentleman cannot surely object to that.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

IRISH LAND COURT OFFICERS (EX- CLUSION FROM PARLIAMENT) BILL.

(Mr. Brodrick, Lord Arthur Hill, Mr. Macartney.)

[BILL 89.] SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Government could only consent to an ex post facto regulation, that Officers who had taken their appointments on the understanding that they would not thereby be disqualified from serving in Parliament should not be affected by this disqualification. If the hon. Member (Mr. Brodrick) was willing to limit the disqualification to Officers hereafter appointed, excluding those now holding office, and who might be re-appointed, the Government would be willing to consent to the second reading of the Bill. The Government also thought it would be better if the term of disqualification were two years—and the only similar disqualification of which he was aware was one in regard to Revising Barristers, and in their case the term was 18 months. If the hon. Member would accept those two most important alterations, he would offer no objection to the second reading.

MR. BRODRICK said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was more impressed by the necessity of restricting the operation of the Bill than by the object of the Bill, which he did not seem to have fully grasped. He would not now go into particulars as to the Bill; but it was obvious that a Bill of this kind would not have been put on the Paper without strong reasons arising out of the operation of the Land Act. He did not think there would be any difficulty in arriving at an understanding in Committee as to a limitation of time; but he could not understand the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman to exclude gentlemen who might be reappointed; for reappointments were really fresh appointments, and it would be utterly anomalous to include one set of Sub-Commissioners and exclude another. He should be perfectly willing to consider the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman; but he could hardly believe the right hon. Gentleman meant to make that distinction, and he could not assent to it.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he certainly did mean to exclude re-appointments, and when he should have the right to speak generally on the subject, he would go more fully into it.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brodrick) had made a mysterious speech, and had appealed to the time of night as a reason for not putting this matter clearly before the House. The Irish Members could not allow a Bill of this kind to pass without due notice, and he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Sexton),—put, and agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till Monday next.

Second Reading—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Provisional Order * (61); Married Women's Property Act (1882) Amendment (60).

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT (1882) AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

(NO. 60.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to amend the Act of 1882, in which Sections 12 and 16, in reference to criminal proceedings, and the making of husband or wife a witness in a case against either, were contradictory. The Bill would remove the ambiguity, and would make it competent to a husband to give evidence against his wife.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD BRAMWELL suggested that the Bill should not merely make a husband capable of giving evidence against his wife, but for her, as there might be a prosecution against her, and the husband, capable of giving material evidence in her favour, might keep himself out of the witness-box. He would point out that a witness did not give evidence for or against one side or the other, but in the case, and this Bill should make both husband and wife competent to give evidence in the case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that no doubt the noble Marquess would pay attention to the suggestion of the noble and learned Lord. He would ask that the Committee on the Bill should not be appointed for an early day, as he was not at all sure that it might not be expedient to take advantage of this Bill to introduce one or two other Amendments of the existing Act.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY asked the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Bramwell) to put his clause on the Paper, and said he would fix the Committee for that day fortnight.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 13th of May next.

MALTA (CONSTITUTION AND ADMINISTRATION)—CIVIL AND MILITARY GOVERNORSHIP.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can give any information with regard to the appointment of the Chief Secretary at Malta as Lieutenant Governor, and to what extent the administration of civil affairs will be in future under his direction; also, what portion of the salaries of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor will, in future, be paid by the Maltese Government? said, that their Lordships were probably aware that the question of the appointment of a Civil Governor of Malta was a matter of great interest to the Maltese people, and he might say had been so since they placed themselves under the protection of the British Crown and became British subjects. The noble Earl opposite, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, said in that House last Session that he would give a careful consideration to this subject. He had, therefore, felt that he might now ask the noble Earl to what extent the proposed arrangement would place the administration of the civil affairs of Malta and its Dependencies, as distinct from the military, under the direction of a civilian?

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that, in answer to the Question of his noble Friend, he had to state that the matter of the Civil and Military Governorship of Malta had for a long time been under discussion. It had been most properly brought forward on behalf of the interests of the Maltese population, and it had been most carefully considered last year. After weighing all the arguments pro and con he had come to the decided conclusion that, under the peculiar circumstances of Malta, it would not be desirable to comply to the full extent with their demands. Malta was a very small Island, and it was also an Imperial fortress; and he thought that to put into such a narrow area two authorities, each supreme in his own sphere, would be to produce a state of things which might very possibly end in collision between them, and at any rate would not lead to that unity of action which was desirable. He felt himself, therefore, bound to negative that proposition; but he had considered how far it was possible, without injury to the interests of good administration, to meet the wishes of the Maltese people. He understood that the main cause of complaint was that the people supposed, whether rightly or wrongly, that a military officer, having control of the garrison and looking upon his office as in the nature of a military command, was not likely to give as much attention as they would desire to the civil affairs of the Colony. He had endeavoured to meet that objection by giving to the officer who at present held the position of Colonial Secretary the higher rank of Lieutenant Governor, together with an increase of salary, thereby raising his position and placing in the main the administration of civil affairs in his hands. It was not possible—he did not think it would be desirable if it were possible—to endeavour to define precisely beforehand the duties which would be performed by the Lieutenant Governor and those performed by the Governor. It was not intended that there should be any conflict of authority, but that the Governor should be supreme in all matters, whether civil or military. But, practically, the Lieutenant Governor would be placed in that position in which he would be able to relieve the Governor of a very large part of the duty of civil administration. They should not attempt to define their relative positions or duties with any precise accuracy at the present time, because they believed it was a matter which would be better settled when they had some practical experience upon the subject. With regard to the financial part of the question, the House was aware that some years ago a Commission was appointed to inquire into the finances of Malta, and among the other recommendations of that Commission there was one that the salary of the Governor should be reduced from £5,000 to £3,000 a-year. It was contended that the sum of £5,000 was a larger sum than the Maltese could fairly be called upon to pay; and that if they wanted an officer of high position, and one who expected a higher salary, it was rather for the Imperial Government than for the Colony to pay the additional expense. Under these circumstances, he felt it was impossible to maintain the obligation of the Colony to contribute to the Governor's salary at the higher rate. The amount of salary remained unchanged; but, by an arrangement with the War Office, £2,000 out of the £5,000 would be charged upon Imperial funds. There was a reduction, therefore, of the charge upon the Colony to the extent of £2,000, which sum would, however, be diminished by the increase of salary to the Lieutenant Governor. That increase would be £600, and the net decrease to the Colony would therefore be £1,400. He would lay on the Table all the Papers, and their Lordships would see how it was proposed to pay the salaries of both the Governor and the Lieutenant Governor.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that it would be convenient to see the Papers; but he would at once say that he took great exception to the principle of the change which had been made. He should like to know what effect the change would have upon the relations between the Governor and the Lieutenant Governor? He very much doubted the wisdom of the alteration in the duties of the Lieutenant Governor. Malta had a military as well as a commercial population, and it had a Council composed of 10 elected and 10 nominated Members, and there the question of the relations of the civil duties of the Lieutenant Governor and his relations with the Governor would be fought out; and he feared there would be much antagonism—anyhow, there would be much friction between the parties in the administration of the affairs of the Island.

THE EARL OF DERBY explained that the Governor would, as now, be supreme in all matters; but the Lieutenant Governor would relieve him of some part of his duties in regard to the civil administration.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH remarked, that things in Malta were just now in a very divided state, there being actually no Council. He doubted, therefore, whether this was the right time for making the proposed change.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD observed, that, having resided for some time in Malta, he could not conceive any arrangement more ingeniously devised for producing disagreement than that now proposed. Moreover, Malta particularly objected to be described as a "Colony."

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE PURCHASE CLAUSES—ADVANCES TO OWNERS.—RESOLUTION.

LORD CASTLETOWN: My Lords, in moving the Motion which stands in my name, I must beg that indulgence and kindness which this House always accords to those who address it for the first time. The urgency and moment of the question I desire to raise must be my best excuse for trespassing upon you; and though my weak words must be unequal to the task I have undertaken, still, if I succeed in placing before your Lordships the hardship and loss that have overtaken those whose cause I advocate, I shall feel I have not spoken in vain. Some time ago it became apparent that there was a general desire amongst all classes in Ireland to see some amendment of the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act of 1881. As early, indeed, as March, 1882, letters appeared in The Times, signed "R. O'H.," urging that some greater facilities, in the way of cheap money, to induce sales to the tenants, should be arranged; but it was not until the middle of 1883 that men began to realize that there existed what is now called a "financial deadlock in the land market." This block, and the difficulties and hardships which attend it, are increasing weekly. Receivers are being appointed by the score, increasing enormously the expenses connected with the collection of rents; penal rates of interest are being demanded on mortgages; and in many instances mortgages are being hurriedly called in, sure presage of destruction to the incumbered owner; while the Landed Estates Court Judges, standing, so to speak, in the gap, refuse to sell, thereby averting for a time—but for a time only—the ruin which is impending. Now, my Lords, what is the reason for all this? Not bad seasons. Ireland has had bad seasons before, and bad times have been tided over—I mean the Famine times of 1848. In many parts of Ireland prices and times have been better than in many parts of England. It has not been want of money amongst the farming classes except in remote parts of the West and South, where poverty is perpetual. That money is plentiful is attested by the statistical Returns of the savings banks and the fabulous prices given for tenants' interests—7,

10, 15, and 20 years' purchase being common, while they have gone as high as 29 years' purchase—nay, more, there are instances where a tenant has given 29 years' purchase, although he has refused to buy the fee-simple from his landlord for 17 years' purchase. All this proves that some outside and indirect reason must exist, or have been started into being, to account for the depreciated value of the owners' property and this financial deadlock. That reason is not far to seek. First comes, as part of it, the want of confidence engendered by the introduction of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881. Secondly, the operations under that Act, in reducing indiscriminately, and in many instances extinguishing, the margin on which the late owners of Irish property had existed, the margin on the security of which family charges had been agreed upon, and mortgages arranged for. In one of those letters to which I have referred, written by "R. O'H.," a gentleman who, as I take it, is well known to many of your Lordships, and one distinguished alike by his knowledge of Ireland and desire to serve her best interests, he separates an incumbered property into two portions in a very simple and clear manner. He speaks of one portion as "the pledged income," and the other as "the free income," or, as I have called it, "the margin." This margin I shall, therefore, allude to as "the free income." Now, I do not intend to carp at or inquire into the working of the Land Act. I am glad to say a noble Duke has already given Notice of his intention to call your Lordships' attention to its operations, and it is no part of my business to-day to advert to this wide and most important subject. It will merely be my duty to-day to state what I believe to be the result of its working up to now. Her Majesty's Ministers have stated it to be their intention to make known their views on the Purchase Clauses within a few days. I shall not detain your Lordships by referring to the desirability and necessity of amending the Purchase Clauses. I think every section of Irishmen is in favour of such amendment. However, I think I am justified in pointing out that whatever is done must be done boldly, comprehensively, and on a very liberal scale. Petty measures will not do. The whole of the legal costs of conveyancing must be minimized, and the tenant must be able to buy his farm with a good title to it as easily as he would a cow or a cupboard. At the present moment it is almost beyond a poor man's means to buy owing to legal costs and delays; while the Land Commission, hampered as it is by too much work, and, I regret to say it, red-tapeism, naturally seeks to throw obstacles in the way of bargains being arrived at between the landlord who may wish to sell and the tenant who may desire to buy. To illustrate this I will quote the words of the Chief Secretary in answering Colonel King-Harman some time ago in reference to the Costello estate. He informed the House that the tenants had agreed to buy at 15 years' purchase, and that the Irish Bank, considering the security ample, had agreed to advance one-fourth of the purchase money as a second charge paise to the three-fourths to be advanced by the Land Commission. This estate was subsequently valued by the Land Commission, and the result was that the Commissioners considered the estate, including the possessory rights of the tenant, was only security for an advance of three-fourths of the purchase money, calculated at 12 years' purchase. Can we wonder, therefore, that there is a deadlock in the land market when sales are fettered and hampered in this manner? I understood that when the Land Commission took up their functions freedom of contract was to return as soon as possible, and that the Land Commission were not to be valuers of the selling value of land, but brokers only. There have been many plans suggested to remove these difficulties, and to facilitate the transfer of land; but none of them appear to me so workable as that of "R. O'H.," a plan which Her Majesty's Ministers have seen, and which, at the risk of detaining the House for a short time, I should wish to advert to rapidly, pointing out the most salient and valuable parts of it. By his scheme, which appeared in a letter to The Times of the 12th of this month, "R. O'H." converts into the owner of his holding, without detriment to the State, and with ample security to the interests of the taxpayer, any tenant who is willing to purchase from his landlord on fair terms, and is prepared to put down 4 per cent of the purchase money, the landlord putting down 6 per cent, and the land bank, through whose medium the transaction would be completed, also 6 per cent of the purchase money. These amounts are to be held collectively in trust at 3 per cent, and returned to the parties who had put them down, at stated periods, during the time the terminable annuity has to run. By means of this most able and ingenious device he obtains a handsome percentage for his bank; while he practically takes nothing out of the pocket of the seller or the purchaser, except for a stated time. His proposal enables a tenant, without putting down the quarter demanded at present, to reap the same, if not greater, advantages. He will pay a rent to the bank no higher than his present rent—a rent which may, perhaps, be less, and which is terminable in a given time, say 47 years. The landlord receives the major part of his purchase money, and has security for receiving the lesser portion also at a given time; while the State and the taxpayer are assured against loss by the deposits of the tenant and landlord. In fact, all three of them are parties to a transaction which it becomes every day more to their profit to see completed. Take the case of a £10 holding selling for 23 years' purchase, £230. The tenant has only to put down £9 4s., practically less than one year's rent. The landlord leaves out of his £230, £13 16s., receiving the balance, £216 4s. The bank puts down £13 16s.; and this sum, left out on trust at 3 per cent, produces for the bank 8 per cent on this invested 6 per cent, with a good margin for expenses and profit. Now, my Lords, I have touched, perhaps, at undue length on this idea, having regard, as it has apparently, only to the sale and purchase of holdings; but it may be equally well and as successfully applied to giving that indirect compensation, which, I maintain, is due to the landlords of Ireland. You have merely to substitute the word "mortgagor" for "landlord," "mortgagee" for "tenant," and leave the bank in its original position, and the suggestions that I have made in my Motion will be carried out. That is necessary because, whatever is done in facilitating the purchase of their holdings by tenants, a deadlock will always exist at some point where compensation must step in to clear the ground and relieve the position. It is on this point I lay the most stress; and having drawn, I hope, particular attention to the simplicity and comprehensiveness of this particular plan, I am prepared to await the introduction of something, if possible, better, by Her Majesty's Government. I stated in the earlier part of my speech that in many instances the "margin" or free income had been completely cut away by the action of the Land Act of 1881, while the "pledged income" was impaired, or if not impaired much imperilled; so much so that if the mortgagees called in their loans the estates would have to be sold at all hazards. This will shortly take place. I do not think that the Judges of the Landed Estates Court will be able to refrain much longer from accepting any price they can get; for though the amendment of the Purchase Clauses may lessen the loss in the sale of estates, as the tenants getting fairer terms from Government may be inclined thereby to give fairer prices, still the prices obtained will in no way be equal to the actual value of the estates. If this loss were caused by act of Providence, or decrease in the letting value of the land, or by circumstances outside human prevision, I should have no locus standi for urging that compensation is due; but I maintain, and will produce evidence to corroborate my assertion, that this loss has been occasioned by the effect and action of the Land Act. If I can do this—if I can prove this—I will only quote the words of the Prime Minister regarding compensation, when he said during the progress of the Land Law Bill, 1881—

"I do not hesitate to say that if it can be shown on clear and definite experience at the present time that there is a probability, or if after experience should prove that, in fact, ruin and heavy loss is likely to be, or has been, brought on any class in Ireland by the direct effect of this legislation—that is a question we ought to look directly in the face."

We have now had two years' experience of this Land Act, and "ruin and heavy loss" has been brought on the land-owning class, and the question has to be looked directly in the face. I will take, in proof of this, a few cases out of the many which have been sent to me; and when I submit these instances I will leave your Lordships to decide what loss has been sustained by these unfortunate and innocent people. In the selection of these cases I found a great difficulty facing me—not a difficulty in regard to the obtaining of instances, but rather in the selection of the few cases which I shall trouble your Lordships with detailing. Unfortunately, the number of illustrations of the effects of the disastrous working of the Land Act is but far too large. From North, South, East, and West the same story comes, telling of disaster and ruin, in many cases already fallen, in hundreds impending. At the outset let me quote some facts in regard to estates which have been inherited—estates which have descended in the line of succession to the present owners, against whom, let it be noted, no charge of "land jobbery" can be made—I mean no charge of purchasing land as a mere speculation, with a view to raising the rents and thereby making money. Let me take first the case of an estate situate in the County Mayo, the facts connected with which are, indeed, of a very sad character. The present owner, an Anglo-Indian merchant, succeeded to the property, at the death of his brother, some few years ago. At his brother's death this gentleman came from India to enter into possession of the property, bringing with him a sum of about £4,000, the proceeds of many years' industry. An investigation into the state of the deceased man's affairs, however, soon showed that there were liabilities, amounting to almost this figure—£4,000—due to pressing creditors. It was absolutely necessary to pay off these pressing debts at once, and thus was the £4,000—the product of many years of hard life in India—suddenly swept away. The rental of the estate at the time—this was prior to the passing of the Land Act—was £1,600; but only a sum of £424 remained out of it when family charges, mortgage interest, &c., were paid. With the operation of the Land Act, however, came a reduction of 26½ per cent in the rental, and the small margin left heretofore, after the payment of the charges, was now completely cut off. The unfortunate man, who, in the ordinary course of events, came into the possession of an estate which promised him some little income for the remainder of his days, and which tempted him to pay out his all in the hopes of making the future more secure, is now absolutely penniless. The annuitants refuse to give him a farthing, although they have been always paid regularly—they had to be paid, no matter what happened to the unfortunate owner. The law has interfered again, and a receiver has been appointed now for two years. Penal interest has had to be paid to the mortgagee for a debt contracted before the present owner came into possession; and as the result of all this the property has now been put up in the Encumbered Estates Court, with little prospect of advantageous or even justly-priced sale. Such are the facts of one of the saddest cases which have come under my notice. The second I shall quote is that of a property situate in the County Tyrone, held by a gentleman in trust for his three nieces—three young ladies dependent, to a great extent, on the rents of their estate for their sustenance. The property is not a very large one. The yearly rental, prior to the passing of the Land Act, was £615. The outgoings in the way of charges, &c., amounted to £503, leaving a balance of £112. The action of the Land Court, however, reduced the yearly rental by 18 per cent, and now the margin remaining after the payments—for there is no escape from them—is the miserable sum of £8. On this estate, I may mention in passing, the rents had not been raised for 21 years. The next case I shall refer to is that of the estate of a magistrate in the County Cavan. Like that of which I have just spoken, this, too, is a small estate; but all the more so has the operation of the Act proved disastrous to the impoverished owner. After the passing of the Act the rental was reduced 18 per cent, bringing down the margin which remained, after the annual payments, from £168 to £57. The estate was mortgaged, and penal interest has since been exacted. A receiver was appointed two years ago, and for this period not 1*d.* of rent has been received, whilst the expenses of this officer have been added to the already heavily-itemed charge list. The owner cannot see any light in the darkness of his position, unless aid be given him such as I suggest. I have the details of another estate situated in the County Limerick, which are equally worthy of attention, and with the owner of which great sympathy cannot but be felt. The rental up to 1881 was £1,116, but has since been reduced to £752—something like a reduction of 33 per cent. The head rent, annuities, &c., amounted annually to £346—which left a margin in the owner's hands, prior to the reduction, of £770. The interest on a mortgage of £9,000, however, further reduced this to £365. When, through the operation of the Land Act, the rental was brought down from £1,116 to £752, the payments of family charges, head rents, &c., left but a few shillings—16*s.* I believe—over the sum which would be required to pay the mortgage interest. Now, to pay this interest would have been to leave the owner penniless, and for two years and a-half no interest has been paid. Penal interest, at the rate of 5½ per cent, is now due, amounting to £1,732. Completely ruined, and with no chance of being able to do anything to obtain the fair value of his property, the owner has had to go to the Cape, and to send his wife to reside with her father. I could quote other cases of a kindred kind, equally painful; but I shall only trouble your Lordships with another case under this branch. This is the case of a clergyman living in England possessed of a small property in the County Clare. Up to 1881 this clergyman enjoyed an income of something like 25 per cent of his rental after payment of mortgage interest, charges, &c., which were rather heavy. The operation of the Land Act, however, only left him with a little over 2 per cent out of the 25 per cent. The principal grievance, however, in this case is in regard to the head rent. The property is held under a Bishop's lease on the Disendowment of the Irish Church. The owner was compelled to purchase perpetuity at a cost of £2,000. He was requested to send in the then rental, and on this basis the head rent was fixed. Now, although the rental has been reduced 22 per cent, the head rent remains at the original figure. What wonder is it that he should complain bitterly at such action as this? Coming now to what I shall term the second branch of this portion of my subject—the question of estates purchased through the Landed Estates Court under the titles I have spoken of—I shall very rapidly and very shortly adduce evidence in support of my statements. Let me first take the case of an estate situated in the County Cork. This property consisted of Church lands, formerly held from the Ecclesiastical

Commissioners, and now held by sub-grant in perpetuity under the Crown, subject to the yearly rent of £140, and tithe rent-charge of £29. The circumstances of the case are a little peculiar. The property had been in the present owner's family for five generations when it was sold in the Landed Estates Court on the petition of an incumbrancer, and bought by the present owner. To complete the purchase a mortgage of £2,000 had to be arranged for to make up the full amount of £7,240. The property sold high, it being known that the rents had not been altered for generations, and the Landed Estates Court rental bearing on the face of it a statement that "the tenants held at very moderate rents." The purchaser, believing he had an absolute title to the rents as they stood, a schedule of which was set forth in his conveyance, was satisfied with his income—a bare 4 per cent on the £5,240 laid out—and never attempted to raise the rents. The tenants, however, were yearly ones, and they went into the Land Court. What happened? It was proved that the rents had been the same for the last 50 years; and although the Chairman of the Sub-Commissioners confessed that—

"The management of the estate had given great satisfaction to the tenants," and although "allowances had been made for improvements, &c.," still, when considering the question of a "fair rent," they—

"Could come to no other conclusion than that the tenants on this liberally-managed property had been paying too much."

Accordingly, they reduced the rents. Now, if I were discussing the Motion which the noble Duke is about to bring on, I would express my opinion rather strongly on this mode of procedure; but I shall not now delay here. The former rental was £543, and this was reduced to £426. The charges in all amounted to £334, which left a margin of £208 on the former rental, but only £91 on the reduced rental. Now, the owner had purchased this estate on the faith of the most solemn of covenants; he is a tenant to the Crown, and holds a Parliamentary title to at least £200, yet the action of the Crown has reduced this to £91. Leaving your Lordships to appreciate the significance of these facts, I shall pass on to another case. The property I this time refer to is situated in the County Kerry, and was bought under an "indefeasible" title from the same Court; £33,000 was the amount of the purchase money, of which £19,000 had to be borrowed at over 4 per cent. The Land Act followed the purchase, and the rents in some cases were reduced 25 per cent—and this on an estate with an "indefeasible title." The tenants will not now pay. The operation of the Land Act has seriously impaired the owner's income. The mortgagee, frightened for his loan, has served notice to call in the mortgage, and for money borrowed, on what I may describe as the strength of the Crown security, the owner is likely to suffer terrible loss. One other instance and I shall have done these quotations. This last case is that of an estate situate in County Mayo, bought nine years ago in the Landed Estates Court. Like as in the previous case, money had to be borrowed to make up the amount of the purchase money. After the purchase the rents were reduced 11½ per cent, and with an unlooked for loss of £34 per year the present owner had been unable to pay off the mortgage. The mortgagee, knowing no money was to be had, has raised the interest to 6 per cent, and the owner states if 8 per cent were asked, he could do nothing but pay it. These cases need very little, if any, comment. They bear upon the face of each of them a palpable injustice. I could give your Lordships the particulars of many others; but instances accumulate, and in the multiplicity of examples the main facts might be lost. One other sentence, and I resume my general remarks. I have stated that the Land Commission do not facilitate, but rather impede, sales. In support of this I shall simply refer to a case in point where an owner communicated with the Commission in reference to selling his property. The Land Commission Secretary, in reply, raised a question as to the head rent, and placed such obstacles in the way of any forwarding arrangement whatever, that the owner at last dropped the correspondence, and nothing ever came of the matter. Now, my Lords, I think these cases prove that the loss is heavy and severe, and has been directly brought about by the legislation which the Prime Minister was referring to when using the words I have just quoted. I may, perhaps, be asked how do I propose to compensate these ruined incumbered owners? I reply, in the words of my Motion, by giving them "facilities for raising money to pay off mortgages and charges." It would be for the Government to determine the details, and it would be for the tribunal which would have the carriage of sale and such kindred matters to arrange the terms, &c., connected with such work. Such a tribunal you have in the Landed Estates Court, possessing, as it does, most able officers, and all necessary adjuncts, but now powerless to act owing to the "dead-lock" I have before referred to. Perhaps, my Lords, you will say that this is too wide a statement, and I may be told I have produced evidence of loss and ruin; but I have made no clear, direct, or detailed suggestion how to remedy that loss, and the words of my Motion may be considered to be too comprehensive. At the risk, therefore, of detaining your Lordships a little longer, I will go more into details. Let us consider the position of the landlords of Ireland before the passing of the Land Act of 1881 and subsequently. Now, in this consideration, you cannot omit the charges to which their estates were and are subjected, and the persons entitled to these charges. These charges were all created at a time when freedom of contract existed between landlord and tenant. Many of them were created on the faith of "indefeasible" titles given by law—as solemn a contract as any we know of. They were created before the landlords were made subject to the control of a Court in the management of their estates and the fixing of their rents. The owners of these charges were, together with the landlord, owners of a partnership concern, of which he was manager. This management has now been taken from the landlord, and he alone is made to bear the loss, while his partner's position and rights remain unchanged. Surely, as in any business transaction or concern, loss should be borne rateably by all partners, who should be compelled to abate, when by action other than that of the manager, and beyond his control, the returns from the business are diminished. The effect, intentional or unintentional, of the Land Act has been directly or indirectly to reduce the rentals and incomes of proprietors at least 20 per cent. Now, these reductions having been effected, the proprietors continue charged with the same amount as they were previously. The Land Act, if conceived in a just spirit, should not have reduced the income of the landlord only. It should have reduced the annual payments charged upon that income rateably, that is to say—Firstly, tithe rent; secondly, quit rent; thirdly, land improvement charges; fourthly, head rents; fifthly, jointures and annuities; and, sixthly, interest moneys on any mortgages that might be on the estate—all should have been reduced at the same rate. The parties entitled to these amounts, the State and the owners of the free and pledged income, should have been made parties to the results produced by this legislation. It may not now be possible to deal with the fourth and fifth of these—head rents, jointures and annuities—as any diminution there might cause more ruin than at present. I will therefore omit them from consideration just now. The sixth, however—interest moneys—can be dealt with; and as this charge is intimately bound up with the sale and purchase of estates, I maintain this is the proper moment for estimating the feasibility of dealing with it. Government state their intention of amending the Purchase Clauses and thereby inducing more sales to tenants. Suppose they do, and that a general desire is manifested both by landlord and tenant to divest themselves of the dual ownership, and that agreements for sale are entered into, we must remember there are other parties to the bargain, especially in the case of an encumbered estate. I allude, of course, to the case of mortgagees and those who have a lien upon the estate. Take a case in point. A landowner may desire to sell to his tenant a particular holding more favourably circumstanced for sale than any other on his estate. But this holding being subject, with other holdings on the same estate, to a mortgage, the owner may be met with a refusal on the part of the mortgagee to join in the conveyance and take the purchase money in part payment of his charge. Or, again. Suppose the estate subject to three or four different mortgages, one puisne to the other, and that the landlords and tenants mutually agree to sell on that estate, it is more than probable that the last two mortgagees, fearing they may not receive the full amount of their loan, may use means to render the sale abortive and of no value, and thereby prohibit the very thing that is calculated, above all things, to have a tranquillizing and valuable effect on Ireland—namely, an increase in the number of proprietors. The necessity and advisability of creating these proprietors is, to my mind, more pressing now than ever; but in attempting to transform the occupier into the owner the historic words of Mr. Bright should be borne in mind and amplified. He said at Birmingham, in January, 1880, when advocating the creation of a yeomanry proprietary—

“This should be done by a process which shall be just, not to the tenant only, but to the landlord.”

Mr. Bright here forgot, apparently, the other parties to the transaction—perhaps not anticipating then the operations of the Land Act of 1881—the State, which might interfere and render the sale of the land to the tenant absolutely unjust to the landlord by vitiating the value of the saleable commodity, and the mortgagees, on the other hand, who might refuse to permit the sale, and thereby cause injustice to both owner and occupier, anxious as they might be to come to terms. The owner of an encumbered estate in Ireland—and most of them are more or less encumbered—has now but two courses open to him, supposing his “free income” to have been seriously impaired by the operation of the Act. First, to pay the penal interest, and that will surely be exacted by the frightened mortgagees, and thereby further reducing his income; or, on the other hand, to attempt to sell his land to the tenant, who will naturally not give too large a price for what may daily be depreciated in value. In the first instance, he is very nearly ruined, and is obliged to exact the uttermost farthing from his tenants, while the enforced residence of a genteel pauper can be of no benefit to the district. In the second case, the ruin is sharp and decisive. Or take a worse case. Perhaps, in the first instance, a receiver is appointed, and the remains of his income are frittered away in law costs; while, if the second line be pursued, and the estate sold at an unfair price, as it almost undoubtedly would be, the annuitants and mortgagees would take good care to get all they could out of the purchase money, and perhaps leave the unfortunate owner penniless, as in one of the cases I dealt with. There is but one way out of the difficulty—State interference on just lines to all parties. When this is done, and not till then, we may expect finality in the Land Question. The difficulty has arisen entirely through State interference; and I maintain if, without detriment to the State or the Treasury as representing the taxpayer's interest, such justice can be meted out as is due to those aggrieved and interested, it is the duty of the State to take action. In the words of my Motion—

“That having regard to the announced intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure to secure greater facilities to tenants in Ireland for the purchase of their holdings, this House is of opinion that any such measure as is proposed by Her Majesty's Government should be so framed as to afford to those landowners of Ireland who have suffered pecuniary loss by the operation of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, facilities for raising money to pay off charges affecting their estates on as easy terms as would by the said measure be secured to purchasing tenants, or compensation in respect of such pecuniary loss in any way that may be deemed advisable.”

I have been told that if this were done the effect would be to bolster up insolvent owners, giving them, so to speak, a new free income on which to borrow. I am entirely opposed to any attempt to maintain a pauper gentry—a class most detrimental to a country's welfare. Surely, loans of State money could be allowed only to those who had offered to sell their estates to their tenantry at fair prices, and were prepared to sell, but prevented by the action of the mortgagees, or by the determination of the would-be purchasers to exact a one-sided bargain. In the case of encumbered estates put up for sale, let the State offer the land to the tenants through the landlord for, say, 20 years' purchase. If the tenants refuse to avail themselves of the offer, let the State then advance to the landlord sufficient money to clear him of his encumbrances or a certain portion of them. Again, I am met by the statement that the expenditure of State money for such a purpose would be on too lavish a scale. I distinctly deny that statement, and for two valid reasons—first, in a most able prelude to a work on Sales of Land in Ireland, Mr. Fotherrell, a gentleman of great experience, points out that during 10 years of most active work in the Landed Estates Court—from 1865 to 1875—when there was a mania for buying land in Ireland, £9,237,000 was the gross amount of all kinds of property sold in that Court—less than £1,000,000 a-year. Supposing even those facilities were given to which I have referred—namely, that plenary powers were given to the Land Commission to sell, and the methods of procedure were simplified, it is not unfair to surmise that not much more than £2,000,000 worth of property could by any possibility pass through that Court in the year. My second reason is that as soon as it would become known that Government could and would come to the rescue if necessary, confidence would be restored, and those who had lent, and trembled for their loans, would feel secure against panic. Then, again, I am told—and, indeed, was asked by one of our leading statesmen—“What right had poor Ireland to ask rich England for advances for such purposes?” I answered then, as I answer now—“Ireland as long as she remains an integral portion of the United Kingdom, is entitled to claim from the National Exchequer money that may be safely used for the benefit of her people of any class.” But, perhaps, I may be met with the question of safety or security for the advance, whatever that may be. I say at once, utilize some financial scheme, such as “R. O’H.” has worked out, and the security to the State is guaranteed. You can advance by his plan money to the landlords to pay off their charges with equal safety as to tenants to purchase their holdings. You need only convert “tenant” to “landlord,” “landlord” to “mortgagee,” and leave “bank” in its normal position. The percentages they would leave in pledge would be the same as when the question of purchase was being settled, and, as in the previous case, the effect would be to benefit all. Every year as it passes away increases the benefit of the loan to the recipient, it being a terminable annuity; while, at the same time, it diminishes the liability of the bank and augments as well the value of the security to the State. Now, my Lords, I come to the first, second, and third of the charges which I have enumerated—these portions of the pledged income which I called tithe and quit rents and land improvement charges. I shall not refer at great length to these matters, but shall speak of them as points where the compensation alluded to in the second part of my Motion may be indirectly given. I take them as instances of what compensation can be given to owners of unencumbered estates as opposed to owners of encumbered estates who may have suffered equally. The State, my Lords, having brought about this legislation, and being the party affected under these three heads, and having control over its own legislation, should now try to remedy the inequalities caused by the legislation, and in remedying these should so adjust the three charges I speak of as to make them stand at 20 per cent less than they are at present, more especially when the reduction can be effected without loss by lengthening the periods during which the lesser amounts would be payable. Take the case of the tithe rent-charge. This is a rent-charge having priority over all other charges. The occupier, who originally paid it, was relieved of it, and it was placed on the shoulders of the owner, the State finding it difficult to collect. These owners were given as a bribe a quarter of it for its collection, but were empowered to add the expense of the collection to their rental; or, in other words, to raise their rental to cover the cost of collection. It was computed on the value of the land, in those days when wheat was at a very high price, and when freedom of contract prevailed. Septennial valuations were to be made, and payments estimated accordingly. These valuations were never taken, and the tithe rent is the same as it was in 1869, when it was sequestrated from the uses for which it was originally intended—that is, the sustentation of the Irish Church—and was applied by the State to lay purposes of all kinds. The quit rent and land improvement charges practically represent the interest which the State receives on some originally estimated capital value of the land. The State by its own action has lessened that value 20 per cent, or handed that amount of value over to other persons than the original owner. It should, therefore, in all justice and equity, reduce the interest it receives by 20 per cent, that being the amount it has depreciated the capital value. The question of land improvement charges I will not go into fully. It can be dealt with more fitly when the Motion of the noble Duke comes on, when I think I shall be prepared to show that drainage charges are now still extracted from the the unfortunate owner, when the value of the rental of the land on which the charges are allocated has been seriously diminished by the action of the Court. My Lords, I fear I have detained you at great length. I have, however, I trust, proved that heavy loss has been caused to owners of Irish land by the operation of the Land Act, and that compensation may be claimed with all fairness. I hope I have proved to your Lordships that the question, which the Prime Minister was prepared to look in the face, is now before you, and must be met. The amendment of the Purchase Clauses, and compensation to the ruined owners, should run hand in hand, and give that finality to the Land Question which the noble Marquess now governing in Canada (the Marquess of Lansdowne) so prophetically warned this House the present Land Act would never give. Even the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) argued upon this question from the same standpoint, when he said, referring to the Purchase Clauses, on the 27th of April, 1881—

"We believe that it is in that direction alone that permanent improvement in the condition of Ireland can be obtained."

That the Prime Minister himself contemplated some such demand I gather from his speech on the Motion of Mr. W. H. Smith in the other House respecting the Purchase Clauses, when he said, in reference to the scheme propounded by Mr. Smith—

"Upon the scheme itself, I can give no opinion now, except this—that it may be possible to frame a plan which may take the form of an Irish Fund, and, at the same time, not be permanently disassociated from the Consolidated Fund."

Now is the moment for the introduction of some such scheme. You have the expressed desire on all sides to see more proprietors created in Ireland. You have tested, by experience, the hardship and ruin brought about by the action of the Land Act; and you have a financial deadlock existing in Ireland which, unless the State interferes, will bring inevitable ruin on many thousands of your fellow-countrymen. These men—these owners of property—were acquitted by the Prime Minister when he introduced the Land Act. Why are they mulcted in 20 per cent of their incomes if they have committed no crime? I abjure Her Majesty's Ministers to look this great question boldly and squarely in the face. It is no Party cry; it is no question of creed or class. The impoverished owner in Ireland has suffered equally, whether Protestant or Catholic, Peer or peasant proprietor. The trader who has converted his hard-earned money into fee-simple estate, bought in the Landed Estates Court, and held under the Crown—under as solemn a declaration as man can make—stands on the same footing, and has suffered equally as bad, as the squire whose property has descended to him through long generations. All have fared alike. The results which I complain of were, I assume, unanticipated. If they were, it is the duty of the State to meet them, now that they have arisen. If I cannot say that they were unanticipated, I am obliged to say that they were unprovided for. If this be so, provision should now, and can, be made to alleviate the position of those rent-owners—not guilty, yet sentenced; acquitted, yet condemned.

Moved, "That having regard to the announced intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure to secure greater facilities to tenants in Ireland for the purchase of their holdings, this House is of opinion that any such measure as is proposed by Her Majesty's Government should be so framed as to afford to those landowners of Ireland who have suffered pecuniary loss by the operation of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, facilities for raising money to pay off charges affecting their estates on as easy terms as would by the said measure be secured to purchasing tenants, or compensation in respect of such pecuniary loss in any way that may be deemed advisable."—(The Lord Castletown.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he very much regretted that, his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council (Lord Carlingford), who was better acquainted with that question than he was, being unavoidably absent, it devolved on him to give such an answer as he could to the speech of the noble Lord. And, in the first place, so far from complaining in any way of that speech, he had listened with the greatest pleasure, as he was sure the whole House had done, to the perfectly calm, temperate, and, at the same time, admirably clear manner in which the noble Lord had treated a difficult and somewhat thorny subject. With regard to the statement contained in the Motion as to the Government having announced their intention to introduce a measure for the amendment of the Purchase Clauses of the Irish Land Act, he could only say that the Government had pledged themselves to bring forward a measure on that subject; and it would be obvious to the noble Lord and the House that he could not now enter into details in reference to that question. He would only remark, in regard to one particular point on which the noble Lord laid stress—namely, the importance of reducing the intricacy of conveyancing and the costs of obtaining the sale of estates—that the Irish Government were fully sensible of the importance which all must feel of that being done, and, whatever measure was adopted, he did not hesitate to say that ought to form one branch of it. He now came to the more immediate subject of the Motion, which was to the effect that in conjunction with the facilities to be offered for the sale and purchase of estates some compensation should be secured to landlords who had suffered direct loss from the operation of the Land Act. The noble Lord had quoted a variety of cases in which they must, no doubt, all feel great sympathy with those who had suffered by the reduction of rent; but, with respect to particular cases, no general inference could be safely deduced from them. No doubt there had been a considerable reduction of rent in Ireland. That reduction, he believed, amounted to an average of 19 per cent. With reference to the manner in which that loss had been caused, the noble Lord had laid great stress on the hardship thus involved to those landlords who had obtained an indefeasible Parliamentary title to their estates. That indefeasible title, however, did not refer to the rent, but to the possession of the land against adverse claimants. The Government gave no guarantee, and could give no guarantee, that the rents should remain at a particular amount; but gave the buyers an indefeasible and complete title to the land. Then he was not prepared to admit that that average loss of 19 per cent on rents in Ireland had been caused by the Land Act. If the Government had stepped in for some reason of policy of its own, and without there being any difficulty on the part of the landlords in obtaining their rents, and had simply said—"We think it necessary to pass an Act that will have the effect of reducing rent," and if in that case there had been no compensation given for such reduction, that would have been confiscation. But the actual case, as he looked on it, was something entirely different from that. There arose a state of things in Ireland—it was not now his duty, nor was it necessary, to inquire through whose fault—of the most dangerous description. An agrarian movement prevailed of so serious a character that not only were the landlords unable to get their rents punctually paid, but there was a very serious possibility that they would get no rent at all. In that position of affairs the Government of this country went to Parliament, and proposed that there should be a new law with regard to landed estates in Ireland, by which the rent should be fixed by a tribunal, instead of being left to be fixed simply by the landlords and tenants together; and they entertained the hope that in that manner they would be able to restore to the landlords the powers they had lost of obtaining anything like reasonable rents for their property, and able at the same time to restore, to some extent, tranquillity to Ireland. He maintained that the objects which the Government had in view, which were not injurious but beneficial to the landlords, had to a large extent been attained. He was assured that at present rents were very fairly paid in Ireland generally; and through the operation, largely, no doubt, of the strong measures of repression which it was the duty of the Government to take, but partly, also, he hoped, through the new arrangement with regard to the position of tenants, Ireland was in a state of very much greater tranquillity. He could not admit that the Government of this country had inflicted a loss on the Irish landlords for which it was bound to compensate them with money taken from the taxpayers of this country. He said, on the contrary, that the Government had stepped in and saved the landlords from ruin. The noble Lord on the Cross Bench said the landlords had been ruined by the action of the Government. He challenged and contradicted that assertion, maintaining that the Government had saved them from ruin; and, therefore, that the Government were not called upon in any way, upon any grounds of morality or fair dealing, to compensate the landlords for a loss which was not caused by the Government, but caused by other reasons, and which the Government had sought, as far as it was in its power, to mitigate. The noble Lord laid down the principle which had at first sight the appearance of fairness—namely, that there ought to have been a pro rata reduction of all charges on the land; but that principle had never been acted upon, as far as he knew, in any of their dealings with land. In England there had been a reduction of rent owing partly to the same causes which had operated in Ireland, because in Ireland also the effects of bad harvests had been felt. The reduction of rent in his own part of England had, in many instances, far exceeded 20 per cent; and he was sorry to say that the landowners there had not the least prospect of being able to look to the Government, or to any other authority, to help them in their difficulties. It would be a most direct and absolute interference with all the rights of property to say, when a man had advanced money on the distinct condition that he was to receive the first portion that was available, and was not to be brought in as a common creditor with the landlord, that he should be treated as a common creditor with the landlord, and that they should pro rata reduce that which he had the first claim upon. His position, then, in regard to that matter was this—that that loss which had been undoubtedly suffered by the landlords of Ireland was made up of different elements. A portion of it was, no doubt, due to the general depression of agriculture; and another portion was due to the unfortunate and disturbed condition of the country, to the utter want of confidence between different classes, and to an agrarian movement of a serious character. But it could not be argued that any portion of this loss had been caused by the Act in the sense that if it had not passed the landlords would not have suffered this loss. His belief was that if the Act had not been passed the landlords would have suffered a much greater loss; and, although he sympathized with them, yet when they came to treat this as a great

State matter, in which it was argued that the State should come forward to relieve a whole class by State money, he felt himself unable to admit the main proposition on which the noble Lord had rested his case. He had no doubt the landlords were perfectly sincere in their complaints of the Land Commissioners; but it was a fact that the tenants also were of opinion that the Commissioners acted against them and in favour of the landlords. When both sides complained, it might reasonably be concluded that the Commissioners were impartial. He thought, with reference to the special cases mentioned by the noble Lord, that a tribunal should have the power of saying whether the security offered for the purchase was sufficient. He really had nothing more to say in answer to what the noble Lord had brought forward, except to repeat that the Government were exceedingly sensible of the necessity of bringing forward a Bill to amend the Purchase Clauses, and that they would do so with a double object—first, to increase the number of freeholders in Ireland for the sake of the peace and happiness of the country; and, secondly, to offer such facilities for the purchase of land as to enable landlords who desired to dispose of their estates to dispose of them on fair terms. To that extent the Government agreed with the noble Lord; but they could hold out no hope that they would go to the extent the noble Lord desired in relieving landlords of the mortgages which pressed upon their estates. He should, therefore, be unable to assent to the noble Lord's Resolution.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that what was at the back of the noble Earl's argument, and at the back of the arguments of the supporters of the Irish Land Act, was that it was not in any way an exceptional Act. He must take exception to that view. His noble Friend (Lord Castletown) would never have come to their Lordships' House with the principle he had advocated unless he was prepared to prove that the Irish Land Act was an exceptional Act, not only in its conception, but in its operation. Indeed, that was acknowledged on all hands. It was acknowledged by the Prime Minister, who said at the time that the measure could only be justified by exceptional circumstances. Surely, then, his noble Friend was perfectly justified in taking this ground—that this was an exceptional case, and one for which an exceptional remedy ought to be provided. The noble Earl thought that much of the state of Ireland was due to bad seasons; but he (the Earl of Donoughmore) was not satisfied that that was so, as the last four or five years in Ireland had been good. In England the seasons were against the farmers, and there had been a reduction of rents to about 10 per cent, which would probably be paid when the seasons were better. The reduction in Ireland was not according to the same ratio, and rents there would never be raised. His contention was that the reduction in Ireland was due to the disturbed state of the country, combined with the effect the Land Act had upon the tenants. With regard to the question of a peasant proprietary, he was not sure that it would be an unmixed blessing to Ireland, or to any country; but he was convinced that any attempt to create a peasant proprietary in Ireland ought to be made by the most careful and capable means. In the present state of Ireland the project seemed to him to be practicably impossible. The existing land block in Ireland reacted upon every industry in the country. That block in the land market was caused by the fact that the tenants either knew, or were persuaded, that some day or other the land would have to be sold for next to nothing. All that was asked of their Lordships in the Motion was that by some such machinery as suggested, the landlords might be able to go into the market and deal with their tenants on fair terms. He failed to see what particular good the Land Act had done—it had certainly not improved the position of the landlords, and it had as yet done very little for the tenants, because he thought they would in future be hampered by the enormous tenant right which the Act created. All that was now asked was that the Government should look at this matter in a fair and impartial spirit.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I have listened with great attention to the speech of my noble Friend on the Cross Benches (Lord Castletown), and I think he has made out an excellent and unanswerable case for compensation in some form or other for the Irish landlords. There is not the slightest doubt that they have suffered most acutely from the effects of the Act of 1881; that in cases where they have been living upon margins the reduction, which should have been distributed over the whole estate, has fallen upon the margin, in many instances sweeping the whole of it away. It is unnecessary for me now to quote from the speeches of Ministers, who, at the time of the passing of the Land Act, prophesied to us the good effects of that measure upon the landlord's interest in his estate, and assured us that if confiscation could be proved compensation should be given. My Lords, confiscation has been proved over and over again. It has been proved to-day in the able speech of my noble Friend, and it is now high time that the Government took some steps to redeem the pledges which they have made. I shall not attempt to bring forward a proposal as to how this compensation could be awarded, or, in other words, how those landlords, who have been reduced almost to ruin in the manner I have described, are to be saved by the Government. There have been numerous plans suggested as to how loans at a cheap rate of interest might be raised; and perhaps the Government may see their way to adopt some one of these proposals, and tide those unfortunate landlords over their present difficulties. The Motion of my noble Friend refers also to the very much larger question of purchase; and whatever may be done to relieve the unfortunate landlords I have referred to, the Purchase Clauses must be made workable before there is any chance of success. We are informed that a Bill dealing with this subject is to be introduced by the Government very shortly; and I sincerely trust that this may not only be a real measure of relief for those landlords whose properties must be sold, and who are unable to find a purchaser at present, but that it may also be a long step in the direction of solving the whole Irish difficulty. At the time the Land Act was passing through your Lordships' House, I ventured to point out that there were certain clauses in the measure which had been put into it for the purpose of ornament; that they might look very well, and at the same time be sufficiently plausible to catch the votes of those who had hobbies on the subjects contained in them; but that, by anyone who knew the true position of affairs in Ireland, by anyone who could with any success calculate the effects of the Act upon the agricultural population of that country, they would be looked upon as perfectly unworkable. My Lords, I was taken to task by noble Lords opposite, and by the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, for this statement; and it was also pointed out by the Marquess of Hartington that the Fair Rent Clauses of the Act itself were merely a modus vivendi to enable those other clauses to come into operation; but I think it has been proved beyond any manner of doubt that, notwithstanding the statements of noble Lords opposite and the prophecies of the Marquess of Hartington, what I then foretold has actually come to pass; and the clauses relating to emigration, the reclamation of waste lands, and the establishment of a peasant proprietary are, in their present form, entirely inoperative. We have been over and over again informed by the Government that they are in favour of establishing a peasant proprietary; but they are in favour of doing it in as cheap and as nasty a manner as is possible. The fact that they are about to introduce a Bill for the Improvement of the Purchase Clauses proves that they admit failure; but now the question is, whether they are thoroughly aware of the reasons why the Purchase Clauses are now entirely unworkable? We all have heard of the argument that the present condition of an Irish tenant is very much against his being prepared to pay more money in the shape of an annual instalment for a certain number of years than he has been accustomed to pay for rent. We also know that the agitators never at any time had more the ear of the people than at present, and that they have been encouraging the tenants of Ireland to believe that they will get their land for nothing. I would remind the noble Earl that he stated that the tenants were equally dissatisfied with the decision of the Courts as well as the landlords; but I would point out that the tenants are dissatisfied simply because they expected to get their land for nothing. They found that the present Government were squeezable; and it is evident that they intend to squeeze them still further with a view to obtaining their land for nothing. These facts have operated against the working of the Purchase Clauses. But there are other reasons existing, which, perhaps, the Government may not be aware of, that are calculated to render their scheme entirely abortive; and among them is the fact that the Land Commission has, in addition to its other duties, the sale of land to tenants placed in its charge. There is every reason why the Land Commission should be the very worst medium between landlord and tenant for the purpose of bringing about sales. In the first place, I would like to point out that it cannot give a title without going to a great deal of unnecessary expense, and after that expense has been incurred, the title which can thus be obtained from the Land Commission Court is not nearly as good as the Parliamentary title, which can be obtained from the Landed Estates Court at less cost. Then, again, there is nobody in Ireland who can believe that the Land Commission Court is an absolutely impartial tribunal in regard to the sale of land. Its duties prove that it is not so. It acts for the tenant. Its duty is to buy land for the tenant out and out, to dispose of it to him again without making any profit, or to see that the number of years' purchase given, three-fourths of which will be advanced by the Treasury, should be as small as possible, so as to leave a very large margin for the security of the Government loan. It is acting for the Government and for the tenant, but not for the landlord. It has to buy as cheaply as possible from the landlord for the other two parties, and in either case acts in the direction of depreciating the landlord's interests. It has such enormous powers at its command that it can practically force any landlord who is obliged by his creditors to sell to part with his property almost at its own price. In the first place, it may have cut down the rents, thereby reducing the purchase money; and even then, if the landlord and tenant should have agreed upon a certain number of years' purchase, it may refuse to sanction the advance of three-fourths of the price agreed on—though the sale is bond fide—if it thinks the tenant might have got the holding cheaper, although the Government will have the additional security of the tenant's interest in his holding. The result is that if the landlord be obliged by his mortgagees to sell his estate the
